

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

UNIT. OF MICH.

1897
JULY-DEC
52

AP
4
A17

SUPPLEMENT TO THE ACADEMY,
Jan. 8, 1898.

T

A WEEK

PUBLISHING

LONDON :

PRINTED BY ALEXANDER AND SONS
LONSDALE BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE,

G

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LII.

LITERATURE.

REVIEWS.

REVIEWS—continued.

REVIEWS—continued.

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Africa, South, Guide to ...	374
Ainger's (Alfred) edition of Poems of Thomas Hood ...	524
Aiken's (George A.) edition of The Spectator ...	300
Aldous's (J. C. P.) Physics Note-Book ...	218
Alingham's (Hugh) Captain Cuellar's Adventures in Connacht and Ulster ...	147
Allanson-Winn's (R. G.) Baring ...	570
Allbutt's (Thomas Clifford) edition of A System of Medicine ...	309
Allen's (George) Modern Painters (rep.) ...	424
— (Grant) The Evolution of the Idea of God ...	473
America and the Americans ...	30
"American History Told by Contemporaries" ...	237
Ames's (Percy W.) edition of The Mirror of the Sinful Soul ...	28
Ancient Classics for English Readers ...	117
Anderson's (William J.) The Architecture of the Renaissance in Italy ...	87
— (Robert) The Silence of God ...	240
Annual Register, The, 1896 ...	70
Anstey's (F.) Baboo Jabberjee, B.A. ...	349
Architectural Review, The ...	324
"Arnold's School Shakespeare" ...	10
Art and Life, and the Building and Decoration of Cities ...	108
Asbjørnsen's (P. C.) Fairy Tales from the Far North ...	480
Ashmead-Bartlett's (Sir Ellis) The Battlegrounds of Thessaly ...	266
Atkinson's (T. D.) Cambridge, Described and Illustrated ...	570
Austen's (Jane) Mansfield Park (new ed.) ...	374
Avory's Soldiers of the Queen ...	482
Baigent's (Francis Joseph) The Register of John de Sandale and Rigaud de Asserio ...	324
Bang's (J. K.) The Pursuit of the House Boat ...	184
Baring-Gould's (S.) English Minstrelsy ...	88
Barker's (Henry J.) Scarlet Feathers: a Story of Adventure ...	524
Barnard's (F. P.) King John ...	10
Barnett's (P. A.) Teaching and Organization ...	299
Battenburg's (Prince Louis of) Men-of-War Names ...	448
Beasts, More (for Worse Children). By H. B. and B. T. B. ...	481
Bedford's (F. D.) Nursery Rhymes ...	481
Bell's (Mrs. Arthur) Thomas Gainsborough ...	528
Bennett's Master Skylark ...	482
Bigelow's (Poultney) White Man's Africa ...	423
Bigham's (Clive) With the Turkish Army in Thessaly ...	47
Western Asia A Ride through ...	196
Bird's (George W.) Wanderings in Burma ...	177
Birrell's (Augustine) Four Lectures on the Law of Employers' Liability ...	109
Bishop's (M. C.) Memoir of Mrs. Urquhart ...	68
Black's Guide to Bath and Bristol (new ed.) ...	350
Blomfield's (Reginald) History of Renaissance Architecture in England ...	477

	PAGE
Books for the Boy ...	350, 493
— for the Young ...	432, 573
Boore's (Emma) Wrekin Sketches ...	10
Borlase's (W. Copeland) The Dolmens of Ireland ...	103
Bourdillon's (F. W.) translation of Aucassin and Nicolette ...	547
Bovill & Askwith's Koddy Owen ...	350
Bradley's (A. G.) Sketches from Old Virginia ...	323
Bradley & Benson's The Philosophical Lectures and Remains of Richard Lewis Nettleship ...	305
Bradshaw's (Henry) Statutes of Lincoln Cathedral ...	324
Brekstad's (H. L.) translation of Asbjørnsen's Fairy Tales from the Far North ...	480
— "Bran, The Voyage of" ...	374
Briggs's (Sir J. H.) Naval Administrations ...	63
Brightwen's (Mrs.) Glimpses into Plant Life ...	321
— "British Classics for Schools" ...	140
Bryden's (H. A.) The Victorian Era in South Africa ...	148
Buchan's (John) Sir Walter Raleigh ...	160
Bucke's (Dr. Richard Maurice) edition of Calamus: Walt Whitman's Letters to Peter Doyle ...	159
Buffum's (W. Arnold) The Tears of the Helixias ...	570
Bunyan's Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (rep.) ...	424
Burgoyne's (F. J.) Library Construction, Architecture, and Fittings ...	324
Burrows's (Montagu) History of the Foreign Policy of Great Britain (new ed.) ...	308
Butcher's (E. L.) The Story of the Church of Egypt ...	563
Butler's (Samuel) The Authoress of the Odyssey ...	478
Buxton's (E. N.) Epping Forest ...	321
Cabanes' (Doctor) The Secret Cabinet of History ...	300
Calamus: Letters written by Walt Whitman to Peter Doyle ...	159
Calvert's (Albert F.) My Fourth Tour in Western Australia ...	374
Canterbury Cathedral, Notes on the Painted Glass in ...	148
Carey's translation of The Divine Comedy of Dante (new ed.) ...	350
Carpenter's (Frederic Ives) Lyrical Poetry ...	162
Carter's (Rev. T.) Shakespeare, Puritan and Ecclesiast ...	178
Cassell's Family Doctor ...	338
Chambers's (E. K.) Samson Agonistes ...	146
Channing's (Francis Allston) The Truth about Agricultural Depression ...	570
Chomelley's (R. F.) Coriolanus ...	10
Christian Knowledge Society's Publications ...	324, 482
Christian's (Nicholas) That Tree of Eden: a Study in the Real Decadence ...	197
Christison's (Dr. J. Sanderson) Crime and Criminals ...	180
Church's (Rev. Alfred) Lords of the World ...	348

	PAGE
Church's (William Conant) Ulysses S. Grant ...	544
Clarke, Fowler, & Gore's Astronomy ...	522
"Concise Knowledge Library" ...	522
"Contemporary Science Series" ...	106, 125
Cooley's (Lydia Avery) Singing Verses for Children ...	523
Cordery's (J. G.) translation of The Odyssey of Homer ...	569
Cornford's (Rev. J.) edition of The Book of Common Prayer ...	374
Cornish's (C. J.) Nights with an Old Gunner, &amp;c. ...	421
Costello's (W. C.) translation of Cabanes' Secret Cabinet of History ...	300
"County Histories of Scotland" ...	20
Courthope's (W. J.) History of English Poetry ...	123
Crawford's (J. H.) Wild Flowers of Scotland ...	120
Crawford's (Oswald) Selections from Wordsworth, Coleridge, Shelley, and Keats ...	444
Critic, The ...	374
Crockett's (S. E.) Sir Ibadyn Lion ...	480
Cromwell's (J. G.) Wayton's House of Cromwell ...	9
Crooke's (W.) The North-Western Provinces of India ...	320
Crowest's (Frederick J.) Verdi, Man and Musician ...	424
Curry's (Mary B.) A Book of Thoughts ...	448
Cuthbertson's (David) edition of Ramsay's Life of Fénélon ...	277
Danett's (Thomas) translation of The History of Comines ...	44
Daniel's (A. E.) London Riverside Churches ...	524
D'Annunzio's (Gabriele) Sogno d'un Mattino di Primavera ...	373
Darmesteter's (Mme.) Renan ...	418
Davis's (Richard Harding) Cuba in War Time ...	349
Dawson's (William Harbutt) Social Switzerland ...	257
— (S. E.) North America (new ed.) ...	398
De Heredia's (José-Maria) Sonnets ...	520
Deighton's (K.) The Old Dramatists ...	26
De la Motte Fouqué's Undine (new ed.) ...	350
De Manacéine's (Marie) Sleep: Its Physiology, Pathology, Hygiene, and Psychology ...	315
De Quincey, Selections from the Works of ...	374
D'Esterre-Keeling's (Eleonore) The Music of the Poets: a Musician's Birthday Book ...	110
De Vere, Aubrey, Recollections of ...	342
Dickens's (Mamie) My Father as I Recall Him ...	10
Dictionary of National Biography ...	23
Dicke's (Mrs.) translation of Essays of Schopenhauer ...	423
Dirchfield's (P. H.) The Story of our English Towns ...	237
Dixon's (Charles) The Migration of Birds ...	86
— Curtosities of Bird Life ...	321
Dubon's (Anatin) Collected Poems ...	367
Doctor's Iale Hours, A. By "Scalpel" ...	70

	PAGE
Dovaston's (Freeman) Views of London and Views of the Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, West Smithfield ...	218
Dowden's (Edward) History of French Literature ...	293
Drucker's (C. A. A.) translation of Von Ihering's Evolution of the Aryan ...	5
"Dumpy Books for Children" ...	461
Du Poutet's (R. L. A.) edition of Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome ...	146
Dutt's (Romeah C.) England and India ...	324
Dziedkowska's (Kasimir) Journal of Countess Françoise Krasinska ...	298
Eady's (K. M. and R.) The Boys of Huntingley ...	348
Earle's (Mrs. C. W.) Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden ...	90
Eden's (Charles H.) Afloat with Nelson ...	348
Edwardes' (Charles) Dr. Burleigh's Boys ...	482
Eric Book, The (reprint) ...	424
Elizabeth's (Princess) translation of Margaret of Navarre's Mirror of the Sinful Soul ...	28
Escott's (T. H. S.) Social Transformations of the Victorian Age ...	88
Evans's (Sir John) The Ancient Stone Implements, Weapons, and Ornaments of Great Britain ...	217
— (H. A.) English Masques ...	447
Eve's (G. W.) Decorative Heraldry ...	482
Everett-Green's (Mrs.) The Battledown Twins ...	482
— A Clerk of Oxford ...	482
— Tom Tutton's Travels ...	482
Everitt's (Nicholas) Ferrets ...	30
"Ex Libris" Series ...	548
Falklands , By the Author of "The Life of Sir Kenneth Digby" ...	568
"Famous Scots" Series ...	213
Farrow's (G. E.) The Wallpug in London ...	480
Fenn's (Manville) Frank and Saxon ...	483
Field's (Eugene) Lullaby Land ...	523
Findlay's (J. J.) Arnold of Rugby ...	89
Fitch's (Sir Joshua) Thomas and Matthew Arnold ...	517
Fitz-Gerald's (S. J. Adair) Stories of Famous Songs ...	424
Fleming's (J. S.) The Old Ludgings of Stirling ...	130
— (David Hay) Mary, Queen of Scots ...	521
Flower's (Wickham) Aquitaine: a Traveller's Tales ...	523
Fries-Robertson's (Frances) Odd Stories ...	371
Fortescue's (Hon. J. W.) The Story of a Red Deer ...	568
Fowler's (E. H.) The Professor's Children ...	89
— (Rev. J. T.) Life and Letters of the Rev. John Bacchus Dykes ...	548
Fraser's (Dr. Hugh) The Law of Libel and Slander ...	8
Fuller's (Morris) Life, Letters, and Writings of John Daneman, D.D. ...	64
Gadow's (Dr. Hans) In Northern Spain ...	317
Garbett's (Capt. H.) Nava Gunner ...	61

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Gardiner's (Samuel Rawson) What Gunpowder Plot Was ... History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate ...	84
Garnett's (Dr. Richard) The Twilight of the Gods ...	411
Geikie's (Sir Archibald) The Founders of Geology ...	183
Gemmer's (C. M.) Fidelis, and Other Poems ...	397
Gibson, Charles Dana, London as Seen by ...	421
Gibson's (C. D.) People of Dickens ...	523
Gilliat's (E.) In Lincoln Green ...	318
Gisborne's (William) New Zealand Rulers and Statesmen ...	130
Gleig's (Charles) When all Men Starve ...	448
Gomme's (G. Laurence) The Camp of Refuge ...	348
Goodchild's (J. A.) The Book of Tephri ...	161
Gosse's (Edmund) Short History of Modern English Literature ...	302
Gough's (Gen. Sir Hugh) Old Memories ...	70
Graft's (Arturo) Le Danardi ...	564
Graham's (Richard D.) The Masters of Victorian Literature ...	479
Grand's (Sarah) The Beth Book ...	393
Gray's (Esca) The Fairy Stepmother ...	523
Great Tom, Within Sound of; Stories of Modern Oxford ...	371
Grenfell and Hunt's Sayings of Our Lord ...	83
Griffith's Knights of the White Rose ...	432
Griffith's (Major Arthur) Wellington, his Comrades and Contemporaries ...	548
Gurdon's (Lady Camilla) Memories and Fancies ...	323
Guyau's (Marie Jean) The Non-Religion of the Future ...	300
Gwynn's (Dr. John) The Apocalypse of St. John ...	29
Hague's (Dyson) The Church of England Before the Reformation ...	370
Hall's (Edith King) Adventures in Toyland ...	348
Hannay's (David) Short History of the British Navy ...	565
Harnack's (Dr. Adolph) History of Dogma ...	300
Harris's (Joel Chandler) Aaron in the Wilderness ...	490
Hart's (Albert Bushnell) edition of The Era of American Colonization ...	237
Hawes's (Rev. H. R.) Isaels for Girls ...	418
Hayens's (Herbert) Paris at Bay ...	318
Hazlitt's (William G.) The Confessions of a Collector ...	25
Headlam's (Cecil) Selections from the British Satirists ...	524
Hearn's (Lascario) Gleanings in Buddha Fields ...	398
Heckethorn's (Charles William) The Secret Societies of all Ages and Countries ...	238
Hendry's (Hamish) Just Forty Winks ...	318
Silver Bells ...	480
Henley's (W. E.) English Lyrics ...	419
Henley & Henderson's edition of The Poetry of Robert Burns ...	255
Henty's (G. A.) With Moore at Corunna ...	348
A March on London ...	349
Hewitt's (J. Dudley R.) Creation with Development or Evolution ...	164
Higginson's (Thomas Wentworth) The Progression of the Flowers ...	30
Hill's (Dr. George Birkbeck) Letters of Dante Gabriel Rossetti to William Allingham ...	543
Hodgkin's (Thomas) Charles the Great ...	478
Holt's (Robert B.) Whitby Past and Present ...	90
Hope's (Ascott R.) Half-Tax History ...	348
Hopkins's (Albert A.) edition of Magic ...	350
Horsley's (Reginald) Hunted through Fiji ...	349
Howie's (J.) Three Years in Western China ...	347
Howard of Glossop's (Lady) Journal of a Tour through the United States ...	347
Hulme's (F. E.) Familiar Wild Flowers ...	164, 321
Hume's (Martin A. S.) Sir Walter Raleigh ...	233
Humphry's (Mrs.) Manners for Women ...	569
Hutchinson's (Thomas) edition of Wordsworth's Poems in Two Volumes ...	441
(William G.) translation of Renan's Life of Jesus ...	447
Jack's (Adolphus Alfred) Essays on the Novel as Illustrated by Scott and Miss Austen ...	322
Jackson's (A. M.) The Revolutions of a Sprite ...	432
Jakobsen's (Jakob) The Dialect and Place-Names of Shetland ...	423
Jan-tha's (Natalie) translation of Kleczynski's Chopin's Greater Works ...	110
Jeanfreson's (John Cordy) Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson ...	89
Jerra's (C. S.) Florescunt Pasceculas ...	89
Jessop's (Dr. Augustus) John Downe, sometime Dean of St. Paul's ...	474

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
John's (Paul) Saul: a Tragedy; and Other Poems ...	161
Johnson's (R. Brimley) editions of Rand's Lazy Lessons and Lilliput Lectures ...	280
(Henry) The Exploits of Miles Standish ...	323
(Mrs.) edition of Twelve Years of a Soldier's Life ...	524
(Lionel) Ireland, with Other Poems ...	514
Johnston's (Sir Henry H.) British Central Africa ...	144
Johnston and Newbolt's edition of Canon Liddon's Life of Dr. Pusey ...	417
Jones's (Francis) Junior Course of Practical Chemistry ...	218
Keene, Charles, The Work of ...	546
Kelly's (Helen Hogg) The Young Pianist ...	130
Kent's (W. Savile) The Naturalist in Australia ...	107
Kenyon's (F. G.) edition of The Letters of Elizabeth Barrett Browning ...	369
King's Story Book, The ...	462
Kingston's (Alfred) East Anglia and the Great Civil War ...	566
Kleczynski's (Jean) Chopin's Greater Works ...	110
Knight's (William) edition of The Poetical Works of William Wordsworth ...	176
edition of Journals of Dorothy Wordsworth ...	444
Lanciani's (Rodolfo) The Ruins and Excavations of Ancient Rome ...	447
Lang's (Andrew) Modern Mythology and Ghosts ...	193
edition of The Pink Fairy-Book ...	323 edition of The Lady of the Lake (new ed.) ...	350
Lawson's (Henry) While the Billy Boils ...	48
Leask's (W. Keith) James Boswell ...	213
Lee, Mr. Sidney, on Shakespeare ...	23
Le Gallienne's (Richard) If I were God ...	349
Rubbidyt of Omar Khayyam ...	475
Legouis's (Emile) The Early Life of William Wordsworth ...	233
Leighton's (Robert) The Golden Galleon ...	482
Leonard's (John W.) The Gold Fields of Klondike ...	350
Liddon's (Canon) Life of Edward Bouvier Pusey, D.D. ...	417
Lillie's (Arthur) Croquet: its History, Rules, and Secrets ...	110
Little's (W. J. Knox) St. Francis of Assisi ...	318
Logan's (John A.) In Joyful Russia ...	347
London as Seen by Charles Dana Gibson ...	523
Lord's (Walter Frewen) The Lost Empires of the Modern World ...	422
Love Affairs, The, of some Famous Men. By the Author of "How to be Happy though Married" ...	374
Lowe's (Dr. John) The Yew-trees of Great Britain and Ireland ...	66
Lowry's (H. D.) edition of The Happy Erle ...	371
Loyd's (Lady Mary) translation of Wallazewski's Peter the Great ...	67
Lucas's (Edward Verrall) Book of Verses for Children ...	309
the Ameliorator, and the Schoolboy's Apprentice ...	481
Macdonald's (Dr. J. R.) Chronicles of the Parish of Turwood ...	371
Maclean's (Douglas) History of Pembroke College, Oxford ...	128
Macmillan's (Malcolm Kingsley) Dagonet the Jester ...	152
Macray's (William Dunn) Register of the Members of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford ...	180
Macy's (Jesse) The English Constitution: its Nature and Growth ...	163
Madden's (Rt. Hon. D. H.) The Diary of Master William Silence ...	319
Maeterlinck's (Maurice) Aglavaine and Solvete ...	45
Magnus's (Laurie) A Primer of Wordsworth ...	444
Malan's (Rev. A. N.) Solomon Caesar Malan, D.D. ...	447
Manly's (John Matthews) Specimens of the Pre-Shakespearean Drama ...	518
Margaret of Navarre's Mirror of the Sinful Soul ...	28
Maria's (Ben) Brer Mortal ...	350
Marryat's (Capt.) Newton Forster (new ed.) ...	374
Martin's (Mrs. Herbert) Ida from India: a Tale for Girls ...	524
Masterman's (Rev. J. H. B.) The Age of Milton ...	130
Matthews's (J. W.) translation of Legouis's Early Life of William Wordsworth ...	233
Maxwell's (Sir Herbert) Reminiscences of a Huntsman (new ed.) ...	350
McCarthy's (Justin H.) The French Revolution ...	398

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
McClure's (Edmund) Historical Church Atlas ...	534
McIntook's (R.) translation of Goethe's Faust ...	68
Meadowcroft's (William H.) The A B C of the X Rays ...	218
Meredith's (George) Selected Poems ...	253
The Ordeal of Richard Feverel (new ed.) ...	350
Sandra ...	421
(rep.) ...	391
Meynell's (Alice) The Flower of the Mind ...	391
Miall's (L. C.) Thirty Years of Teaching ...	89
Michaelis & Passy's Dictionnaire Phonétique de la Langue Française ...	238
Mitchell's (Donald G.) American Lands and Letters ...	546
Molesworth's (Mrs.) Stories for Children ...	348
Miss Mouse and Her Boys ...	483
Moorat's (J. S.) A Country Garland of Ten Songs gathered from the Herperides of Robert Herrick ...	523
Moore's (Thomas) Memoirs of Lord Edward Fitz-Gerald ...	70
Poetical Works (rep.) ...	424
Monrman's (F. W.) edition of Fletcher's The Faithful Shepherdess ...	398
Morley's (John) Machiavelli ...	63
(Charles) Studies in the Board Schools ...	370
Morris's (William O'Connor) Hansibai of the Wondrous Isles ...	312
Moulton & Goden's Concordance to the Greek Testament ...	180
Muddock's (J. E.) edition of The Savage Club Papers ...	373
Muir's (M. M. Pattison) The Story of the Chemical Elements ...	218
Mundell's (Frank) The Story of Edison ...	481
Munro's (Kirk) With Crockett and Bowie ...	443
Murray's (David Christie) My Contemporaries in Fiction ...	191
Napier's (George G.) The Homes and Haunts of Sir Walter Scott ...	418
Newbolt's (Henry) Admirals All ...	340
Newdigate-Newdigate's (Lady) Gossip from a Manicure Room (Anne and Mary Filton) ...	311
Nichols's (Prof. Edward L.) The Outlines of Physics ...	70
of Physics ...	70
Nordlinger's (Ulrich) translation of A Memoir of Gabriele von Biondo ...	28
Norman's (Philip) London Signs and Inscriptions ...	270
Norway's (A. H.) In the West Country ...	547
Novels Redressed ...	374
Nutt's (Alfred) The Celtic Doctrine of Re-birth ...	374
Odgers's (W. Blake) Outline of the Law of Libel ...	8
Ogle's (John J.) The Free Library: its History and Present Condition ...	163
Oliphant's (Mrs.) Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign ...	6
Annals of a Publishing House: Blackwood ...	295
Makers of Modern Rome (new ed.) ...	350
Omond's (G. W. T.) Early History of the Scottish Union Question ...	40
Optimism, and Other Poems . By M. R. S. ...	161
O'Sullivan's (Vincent) The Houses of Sin ...	608
Oxford Debate on the Textual Criticism of the New Testament ...	164
Modern, Stories of ...	371
Oxley's (J. Macdonald) In the Swing of the Sea ...	348
Paine, Timothy Otis, Selections from the Poems of ...	161
Palgrave's (Francis T.) Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics ...	317
Parish's (Edmund) Hallucinations and Illusions ...	125
Parry's (Judge) The First Book of Krab ...	481
Payen-Payne's (De V.) Memoirs of Bertrand Barere ...	106
Peery's (W.) The Gist of Japan ...	317
Pendred's (Mary L.) Three Come's Maids and their Affairs ...	482
Pengelly's (Heater) Memoir of William Pengelly, of Torquay ...	323
Penn's (Rachel) Cherrywink: A Fairy Story ...	481
Pennell & Chesson's The Work of Charles Keene ...	516
Perkins's (James Breck) France under Louis XV. ...	350
Peters's (Rev. John Punnett) Nippur ...	195
Pickard's (Samuel T.) edition of Hawthorne's First Diary ...	374
Pickering's (Edgar) A Stout English Bowman ...	318
Podmore's (Frank) Studies in Psychological Research ...	445
Pollock's (Wilfred) War and a Wheel ...	48

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Posterity ...	217
Prestor's (Alfred) edition of The Letters of Cicero to Atticus ...	180
Print Gallery, The . Vol. I. ...	569
Quarto, The ...	533
Queen, The, Private Life of ...	29
Raleigh's (Walter) Style ...	404
Rampini's (Dr. Charles) Moray and Nairn ...	20
Ramsay's (Mrs. W. M.) Everyday Life in Turkey ...	560
(Andrew Michael) History of the Life of Finsdon ...	277
Randa's (W. B.) Lazy Lessons and Essays on Conduct ...	230
Lilliput Lectures ...	280
Ranjitsinhji's (K. S.) The Jubilee Book of Cricket ...	175
Read's (General Meredith) Historic Studies in Fand, Berne, and Savoy ...	30
Reynolds's (Dr. E. S.) Hygiene for Beginners ...	218
Ribblesdale's (Lord) The Queen's Hounds and Stag Hunting Recollections ...	570
Ribot's (Th.) The Psychology of the Emotions ...	106
Richardson's (Oliver H.) The National Movement in the Reign of Henry III., and its Culmination in the Barons' War ...	145
Robertson's (John Mackinnon) New Essays towards a Critical Method ...	235
(C. Grant) Voices Academic ...	545
Robinson's (Frederick S.) The Connoisseur ...	147
(Rev. Charles H.) Mohammedanism ...	164
(Dr. Louis) Wild Traits in Time Animals ...	519
Rolfe's (Dr. William James) Shakespeare, the Boy ...	218
Roose's (Dr. Robson) Waste and Repair in Modern Life ...	180
Rose's (W. K.) With the Greeks in Thessaly ...	179
Rouse's (W. H. D.) The Giant Crab, and Other Tales from Old India ...	482
Rowell's (Mary C.) France ...	397
Russell's (T. O.) Beauties and Antiquities of Ireland ...	10
Rye's (Walter) Norfolk Songs, Stories and Sayings ...	90
Sabatier's (Auguste) Outlines of a Philosophy of Religion ...	300
Sandeman's (Mina) The Worship of Lucifer ...	163
Scarlet Letter, The (reprint) ...	424
Schopenhauer's Essays ...	423
Schulz & Hammer's The New Africa: a Journey up the Chobe, &amp;c. ...	218
Scott's (Temple) Bibliography of the Works of William Morris ...	30
(Sir Walter) Waverley: "Temple Edition" ...	303
The Bride of Lammermoor (new edition) ...	380
Scripture's (Dr. E. W.) The New Psychology ...	308
Sergeant's (Lewis) Greece in the Nineteenth Century ...	323
Sharp's (Evelyn) All the Way to Fairyland ...	512
Shepherd's (J. A.) Zig-Zag Fables ...	481
Shorter's (Clement A.) Victorian Literature ...	397
Sichel's (Edith) The Household of the Lafayette ...	298
Sigerson's (Dr. George) Bards of the Gael and Gall ...	143
(Dora) The Fairy Change-lings, with Other Poems ...	446
Smith's (Edward) Handy Guide to England and Wales ...	70
(G. C. Moore) edition of Edward the Third ...	147
(G. Gregory) edition of The Spectator ...	300
Smyth's (Newman) The Place of Death in Evolution ...	84
Sommerville's (Maxwell) Siam on the Meinam ...	70
Stair's (Rev. John B.) Old Samoa ...	374
Stanford's Compendium of Geography and Travel ...	398
Stead's (W. T.) Real Ghost Stories ...	445
Stedman's (Edmund Clarence) Poems, Now First Collected ...	448
Sterne's Sentimental Journey (rep.) ...	424
Stewart's (Aubrey) English Epigrams and Epitaphs ...	258
Stillman's (W. J.) Billy and Hans ...	30
St. Leger's (Hugh) The Koper's Quest ...	343
Stock's (St. G.) edition of Lectures in the Lyceum; or, Aristotle's Ethics for English Readers ...	66
Stockard's (Henry Jerome) Fugitive Lines ...	161
Stubbs's (Charles William, D.D.) Historical Memoirs of St. Catharine ...	105
Sturmer's (Herbert H.) The Councils of William de Britane ...	147
Sully's (Prof. James) Children's Ways ...	128

REVIEWS—continued.	PAGE
Sauro's (Alfred), translation of Maeterlinck's Aglaia and Selysette .....	46
Swithaine's (Swithin Saint) A Diver of the Dales .....	161
Sykes's (Frank W.) With Plumer in Malabaleland .....	25
Symons's (Arthur) Selects from the Poems of Mathilde Blind .....	597
Syrett's (Netta) The Garden of Delight .....	461
Literatures .....	236
Tadema's (Laurence Alma) Realms of Unknown Kings .....	518
Taine's (H. A.) Journeys through France .....	214
Tarver's (John Charles) Some Observations of a Foster-parent .....	47
Taylor's (E. R.) translation of Sonnets of José-Maria de Heredia .....	520
Tea-Zoom, Meditations in the By "M.P." .....	518
"Temple Classics" .....	374
"Temple Dramatists" .....	147
Temple's (A. G.) The Art of Painting in the Queen's Reign .....	523
Tennyson's (Lord) Alfred, Lord Tennyson .....	375
Testament, New, Illustrated .....	418
Thackeray's (W. M.) The Newcomes (new ed.) .....	350
Thirlmere's (R.) Idylls of Spain .....	317
Thomas's (Rev. J. L.) Journeys among the Gentle Japs .....	60
Thiele's (Dr. C. P.) Elements of the Science of Religion .....	393
Tomlinson's (W. W.) Life in Northumberland during the XVIIth Century .....	424
Townshend's (Dorothea) Life and Letters of Mr. Benjamin Porter .....	318
Traice's (Elizabeth C.) Wee Doggie .....	493
Trall's (H. D.) Social England .....	100
The New Fiction, and other Essays on Literary Subjects .....	108
Travel Books .....	317
Trameneere's (F. H. A.) The Lesbian of Catullus .....	517
"Tudor Translation Series" .....	44
Turner's (Ethel S.) Miss Bobbie .....	521
Twain's (Mark) More Tramps Abroad .....	519
Tweedie's (Mrs. Alec) Through Finland in Caris .....	68
Tyler's (Dr. Charles Mellen) Bases of Religious Belief .....	300
(Moses Colt) The Literary History of the American Revolution .....	513
Vallance's (Aymer) William Morris, His Art, His Writings, and His Public Life .....	391
Vincent's (Arthur) edition of Lives of Twelve Bad Women .....	21
(Vin) Olga .....	523
Vivian's (Herbert) Servis, the Poor Man's Paradise .....	518
Vizetelly's (Edward) The Reminiscences of a Bash-Basouk .....	424
Von Bülow, Gabriele: a Memoir .....	28
Von Ihering's (Rudolph) The Evolution of the Argan .....	5
Wallisewski's (K.) Peter the Great .....	67
Walker's (Hugh) The Age of Tennyson .....	398
Walpole's (F. Goulburn) Short History of the Catholic Church .....	421
Ward's Shakespearean Guide to Stratford-on-Avon .....	218
(Wilfrid) The Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman .....	563
Warren's (C. F. S.) The Dies Ira and its English Versions .....	128
Watson's (E. H. Lacon) An Attic in Bohemia .....	371
(William) The Hope of the World, and Other Poems .....	541
Weare's (S. E.) Cabot's Discovery of North America .....	7
Webb's (W. T.) edition of Macaulay's Lays (rep.) .....	424
Wells's (J.) Oxford and its Colleges .....	85
(H. G.) Certain Personal Matters .....	371
Wellwood's (John) Norman Macleod .....	27
West's (A. S.) edition of Bacon's Essays .....	148
Westbury's (Altha) Australian Fairy Tales .....	373
Weston's (Jessie L.) The Legend of Sir Gawain .....	447
Westover's (Cynthia M.) Bushy .....	348
Wheatley's (Henry B.) Historical Portraits .....	397
Wheeler's (Stephen) Letters and Unpublished Writings of Landor .....	413
Whibley's (Charles) Studies in Frankness .....	442
Whishaw's White Witch of the Malabale .....	482
Gubbins Minor, and Some other Follies .....	524
The Adventures of a Stow-away .....	524
Whistler's (O. W.) King Olaf's Kinsman .....	318
White's (Gleeson) English Illustrations in the Sixties .....	9

REVIEWS—continued.	PAGE
White's (W. Hale) edition of A Description of the Wordsworth and Coleridge MSS. in the possession of Mr. T. Norton Longman .....	43
Whitings's (Richard) The Island .....	198
Whymper's (Edward) Guide to Chamouni and Mont Blanc .....	110
Guide to Zermatt .....	215
Wilberforce's (A. M.) edition of Private Papers of William Wilberforce .....	346
Wilkins's (Dr. C. A.) Spanish Protestants in the Sixteenth Century .....	137
Williams's (Ernest Edwin) The Foreigner in the Farmyard .....	129
Willson's (Beckles) The Tenth Island .....	373
Wordsworth's (Christopher) edition of Bradshaw's Statutes of Lincoln Cathedral .....	324
(William) Poems in Two Volumes .....	444
Wright & Coates's Olden-Bird: Scenes from Bird-life .....	267
Wright's (David) The Power of an Endless Life, and other Sermons .....	278
(Prof. Joseph) The English Dialect Dictionary .....	545
Zimmerman's (Alice) Old Tales from Greece .....	238

ORIGINAL POETRY.

"Forget Me, Death!—O Death, Forget Me Not!" .....	448
---	-----

FICTION.

Adderley's (James) Paul Mercer (Supp., Dec. 4) .....	118
Adventures, The Novel of (Supp., Nov. 6) .....	102
Ainslie's (Noel) Among Thorns (Supp., Dec. 25) .....	130
Alden's (W. L.) His Daughter (Supp., July 24) .....	38
Allen's (James Lane) The Choir Invisible (Supp., July 3) .....	25
(Grant) An African Millionaire (Supp., July 3) .....	25
Allingham's (Francis) Crooked Paths (Supp., July 17) .....	34
Anderson's (Mary) Tales of the Rock (Supp., Sept. 18) .....	71
Anne's (Mrs. Charlton) A Woman of Moods (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	61
Bain's (R. Nibbet) translation of Jókai's Pretty Michal (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	65
Balfour's (Andrew) By Stroke of Sword (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	54
(M. C.) The Fall of the Sparrow (Supp., Nov. 27) .....	115
Baring-Gould's (S.) Perpetua (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	79
Barlow's (Jane) A Creel of Irish Stories (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	123
Barr's (Robert) The Mutable Many (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	45
Bellamy's (Edward) Equality (Supp., July 10) .....	29
Blackmore's (B. D.) Daniel (Supp., Dec. 4) .....	117
Boothby's (Guy) The Fascination of the King (Supp., Aug. 14) .....	50
Braddon, Miss, at Work (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	63
Bradshaw's (Mrs. Albert) False Gods (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	46
Bullock's (Shan F.) The Charming (Supp., Oct. 8) .....	84
Burgin's (G. B.) "Old Man's" Marriage (Supp., July 17) .....	35
Fortune's Footballs (Supp., Sept. 18) .....	71
Burnett's (Frances Hodgson) His Grace of Osmonde (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	123
Caine's (Hall) The Christian (Supp., Aug. 14) .....	49
Cassidy's (James) The Gift of Life (Supp., July 10) .....	31
Chaytor's (H. J.) The Light of the Eye (Supp., July 3) .....	26
Coleridge's (M. E.) The King with Two Faces (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	120
Crawford's (J. H.) A Girl's Awakening (Supp., Oct. 9) .....	85
(F. Marion) Corleone (Supp., Nov. 30) .....	110
Cresswell's (Henry) Without Issue (Supp., July 17) .....	36
Cuthell's (Edith E.) In Camp and Cantonment: Stories of Foreign Service (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	57

FICTION—continued.	PAGE
D'Annunzio's (Gabrielle) Le Songe d'une Matinée de Printemps (Supp., July 24) .....	40
Dawson's (A. J.) Mere Sentiment (Supp., July 17) .....	36
De la Pasture's (Mrs. Henry) Deborah of Tod's (Supp., Dec. 25) .....	130
De Spoelbergh de Lovenjoul's (Vicomte) Autour de Honoré de Balzac (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	46
Diddin's (James C.) Scottish Border Life (Supp., Sept. 18) .....	71
Du Maurier's (George) The Martian (Supp., Sept. 18) .....	69
Fiction, An Old "Property" of: "The Bull, the Girl, and the Red Shawl," (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	55
A Note on (Supp., Nov. 27) .....	144
The Newest: a Guide for Novel Readers—
Supp., Sept. 18, 69; Sept. 25, 73; Oct. 2, 77; Oct. 9, 83; Oct. 16, 87; Oct. 23, 91; Oct. 30, 97; Nov. 6, 101; Nov. 13, 105; Nov. 20, 109; Nov. 27, 113; Dec. 4, 117; Dec. 11, 121; Dec. 18, 125; Dec. 25, 129.
Findlater's (Mary) Over the Hills (Supp., Nov. 30) .....	111
(Jane Helen) A Daughter of Strife (Supp., Dec. 4) .....	118
Fletcher's (J. S.) The Builders (Supp., Nov. 13) .....	106
Forbes's (Hon. Mrs. Walter R. D.) Blight (Supp., Oct. 9) .....	85
Fox's (John, Jun.) The Kentuckians (Supp., Dec. 25) .....	129
Frenchman, The, in English Fiction (Supp., July 24) .....	37
Fyfe's (H. Hamilton) A Trick of Fame (Supp., July 17) .....	35
Gallon's (Tom) A Prince of Mischance (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	123
Gaunt's (Mary) Kirkham's Find (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	61
Gerard's (E.) An Electric Shock, and other Stories (Supp., July 17) .....	83
Gilchrist's (R. Murray) A Peakland Faggot (Supp., July 10) .....	31
Gissing's (George) Human Odds and Ends (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	125
Gorst's (Mrs. Harold E.) Possessed of Denis (Supp., July 24) .....	37
Grey's (Rowland) The Craftsman (Supp., July 8) .....	37
Griffith's (George) The Romance of Golden Star (Supp., July 3) .....	26
Hannan's (Charles) The Captive of Pekin (Supp., Sept. 25) .....	75
Harte's (Bret) Three Partners (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	78
Higgin's (L.) Cousin Jem (Supp., July 10) .....	31
Higginson's (Ella) From the Land of the Snow Pearls (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	57
Hollis's (Margery) Stapleton's Luck (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	62
Holmes, Sherlock: A Belated Criticism (Supp., July 31) .....	43
Hume's (Fergus) The Tombstone Treasure (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	54
Hungerford's (Mrs.) The Coming of Chloë (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	66
Hunt's (Violet) Unkind, Unkind (Supp., Oct. 23) .....	91
Hynes's (Outcliffe) The "Paradise" Coal-boat (Supp., Sept. 25) .....	76
Jacobs's (W. W.) The Skipper's Wooing (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	79
James's (Henry) What Maisie Knew (Supp., Oct. 16) .....	89
Jerome's (Jerome K.) Sketches in Lavender, Blue, and Green (Supp., July 10) .....	31
Jókai, Maurus, At Home (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	66
Jókai's (Maurus) Pretty Michal (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	65
Keith's (Leah) My Bonnie Lady (Supp., July 17) .....	34
(Supp., Aug. 28) .....	57
Kennedy's (Bart) Darab's Wine Cup, and Other Tales (Supp., July 3) .....	28
King's (K. Douglas) Father Hilarion (Supp., July 10) .....	29
Kipling's (Rudyard) Captains Courageous (Supp., Oct. 30) .....	98
Lasowak's (Mme. de) An Electric Shock, and Other Stories (Supp., July 17) .....	33
Le Breton's (John) Miss Tudor (Supp., July 24) .....	39
Le Queux's (William) The Eye of Istar (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	55
Letter, An Intercepted (Supp., Sept. 25) .....	73
Levet-Yeats's (S.) The Chevalier d'Avriac (Supp., July 31) .....	41
Lindsay's (Harry) Methodist Idylls (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	80
"Little Novels" (Supp., July 24) .....	38
Louis's (A. B.) Mallerton (Supp., July 10) .....	81
MacIlwaine's (Herbert C.) The Twilight Reef (Supp., Oct. 18) .....	89

FICTION—continued.	PAGE
Marchmont's (Arthur N.) By Right of Sword (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	127
Marah's (Richard) The Crime and the Criminal (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	79
The Beetle: a Mystery (Supp., Oct. 30) .....	90
The Duke and the Damsel (Supp., Nov. 27) .....	115
Mason's (A. E. W.) Laurence Clavering (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	127
Mathew's (Frank) A Child in the Temple (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	80
Maugham's (William Somerset) Liza of Lambeth (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	65
Mayo's (Isabella Fyvie) A Daughter of the Klephts (Supp., July 24) .....	39
Meade's (Mrs. L. T.) The Way of a Woman (Supp., July 31) .....	43
Meredith (Mr.) The Novels of (Supp., Aug. 14) .....	50
Merrick's (Leonard) One Man's View (Supp., July 17) .....	36
Merriman's (Henry Seton) In Kedar's Tent (Supp., Oct. 23) .....	93
Mitchell's (S. Wier) Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker (Supp., Oct. 23) .....	93
Montréor's (F. F.) At the Cross Roads (Supp., Nov. 13) .....	106
Morrison's (Arthur) The Dorrington Deed Box (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	127
Myrtle's (William) The Plagiariet (Supp., Oct. 9) .....	85
Nicholson's (Claud) The Joy of My Youth (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	123
Norris's (W. E.) Marietta's Marriage (Supp., Nov. 27) .....	115
Norwegian Novelist, A (Supp., Nov. 20) .....	110
Oscar's (Alan) Captain Kid's Millions (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	46
Ouida's (An) Altruist (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	53
Pain's (Barry) The Octave of Claudius (Supp., Aug. 21) .....	53
Parker's (Gilbert) The Pomp of the Lavilletes (Supp., Oct. 23) .....	94
Phillips's (F. C.) Poor Little Bella (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	122
Play, the Story of a (Supp., July 24) .....	40
Præd's (Mrs. Campbell) Niema (Supp., July 24) .....	40
Prescott's (E. Livingston) The Bp's Redemption (Supp., Nov. 20) .....	111
Prior's (James) Ripple and Flood (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	46
Pryce's (Richard) Elementary Jane (Supp., July 24) .....	38
Pryde's (Dr. David) The Queer Folk of Fife (Supp., July 24) .....	40
Raine's (Allen) A Welsh Singer (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	62
Riddell's (Mrs. J. H.) A Rich Man's Daughter (Supp., Aug. 7) .....	45
Ridge's (W. Pett) Secretary to Bayne, M.P. (Supp., Dec. 4) .....	118
Rita's Good Mrs. Hypocrite (Supp., Sept. 11) .....	66
Roberts's (Morley) The Adventure of the Broad Arrow (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	81
(Charles G. D.) The Forge in the Forest (Supp., Dec. 18) .....	127
Roes & Somerville's The Silver Fox (Supp., Dec. 25) .....	129
Russell's (W. Clark) A Noble Haul (Supp., July 24) .....	33
Sanders's (E. K.) For Prince and People (Supp., Dec. 11) .....	123
Seymour's (Gordon) The Rudeness of the Honourable Mr. Leatherhead (Supp., July 31) .....	42
Sharer's (Balsbeck) One Heart One Way (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	63
Sharp's (Evelyn) The Making of a Prig (Supp., Nov. 20) .....	111
Sherer's (J. W.) A Princess of Islam (Supp., July 24) .....	38
Sinjohn's (John) From the Four Winds (Supp., July 17) .....	35
Stead, Mr., on Mark Twain (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	58
Stevenson's (Robert Louis) St. Ives (Supp., Oct. 16) .....	89
Sturge's (M. Cartia) The Time Spell of Chateau d'Arpon (Supp., Dec. 25) .....	130
Swift's (Benjamin) The Tormentor (Supp., Oct. 23) .....	94
Syrett's (Netta) The Tree of Life (Supp., Nov. 20) .....	111
Tarbet's (W. G.) Il-Gotten Gold (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	58
Tench's (Mary F. A.) Where the Surf Breaks (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	58
Tracy's (Louis) An American Emperor (Supp., Sept. 4) .....	61
Troubridge's (Lady) Paul's Step-mother, and One Other Story (Supp., July 24) .....	33
Twain, Mark, Mr. Stead on (Supp., Aug. 28) .....	58
Upward's (Allen) God Save the Queen: a Tale of '37 (Supp., July 3) .....	27
(Supp., Aug. 14) .....	50
A Bride's Madness (Supp., Oct. 2) .....	78

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Voynich's (E. L.) The Gadfly (Supp., Sept. 25) .....	74
Walford's (L. B.) Iva Kildare: a Matrimonial Problem (Supp., Nov. 13) .....	107
Warden's (Florence) The Girls at the Grange (Supp., July 3) .....	27
Wilkins's (Mary E.) Jerome (Supp., Oct. 30) .....	99
Wodzinski's (Comte à) Le Journal de Liliane (Supp., July 17) .....	33

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Allen's (J. Lane) The Choir Invisible .....	118
Bellamy's (Mr.) Equality .....	170
Bridges's (J. H.) edition of The "Opus Magnus" of Roger Bacon .....	332
Caine's (Hall) The Christian .....	207
Crackanthorpe's (Hubert) Last Studies .....	503
Crawford's (Marion) A Rose of Yesterday .....	139
Crockett's (S. R.) Lochnivar .....	504
Deland's (Margaret) The Wisdom of Poets .....	393
Du Maurier's (George) The Martian .....	170
Gardiner's (Dr.) Cromwell's Place in History .....	247
Gosse's (Edmund) Short History of Modern English Literature .....	118
Grand's (Sarah) The Beth Book .....	504
Henley & Henderson's The Poetry of Robert Burns .....	458
Hichens's (Robert) Byways .....	288
Jacobs's (W. W.) The Skipper's Wooing .....	535
James's (Henry) What Maie Knew .....	343
Kenyon's (Frederic G.) edition of Mrs. Browning's Letters .....	332
Kipling's (Rudyard) Captains Courageous .....	382
Knight's (William) edition of The Poetical Works of William Wordsworth .....	359
Liddon's (Canon) Life of Dr. Pusey, D.D. .....	266
Mason's (A. E. W.) Lawrence Clavering .....	382
Meredith's (George) Selected Poems .....	590
Merriman's (Henry Seton) In Kedar's Tent .....	332
Morley (John) Machiavelli .....	350
Morris's (William) The Water of the Wondrous Isles .....	70
Müller's (Max) Contributions to the Science of Mythology .....	434
Murray's (David Christie) My Contemporaries in Fiction .....	139
Newbolt's (Henry) Admirals All, and Other Verses .....	307
Oliphant's (Mrs.) The Ways of Life .....	534
Parker's (Gilbert) The Pomp of the Lavettes .....	10
Raleigh's (Walter) Style .....	359
Rodd's (Rennell) Ballads of the Fleet .....	433
Russell & Standing's Ibsen on his Merits .....	590
Sinclair's (May) Audrey Craven .....	171
Stephens's (Riccardo) Mr. Peters .....	139
Stevenson's (Robert Louis) St. Ives .....	118
Stoker's (Bram) Dracula .....	307
Swift's (Benjamin) The Tormentor .....	98
Taine's (M.) Journeys through France .....	458
Thompson's (Francis) New Poems .....	266
Traill's (H. D.) The New Fiction, and Other Essays .....	38
Twain's (Mark) More Tramps Abroad .....	206
Watte-Dunton's (Theodore) The Coming of Love, and Other Poems .....	590
Wells's (H. G.) The Plattner Story .....	434
Wells's (H. G.) The Invisible Man .....	79
Wilkins's (Mary E.) Jerome .....	247
Wilkins's (Mary E.) Jerome .....	459

ARTICLES.

1897: A Retrospect .....	488
Academy of Letters, Suggested .....	376, 401, 431, 488
—, The French .....	497, 554
Authors and a Publisher .....	94
Biography, Proper .....	240
Bookmen of Yesterday .....	523
Books, New, Chronicle of 11, 81, 81, 71, 91, 111, 181, 149, 166, 181, 201, 123 .....	546
—, Armchair .....	152, 183, 198
Bookselling and Bookbuying .....	629
Brown (Rev. T. E.): a Eulogy .....	377, 404
Clough and his Defender .....	260
Crackanthorpe, Hubert .....	428
Criticism, Excursions in: .....
Don Quixote .....	220
Clarence Mangan .....	241
The "Nibelungen Lied" .....	302
The Withheld Poems of Tennyson .....	326

ARTICLES—continued.

Criticism, Excursions in: .....
Some Pamphlets .....	354
Crashaw .....	427
—, American and English .....	461
Daudet, Alphonse .....	574
Educational Articles: .....
Florent Ambo! .....	199
Home Work in the Day School .....	200
Epitaphs, A Bundle of .....	74
France, Anatole .....	33
Hampstead, Literary .....	166
Heine, Centenary of the Birth of .....	563, 576
Hutton, Richard Holt .....	221
Ingelow, Jean .....	74, 94
Jubilation ( Sixty Years of Empire ) .....	529
Latin Verses, The Case for .....	462
Lee, Mr. Sidney, A Talk with .....	50
London, The, of the Writers .....	114
The Spectator's London .....	353
Society of Arts' Memorial Tablets .....	406
Maeterlinck, Maurice .....	113
Mottoes of the Illustrious .....	54
Narrow Seas, A Poet of the .....	94
National Dictionary of Biography, The .....	50
"O Fons Bandusie!" .....	136
Oliphant, Mrs. .....	15
Paris Letters 14, 54, 95, 133, 187, 203, 242, 283, 327, 378, 462, 528 .....
People, The, What they Read: .....
A Solicitor .....	283
A Waitress .....	303
A Novelist .....	327
A Bookstall Keeper .....	378
An Omnibus Driver .....	429
A Publisher .....	498
A Railway Porter .....	577
Poet, Provençal, A .....	261
Printers' Errors .....	429
Queen's English, The .....	499
Raleigh, Mr. Walter, on Style .....	404
Reputations, Some Younger: .....
Yeats, Mr. W. B. .....	498
Hinkson, Mrs. .....	527
Le Gallienne, Mr. Richard .....	527
Ridge, Mr. Pett .....	527
Raleigh, Mr. Walter .....	552
Marriott-Watson, Mr. H. B. .....	563
Reputations Reconsidered: .....
Eliot, George .....	551, 573
Daudet, Alphonse .....	222
Research, Wanted, A Philanthropist for .....	496
Retrospect, A: 1897 .....	203
Romance, The Apologetics of .....	161
Satire, A Famous .....	483
Shakespeare as a Londoner .....	75
"Shirley" .....	135
Swift, Some Letters of .....	135
Tennyson as a Dramatist .....	134
Whitman, An Old Parody on .....	50

"ACADEMY" PORTRAITS.

Bacon, Francis .....	53
Jerrold, Douglas .....	34
Pope, Alexander .....	13

OBITUARY.

Brown, Rev. T. E. .....	377, 414
Daudet, Alphonse .....	574
Emikien, Frau Charlotte .....	549
Gilbert, Sir John .....	281
Han'ing, Mrs. Janet .....	549
Hutton, Richard Holt .....	221
Ingelow, Jean .....	74, 94
Maitland, Edward .....	301
Milliken, Edwin James .....	182
Newman, Prof. Francis .....	281
Nusey, Ellen .....	495
Oliphant, Mrs. .....	15
Palgrave, Francis Turner .....	353
Skelton, Sir John .....	76
Teck, Duchess of .....	351
Thayer, Alexander Wheelock .....	117

CORRESPONDENCE.

Academy of Letters, Proposed 401, 425, 431, 449, 456, 557 .....
Ausonius .....	558, 579
Borlase, Mr., on Irish Archaeology 139, 155, 157 .....
Clough, Arthur Hugh .....	331
Coins, Discovery of .....	267
Critics, French .....	503
Crozier's (John Beattie) History of Intellectual Development .....	28

CORRESPONDENCE—continued.

Discount on Books .....	78
Emerson, Ralph Waldo: A Neglected Poet .....	533
Fitzgerald's (S. J. Adair) Stories of Famous Songs .....	457
Frenchman in English Fiction, The .....	98
Henley's (Mr.) Anthology .....	456
Herrick and Martial .....	139, 155
Island, The, The Author of .....	226
Irish Texts, Chronology of .....	223, 247
Leopardi MSS., Inedited .....	456
Linton, Mr., and D. G. Rossetti .....	228
Marsh's (Richard) The Duke and the Damsel .....	358
Mary Queen of Scots .....	579
Maugham's Liza of Lambeth .....	247
Mayo's (Mrs.) A Daughter of the Kephis .....	98
Norman's (Philip) London Signs and Inscriptions .....	307, 358
Nutt, Mr., and the Author .....	578
Omar Khayyām .....	331
Pamela Fitzgerald .....	98
Persian Rose-leaves .....	457
Phillips's (Stephen) New Poems .....	534
Poetic Coincidence, A .....	457, 503
Prizes for Authors .....	534
Queen's English, The .....	533
Raffles, Sir Stamford .....	59
Rossetti, D. G., and Mr. Linton .....	226
Scott, Sir W., Date of the Death of .....	247
Shakespeare Cryptogram, A New .....	579
Shakespeare's Sonnets 98, 117, 138, 155, 207 .....
Society of Arts' Memorial Tablets .....	433, 456
Spanish Protestants .....	155
Spencer, Mr. Herbert, on Bookbuying .....	558
Stillman's (W. J.) Billy and Hans .....	79
Tennyson and Wordsworth .....	331
Translation, An Unauthorised .....	307
Vandalism, Threatened, at Hampstead .....	503
Watson's (Mr.) Poetry .....	579
"W. H. Mr." and the Dictionary of National Biography .....	78

THE BOOK MARKET.

Agreement, A Faulty .....	531
America, Books read in .....	77, 53
American Publishing .....	285
Ashburnham Library, Sale of the .....	17, 35
Austen, Jane, The Novels of .....	98
Autographs, A Chat about .....	406
Birmingham, Old Books in .....	137
Bohn Libraries, The .....	63
Book Sales and Reports .....	16
—, The, and the Village .....	329
—, Hunger in the East-End .....	430
Bookshops, The .....	244, 284
Books, Improbable .....	188
—, that are Selling .....	304
—, I did not Buy .....	500
—, Comfort , A Successful Magazine .....	303
Cricket Books .....	115
Dickens and Thackeray .....	454
Discount Question, The .....	55, 244, 530
Eliot's (George) Novels .....	556
Guildhall, Library, Talk with the Librarian of the .....	35
"In Reply" .....	148
Library for Journalists, A .....	76
Literary Cross-Section, A .....	555
Million Copies a Month, A .....	303
Publishing Season, The .....	431
"Reminders" .....	184
Village Reading Rooms .....	284
—, The, and the Book .....	329
Waverley Novels, The Sale of the .....	379

NOTES AND NEWS.

Academy of Letters, Proposed, French .....	523
Aerolites, Letter bearing on the Question of .....	525
Albeniz's Opera, "Popita Jimenez" .....	52
Allen, Mr. James Lane, and his Work .....	282
American Actors, Invasion of London by .....	150
Amitié Amoureuse , Authorship of .....	375, 400
Anstey's (Mr.) Tinted Venus .....	326
Arab Horses, Sale of, at Crabbet Park .....	92
Atlantic Monthly , Starting of the .....	302
Balfour, Mr., on Burns .....	165
—, on the Novel .....	571
Bangs, Mr. John Kendrick, on Critics .....	220
Barrie's (Mr.) Sojourn at Nottingham .....	220
Bath, Famous People who have stopped at .....	53
Baumer's (Lewis) Jumbies .....	449
Birrell's (Mr.) Indictment against the Press .....	93
Bookbinding, Artistic, by Women, Exhibition of .....	451

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

Book-hunters, The Providence that Watches over .....	93
Books for Boys, The Best Twenty .....	550
Bridges, Mr. Robert, Eulogy on .....	425
British Museum Reading Room, Visitors to .....	259
—, Effect of Fog at the .....	399
Brooke, Mr. Stopford, Elegiac Stanzas by .....	375
Browning's (Elizabeth Barrett) Birth-place .....	201
Christ, Portraits of .....	550
Coleridge's Raven , Reprint of .....	571
Coptic Psalter found in Upper Egypt .....	183
Corbet's (Miss Sybil) Animal Land .....	325
Craigputtock, Information from .....	132
Crockett's (Mr. R. S.) Physique and Capabilities .....	202
Cruikshank Fairy Book , The .....	571
De Maupassant, Guy, Proposed Monument to .....	351
Discount Question, The .....	494
Doctors, Tenacity of Purpose displayed by .....	463
Du Maurier's (George) The Martian .....	13
Dusting Books, The Habit of .....	13
Edinburgh Printers' Strike .....	399
English Books printed in America .....	301
Epigram: "This World is a City full of Streets" .....	326, 352
Figuier's (Maso) A Florentine Picture Chronicle .....	52
Fitzgerald's Translation of Omar Khayyām .....	449
French Literature, Attempt to Elevate .....	302
Gilbert, Sir John .....	281
Gordon, Adam Lindsay, The Temple Bar , on .....	259
Gordon Highlanders, Charge of the, at Dargai .....	352
Gosse, Mr. Edmund, on the Literary History of the last Ten Years in England .....	150
Grand, Sarah, on the Proposed Academy of Letters .....	440
"Gyp's" Novels .....	250
Hay's (Col. John) "Jim Bludso," Parody on .....	73
Higginson's (Colonel) Stories .....	525
Henley, Mr., A Brief Account of .....	219
—, English Lyrics .....	375
—, Prologue to Admiral Guinea .....	494
—, "In Memoriam, T. E. B." .....	525
Hope, Mr. Anthony, and The Philistine .....	282
Ian MacLaren Calendar for 1896 .....	450
Illustrations, Unsuitable .....	450
James, Mr. Henry, on Du Maurier .....	165
Jubilee Procession, Mark Twain on the .....	12
Kailyard School of Fiction, The .....	5, 5
Kelmscott House, Hammersmith .....	210
Kinnear's (Mr. Samuel) Reminiscences .....	133
Kipling, Mr. Rudyard, and the Jubilee .....	12
—, "Recessional" .....	72
—, "Hymn Before Action" .....	93
—, Verse about Quebec .....	183, 201
—, Books, Early editions of .....	282
—, Song of the Go-Fever .....	483
—, "Echo of Emerson" .....	483
Knight's (Prof.) Reminiscences of Conversation with Tennyson .....	112
—, (William) Reigns in Rhyme .....	112
Le Gallienne's Quest of the Gilt-edged Girl .....	33
Librarian of Public Library, Conversation with a .....	260
Literature, A new Weekly Review .....	239
Logia, or Sayings of Christ .....	12, 92
Lorna Doone, Sixpenny Edition of .....	259
Maitland, Mr. Edward .....	301
Maspero's Struggles of the Nations , Mrs. McClure's translation of .....	375
Maugham's (W. B.) Liza of Lambeth .....	362
Meredith's (Mr.) Poetical Career .....	259
Mitchell's (Dr. Weir) Non-Medical Books .....	352
Morris, Sir Lewis, on "The Disease of Laughter" .....	400
Morris's (William) Posthumous Romance, Curious Analysis of .....	549
Müller's (Prof. Max) Recollections of Lord Alfred Tennyson .....	281
Negri, Ada, the Italian Poet .....	426
Newman, Prof. Francis .....	281
Nicholson's (William) The Alphabet .....	3, 6
—, Almanack of Twelve Sports .....	493
Oliphant, Mrs. .....	12
Omar Khayyām Club, The .....	82, 526
—, Translations of Stray Quatrains from .....	484
Oxyrhynchus, Explorations at .....	13
Phillips's (Stephen) Poem, "The Woman with the Dead Soul" .....	165
Poets, Treatment of, by Reviewers .....	182
Prince Imperial, Birthday Celebration of the .....	219
Prints, The Sale of .....	132
Printing Papers, Modern, Deterioration of .....	426
"Progressive Science Series" .....	73
Riley's (James Whitcomb) Verses on a Portrait of Stevenson .....	572
Romance, The Revival of .....	560
Rossetti, Attack on, by Mr. Sulman .....	203

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Rothenstein's (Mr.) Gallery of English Portraits ...	132
"Rubáiyát, The," of Omar Khāyām ...	301, 484
Ruskin's (Mr.) Counsel on Reading ...	485
Salmon's (Prof.) edition of The Imperial Souvenir ...	390
Seaman's (Mr.) Appointment on the Staff of Punch ...	239
Steel's (Mrs.) In the Permanent Way ...	399
Stevenson's (R. L.) Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde , Unauthorised Translation of ...	73
— Romance, St. Ives ...	72, 239
Stone's (Rev. S. J.) Lays of Iona, and Other Poems ...	485
Submarine Workman, The ...	32
Swinburne, Mr., and the Proposed Academy of Letters ...	449, 433
Tablet , The, on the Proposed Academy of Letters ...	450
Tennyson, Lord Alfred, on Burns ...	281
— unpublished Poem "Have-lock" ...	281
— on Browning ...	301
Twain, Mark, The Proposed Fund in behalf of ...	32
—, New Book by ...	230, 449
—, on the Work of James Hammond Trumbull ...	375
Undergraduates' Ignorance of English Fiction ...	13
Universities, Influence of, on Literature ...	52
University Extension Students, Meeting of ...	93
Walker, Helen, the Grave of ...	240
Wallace, Prof., MSS. of ...	32
Watson's (Mr. William) Poem, "The Unknown God" ...	182
Wells's (Mr. H. G.) Fantastic Creations ...	32
"Whipso, Tip, of the Pirate Bus" ...	73
White, Mr. Gleeson, on "Children's Books and their Illustrators" ...	425
Women's Jubilee Dinner ...	32
Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign ...	72

NOTES AND NEWS—continued.

	PAGE
Undergraduates, Alleged Illiteracy of ...	73
Yellow Book , Writers in the ...	92
Yorkshire Dialect Society ...	52
Zola's (M.) Paris ...	352

ART.

Sambourne, Mr. Linley ...	57
Tate Gallery, The ...	153, 155
Thomson, Mr. Hugh ...	57

DRAMA.

"Admiral Guinea" at the New Century Theatre ...	501
Archer's (William) The Theatrical World of 1898 ...	30
"Arden of Feversham" at St. George's Hall ...	57
"Baron's Wager, The," at the Avenue ...	287
Bernhardt, Mme. Sarah, Mme. Réjane, and Mme. Duse ...	36, 97
"Cat and the Cherub, The" ...	380
Child Actresses ...	287
Chinese Drama, The ...	380
Duse, Mme., and Mme. Sarah Bernhardt ...	97
"Firstborn, The," at the Globe ...	380
"Fortune Hunter, The," at Birmingham ...	265
"Four Little Girls" at the Criterion ...	96
"Francillon" at the Duke of York's Theatre ...	246
Gilbert, Mr., The Remarkable Case of ...	265
Hamlet, The New ...	224
Hamlets: Old and New ...	205
"Happy Life, The," at the Duke of York's Theatre ...	532
"In the Days of the Duke" at the Adelphi ...	225
"La Douloureuse" at the Vaudeville ...	18
Legitimate Drama, Popularity of the ...	154

DRAMA—continued.

	PAGE
"Liars, The," at the Criterion ...	306
"Little Minister, The," at the Haymarket ...	407
"Mademoiselle de Belle-Ile" at the Haymarket ...	56
"Miss Francis of Yale" at the Globe ...	287
"My Lady's Orchard" at the Avenue ...	287
Odilon, Mme., and Mme. Réjane ...	18
"Oh, Susannah!" at the Royalty ...	287
"One Summer's Day" at the Comedy ...	246
"Purser, The," at the Strand ...	287
Réjane, Mme., and Mme. Odilon ...	18
—, and Mme. Sarah Bernhardt ...	36, 97
"Saucy Sally, The," at the Comedy ...	96
"Secret Service" at the Adelphi ...	115
"Sign of the Cross" at the Lyric ...	169
"Silver Key, The," at Her Majesty's ...	56
"Sleeping Partner, The" at the Criterion ...	154
"Spiritism," Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in ...	36
Theatres, New, and Long Runs ...	186
"Tree of Knowledge, The," at the St. James's ...	356
"Untreu" at Daly's ...	18
"White Heather, The," at Drury Lane ...	245

MUSIC.

Beethoven's Biographer ...	117
"Don Juan" at Covent Garden ...	58
"Evangelimann" at Covent Garden ...	37, 58
"Faust" at Covent Garden ...	19
"Inez Mendo" at Covent Garden ...	58
Opera at Covent Garden ...	19, 37, 53, 77
— Season, The ...	77
Promenade Concerts, The ...	267
"Rip Van Winkle" (Opera) at Her Majesty's ...	226
Victorian Era Exhibition, Music Section ...	19

SCIENCE.

	PAGE
Aerodrome, The ...	19
Aeronautics ...	19
Agriculture and Religion ...	77
"America," Name of, Date when it came into use ...	208
Anthropology, Neglect of ...	117
Arctic Basin, Age and Permanence of the ...	116
Armstrong, Lord, on Motion as Matter ...	187
British Association Meeting at Toronto ...	97, 137, 169, 170, 225
Canada's Metals, Lecture by Prof. Roberts-Austen on ...	169
Chromospheric Spectrum, The ...	59
Earthquake in Japan, June, 1897 ...	245
Ethnological Bureau, Agitation for an ...	225
Hall's (Mr.) The Coalfields of Great Britain ...	138
"H," and "K," Lines in the Coronal Spectrum ...	58
Harmsworth Expedition, Return of the ...	208
Lunacy, Statistics of ...	208
Marine Biological Association, The ...	246
Meteorites worshipped as Gods ...	155
Milne, Prof. John, and his Seismographs ...	235
New Guinea, British, Lecture by Dr. Henry O. Forbes on ...	170
Niffer, Excavations at ...	37
Religion, Relation of, to Early Field Culture ...	77
Russell, Dr., on Rays ...	37
Seismographic Record, Utility of ...	225
Surgery, Primitive, among the Zuni Indians ...	37
Surveys, United States Geographical and Biological ...	187
Turbinia, new model Torpedo Boat ...	19
University Question, Commission to deal with the ...	98

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1313.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.

New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS

in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 31 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
No. 34 MISCELLANEOUS. (733, 733 lots.)
No. 35 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 118, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE
LIBRARIES—The JULY CATALOGUE of Valuable NEW and SECOND-HAND WORKS offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H.
SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.

CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate prices.

CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS,
3, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
MSS. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & BAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 56121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.
192th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIR FREDERICK H. HENKOWS, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

BRITISH MUSEUM, BLOOMSBURY.

EVENING OPENING ON WEEKDAYS.

From MONDAY, 5th JULY, to SATURDAY, 14th AUGUST, inclusive, the Galleries usually open from 5 to 10 p.m. on weekdays will be CLOSED during those hours, and will be OPEN from 6 to 8 p.m. instead.

E. MAUDE THOMPSON,

Principal Librarian and Secretary.

British Museum, 29th June, 1897.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street,
London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

EDUCATIONAL.

EPSOM COLLEGE.—ANNUAL EXAMINATION
for SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS early in JULY.
New junior department just opened for 100 boys. Preparation for London Matric. and Prel. Scient. Exams, the Army, Navy, and Universities. Numerous recent successes. NEXT TERM begins
SEPTEMBER 16th.—Apply to the BURSAR, 5, The College, Epsom, Surrey.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—AN EXAMINA-TION will be held in July to fill up not less than FIVE RESIDENT, FIVE NON-RESIDENT QUEEN'S SCHOLARSHIPS, and TWO EXHIBITIONS.—Details may be obtained from the Head Master, Dean's Yard, Westminster.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED, BOOKPLATES of Bozman, Walker, Giles, Reyerley, Cabot, Pace; also any Old Specimens. Very best prices will be paid.—MORAN, 6, Telaw Road, Leyton, Essex.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER.—PAD.
(THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of

HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

Just published, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

GOLD AND SILVER:

An Elementary Treatise on Bimetallism.

By JAMES HENRY HALLARD, M.A. Oxon.,
Sometime Lecturer for the Bimetallic League
in Liverpool.

CONTENTS: Introduction.—What is Bimetallism?—The Story of the Standards.—The Great Fall of Prices.—Eastern Competition.—Misconceptions and Misrepresentations.—
Conclusion.

RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co., 34, King Street,
Covent Garden, London.

Now ready, price 3s. 6d. net.

BACKWARD LOOKING.

Verses: Occasional, Miscellaneous.

Being a volume of poems written about twenty-five years ago, and now published for the first time with introductory verses, entitled

1897, THE QUEEN'S YEAR.

Publishers: WILLIAM POLLARD & Co., Exeter;
Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., London.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the

BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

Cætera paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the literary matter, and of the advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE* ... ..	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT AND EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,

whilst the price (6s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

A BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE WINDS of MARCH. By George

KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance,"
"Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth."
Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"The book is interesting and clever, with touches of true pathos and a sense of atmosphere and life."—Academy.

"The celebrity of the priesthood is a difficult subject to handle. But Mr. Knight's 'The Winds of March' cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS

SEMAPHORE: a Farolical Novel. By HAL GOD-
FREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"It may be said to out-Ansty Ansty, being even more extravagant in conception than 'Vice Versa' or 'The Fallen Idol.' A happy contrast to the morbidly introspective studies of distorted characters that for some time past have deluged the book market."—Daily Telegraph.

"The story is very funny and very well told, almost as good as was 'Vice Versa'."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is the funniest novel that has appeared for many months."—Star.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By

LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Deserve to rank with Miss Jane Barlow's 'Irish Idylls'...One of the best contributions to Irish literature for some considerable time."

"A picturesque group of idylls, the high literary quality of which alone suffices to recommend them irresistibly to general perusal. All are excellent word-paintings."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of exceptional merit and cannot be too highly commended because of the literary treasure it contains. One of those intensely fascinating books."—Belfast News Letter.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in

THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS

BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI.

ENTITLED

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By

FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.

"The interest of the story prevents the reader ever dreaming of laying aside the book till the end."—Glasgow Daily Mail.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT is RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY of the DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS of the MALADY in WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY and MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. FLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY of RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION and AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JULY Number.

WILLIAM the CAD. By VON BROCKENDORFF.

ON ATHEISM. By HUGH MORTIMER CECIL.

INTERNATIONAL ETHICS. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE of COLOUR BLINDNESS.

By F. H. TERRY-COSTE.

TRUTH and FALSEHOOD and their VALUES. By

JOHN C. KENWORTHY.

BOANERGES as MERRY ANDREW. By THOMAS WAUGH.

SAXON and CELT in the INCUBATOR. By A. W.

BARNVELD.

RELICS of SUN-WORSHIP in JUDAISM and CHRISTIANITY. By R. BRUCE BOSWELL.

ON the NATURAL and ARTIFICIAL CHARACTERS of WOMEN. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.

MARRIAGE de CONVENANCE. By E. M. FERGUSON.

NEW BOOKS.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON ... ..	November 14
JOHN KEATS ... ..	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... ..	" 28
TOM HOOD ... ..	December 5
THOMAS GRAY ... ..	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ... ..	" 19
SIR WALTER SCOTT ... ..	" 26

	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON ... ..	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY .. ..	" 9
LEIGH HUNT ... ..	" 16
LORD MACAULAY ... ..	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHEY ... ..	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..	February 6

CHARLES LAMB ... ..	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ... ..	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ... ..	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..	March 6
EDMUND WALLER ... ..	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS ... ..	" 20
JOHN MILTON ... ..	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER ... ..	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN ... ..	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ... ..	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG- FELLOW ... ..	" 24

ANDREW MARVELL ... ..	May 1
ROBERT BROWNING ... ..	" 8
THOMAS CARLYLE ... ..	" 15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ... ..	" 22
CHARLES DICKENS ... ..	" 29
JONATHAN SWIFT ... ..	June 5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ... ..	" 12
WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..	" 19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ... ..	" 26

To-day's Issue.

ALEXANDER POPE.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

"A monument of painstaking and skilful work, which no
one probably could have undertaken with so many advantages as Mr. Miall, or have accomplished with greater success."—Literary World.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Fumival Street, E.C.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING!

C O C O A

CASSELL & COMPANY'S

New and Recent Volumes.

Just published, price 9s.

PICTORIAL ENGLAND and WALES. With upwards of 320 beautiful illustrations prepared from copyright Photographs. "Pictorial England and Wales" comprises within its covers 320 beautiful views of English and Welsh natural scenery, scenes of historic interest, and buildings closely associated with the growth of the nation.—Daily Mail.

A SUPERB ALBUM OF PHOTOGRAPHIC VIEWS.

Now ready, complete in 1 vol., 9s.

THE QUEEN'S LONDON.

Containing nearly 400 exquisite Views of London and its Environs. (Dedicated, by permission, to Her Majesty the Queen.)

"The artistic finish displayed places this publication immeasurably above any other work of the kind. A unique record of the metropolis and the surrounding neighbourhood."—Public Opinion.

COMPLETION OF SOCIAL ENGLAND.

Now ready, complete in 6 vols.

SOCIAL ENGLAND. Edited

by H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L. Vol. VI.—From the Battle of Waterloo to the General Election of 1895. Price 18s. Also supplied in sets, half-morocco, full gilt, price 25 15s. 6d.

"The history of social England is a stupendous undertaking.....Mr. Traill has decided, as we think, wisely, for an encyclopaedical social history."—The Times.

NOTICE.—THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE POPULAR EDITION OF

FAMILIAR WILD FLOWERS.

By F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A., will be ready shortly, and will be followed at intervals of about a fortnight by the other Volumes. The work will be completed in 8 vols., at 3s. 6d. each, and will contain 200 Beautiful Coloured Plates.

Now ready, boards, 3s. 6d., or cloth, 5s.

LITTLE FOLKS' MIDSUMMER

VOLUME for 1897. With Pictures on nearly every page, together with 6 Full-page Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations printed in Colour.

Now ready, price 1s.; post free, 1s. 3d.

THE VICTORIA PAINTING

BOOK for LITTLE FOLKS. With nearly 200 quarto pages, and about 300 Illustrations produced in a manner suitable for Colouring.

Just published, price 6s.

MY LORD DUKE. By E. W.

HORNUNG, Author of "A Bride from the Bush," "The Rogue's March," &c., &c.

"The first large edition of this work having been entirely exhausted, a second edition has been prepared, and is now on sale at all booksellers.

"My Lord Duke" is thoroughly clever and amusing. The mystery which surrounds the story of the real duke and the ingenious way in which all the problems are solved in the end are most entertaining, but still more are we pleased with the way in which the characters are drawn."—Athenaeum.

Just published, price 6s.

A STORY-TELLER'S PACK.

By FRANK STOCKTON, Author of "The Adventures of Captain Horn," "Rudder Grange," &c.

"Widow Ducklet's story of her voyage is a fragment of perfect Stocktonese, which I recommend to all who are willing to be led into the pleasant paths of frivolity by this delightful writer."—Academy.

A NEW STORY BY A NEW WRITER.

Just published, price 6s.

ILL-GOTTEN GOLD: the Story

of a Great Wrong and a Great Revenge. By W. G. TARBET.

"Ill-Gotten Gold," says the Scotsman, "is a story of stirring interest.....A series of exciting events leads to a powerful and highly dramatic ending."

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED,
Ludgate Hill, London.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 961.—JULY, 1897.—2s. 6d.

CONTENTS: CRICKET AND THE VICTORIAN ERA, by Prince Ranjitsingh. — THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT IN TURKEY: ITS CRIMES AND REMEDY, by Sir R. HAMILTON LONG, K.C.M.G.—TRAKUR PRITAP SINGH: A TALE OF AN INDIAN FAMINE, by Sir C. H. T. Crosthwaite, K.C.S.I.—DANIEL: A ROMANCE OF SURREY, by R. D. Blackmore.—THE TRUTH ABOUT "FISHER'S GHOST," by Andrew Lang.—THE PRISONS OF SIBERIA: II. ALEXANDROFFSKY CENTRAL.—GOLF: ITS PRESENT AND ITS FUTURE.—AN UNKNOWN CORNER OF SPAIN, by Hannah Lynch.—TROUTING FROM A CORAL, by A. G. Bradley.—THE DESERTED INN, by Bliss Carman.—ST. BERNARD OF CLOVEY, by Aeneas J. G. Mackay.—WHAT HAPPENED IN THESSALY, by G. W. Steevens.—Mrs. OLIPHANT.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

No. 177.—JULY, 1897.—8vo, price Sixpence.

THE CHEVALIER D'AUVERGNE. Chaps. XVI.—XVIII. By S. LESTER YATES, Author of "The Honour of Saville." BACTERIOLOGY in the QUEEN'S REIGN. By Mrs. PERCY FRANKLAND. AN ANGLER'S SUMMER EVE. By F. G. WALTERS. THE BUSHMAN'S FORTUNE. By H. A. BRYDEN. AN ENGLISH ENGRAVER in PARIS. By AUSTIN DOBSON. ST. MARK'S EVE. By Mrs. ALFRED HUNT. HENRI D'ORLÉANS, DUC D'ANGULÊME. By Mrs. H. REEVE. AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.
London: LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.

JULY.

PASCAL. By LESLIE STEPHEN. ENGLAND'S MILITARY POSITION. By Lieut.-General Sir H. HATFIELD-ALLAN, Bart., M.P. THE MODERN FRENCH DRAMA (II). By AUGUSTIN FILON. ENGLAND and the EUROPEAN CONCERT. By JAMES W. GAMBRIER, Capt. R.N. A WOMAN POET. By Mrs. WARRS CORNISH. THE BURMO-CHINESE FRONTIER and the KAKHYEN TRIBES. By E. H. PARKES. PACIFIC BLOCKADE. By Prof. T. E. HOLLAND. THE PRINCES OF ORLÉANS. By CONSTANCE STOUTLIFE. THE GREEK WAR AS I SAW IT. By BENNET BURLINCH. A LECTURE at OXFORD. By PAUL BOCCART.

CHAPMAN'S MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY OSWALD CRAWFORD.

Price Sixpence.

The JULY Number contains the continuation of MISS VIOLET HUNT'S NEW NOVEL, UNKIST, UNKIND! And Seven Complete Stories by ADA CAMBRIDGE, H. WILLYS, H. WARHAM, E. and H. HERON, G. E. MITTON, P. ST. L. FITZGERIMOND, and the Hon. Mrs. A. HENNIKER.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., London.

THE PROGRESSIVE REVIEW.

Vol. II., No. 10.—JULY, 1897.—Now Ready.

PRICE ONE SHILLING.

EDITORIAL.—MR. MORLEY'S WARNING NOTE. THE GERMAN UNIVERSITY OF TO-DAY. IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT and LIBERAL POLICY. KIEPOMANIA.

THE PEARL OF THE ANTILLES and the HAÏTIAN REPUBLIC. By KARL BLIND.

THE HIGHLAND CROFTERS and their NEEDS. By W. C. MACKENZIE.

THE SWISS REFERENDUM.—I. GENUINE DEMOCRACY in SWITZERLAND. By Professor LOUIS WUARN, Geneva.

II. THE LATEST PHASE OF DIRECT LEGISLATION. By Miss LILIAN TOWN, London School of Economics.

THE PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT ABROAD.—I. FRANCE.

II. GERMANY.

III. ITALY.

CAUSÉRIE OF THE MONTH.

BOOK REVIEWS.
London: HORACE MARSHALL & SON, Temple House, Temple Avenue, E.C.

Price 3d., by post 3d.; yearly subscription (including Supplements), 2s. 6d.

THE LITERARY GUIDE:

A Rationalist Review.

Dedicated mainly to Books and Publications which deal with Religion, Philosophy, Science, and Ethics from a Rationalist standpoint.

THE JULY NUMBER CONTAINS:

FAITH and INTELLECTUAL ADVANCEMENT.

SEX in RELIGION.

THE BLOSSOMING OF HELLENISM.

A FREETHOUGHT VADE MECUM.

THE BLIGHT OF RESPECTABILITY.

MR. MORLEY on MACHIAVELLI.

AN INTRODUCTION to PHILOSOPHY.

CHATS about BOOKS.—VII With Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON.

SIGNS and WARNINGS (gathered from the Religious Press).

RANDOM JOTTINGS.—RATIONALISM in the MAGAZINES.—&c.

Also Two Four-page Supplements:—(I) A Lecture by Mr. F. J. GOULD on Professor Goldwin Smith's "Guesses at the Riddle of Existence"; (2) "A Plan of Moral Instruction," designed to supersede the present method of religious instruction now practised in public elementary schools.

London: WATTS & CO., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

READY ON TUESDAY NEXT.

WITH the TURKISH ARMY in THESSALY. By OLIVE BIGHAM. Special Correspondent of The Times, Author of "A Ride Through Western Asia." With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA

By OLIVE BIGHAM.

Part I., ASIA MINOR. Part II., PERSIA, NORTH to SOUTH. Part III., TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV., PERSIA, WEST to EAST. Part V., CENTRAL ASIA. SPECTATOR.—"One of the most interesting books of travel we have read for a long time. The region covered is unhackneyed, and in many parts but little known; the writer has an excellent eye for local colour and incident, an enthusiasm for his subject, and a clear, easy style which carries us along with unbroken interest; and we lay down the book regretting that our pleasant journey has come to an end."

FIVE NOVELS WORTH READING.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MORRICE BUCKLER."
THE PHILANDERERS. By A. E. W. MASON.

WOULD.—"One of the most interesting novels we have met for a long time."

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY.

GLOBE.—"A piece of refined workmanship, fresh from the hands of an artist.....'A Rose of Yesterday' is one which will retain its full measure of fragrance and charm."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS."

MY RUN HOME. By Rolf Boldre-

WOOD. ATHENÆUM.—"It has many of the best qualities of Whyte Melville, the breezy freshness and vigour of Frank Smedley, with the dash and something of the abandon of Lever.....His last volume is one of his best."

THE FALL OF A STAR: a Novel. By

Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

OBSERVER.—"Contains some exciting and amusing incidents, and the tragic climax is decidedly novel."

THE SECRET OF SAINT FLOREL.

By JOHN BERWICK.

SPEAKER.—"A book to be unreservedly recommended."

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.

"Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back, and edges, 5s.

FRANK MILDMA. By Captain

MARRYAT. Illustrated by H. R. MILLAR. With an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THIRTY YEARS OF TEACHING. By

L. C. MIALL, F.R.S., Professor of Biology in the Yorkshire College. Reprinted, with additions, from THE JOURNAL OF EDUCATION.

BY HENRY ARTHUR JONES.

THE CASE OF REBELLIOUS SUSAN.

A Comedy in Three Acts. By HENRY ARTHUR JONES, Author of "The Tempter," "The Masqueraders," "Judah," &c. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

JULY NUMBER. Price 1s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS.

1. THE HOUSE by the HOWFF. By W. L. WATSON. (Conclusion.)

2. THE LESSER ELIZABETHAN LYRISTS. By ELIZABETH R. PENNELL.

3. SLAVERY in WEST CENTRAL AFRICA. By Major MCKELLEN-FERRIS.

4. THE ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS in AMSTERDAM. By C. J. CORNISH.

5. THE HAUNTED SCHOONER. By HUGH CLIFFORD.

6. THE SONG OF THE MOOR. By JOHN BUCHAN.

7. THE PROBLEM OF THE KANGAROO. By Professor EDWARD E. MORRIS.

8. A CHAPTER OF ACCIDENTS. By Mrs. FRASER. Chaps. IX.-XI.

JULY NUMBER NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—PLAY in LONDON—THE GARDEN. By ELIZABETH R. PENNELL.

With Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

THE CHURCHES OF POTTERS and CAEN. By Mrs. S. VAN RENSSLAERE. With Pictures by JOSEPH PENNELL.

AFTER BIG GAME in AFRICA and INDIA. By H. W. SERON-KARR. I., My First Elephant. II., My First Rhinoceros. III., Hunting with an Indian Prince.

WILLIAM HOGARTH. By JOHN C. VAN DYKE.

Illustrated. Price 1s.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE

For JULY

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—GIRLHOOD DAYS OF ENGLAND'S QUEEN. By J. CASSIDY.

HOW GRANDMOTHER MET the MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE. By ELIZABETH R. PENNELL.

THE LAST OF THE DRUMS. By COR. MARRAST PERKINS, U.S.M.C.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Evolution of the Aryan...	5
Place aux Dames ...	6
The Vindication of John Cabot ...	7
Libel and Literature ...	8
The Race of Cromwell ...	9
The Quest of the Golden Illustrators ...	9
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ...	10
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ...	11
New Books Received ...	11
NOTES AND NEWS ...	12
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXXIV., POPE ...	13
PARIS LETTER ...	14
MRS. OLIPHANT ...	15
THE BOOK MARKET ...	16
SALE OF THE ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY ...	17
DRAMA ...	18
MUSIC ...	19
SCIENCE ...	19
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ...	25-26

REVIEWS.

WEST ARYAN MIGRATIONS AND CULTURE.

The Evolution of the Aryan. By Rudolph von Ihering. Translated from the German by C. A. A. Drucker, M.P. (Swan Sonnenschein.)

THE regret with which the news of the early death of Prof. von Ihering was received in England will be revived by a study of this English edition of his Vorgeschichte der Indo-Europäer. Fragmentary though it be, with some deplorable gaps in the body of the text—the fourth book left unfinished, the fifth scarcely begun, the sixth and seventh untouched, the whole unrevised and published posthumously—this last product of a singularly active literary career forms none the less a contribution of permanent value to the slowly expanding field of primitive Aryan research. Among the numerous essays that have appeared in recent years on the many difficult problems connected with the origin and development of the Indo-European peoples it takes a distinctly independent position. These problems are here attacked from quite a novel standpoint, while the inquiry itself is prosecuted for a different and, it may be added, a more practical purpose.

Stated briefly, the aim of the learned jurist is to seek an explanation of many later (historical) Aryan institutions, not in the Aryan cradleland itself, but rather in the hitherto neglected period of the early migrations. During the course of these wanderings, which must have lasted for many generations, numerous practices and social habits, it is argued with much force and plausibility, must have arisen from time to time to meet the requirements of the new and ever shifting environment. Such practices, owing to the conservative spirit of all primitive peoples, would tend to survive into later times, and, long after their original purpose had been forgotten, many usages which were at first merely practical devices, might thus easily acquire tribal or racial significance, and even a sacred character.

In the prosecution of this deeply suggestive vein of thought, preference for purposes of comparison is naturally given to the early institutions of the Romans, most conservative of all the West Aryan peoples.

"Nothing of special interest can be gathered from other Indo-European nations; they teach us nothing fresh; their evidence becomes of value only in as far as it confirms the facts deduced from Roman antiquity" (p. 310).

Hence the dominant position occupied in these pages by the Roman world, many of whose social customs and ceremonial rites here receive a fresh and unexpected explanation. It was already known that the Pontifices must have originally been in some way connected with the mundane art of bridge-building. Our author is now able to account in a most satisfactory manner for this strange association.

"All the branches of the pontifical duties may be traced back to the original demands laid upon the technical bridge makers of the migratory period; their priestly office, to the necessity of the expiatory sacrifice to the river-god, which could not be offered by the Flamines, who were the priests of the national deities only; their skill in writing, to the drawing of the plan of the bridge; their chronology, to the estimation of the proportions of the bridge; their relation to the law, to the claim of the river-god upon the bridge-toll. I leave it to the reader's judgment whether a view which focuses in this manner all the different phases of the pontifical offices into one historical issue, supported by practical reasons and the evidence of language, can lay claim to probability or not" (p. 360).

So with the ver sacrum, the vestal virgins, the feralia, the augurs, the observation of the exta and the flight of birds, lucky and unlucky days, and omens generally, things which had originally nothing to do with religion but were intimately associated with the circumstances attending the first and later Aryan dispersions and the intervening periods of migration. Thus the conclusions regarding the practical origin of religious customs, which anthropologists had long ago arrived at from the study of savage races, receive unexpected confirmation from the rites and ceremonies of the more advanced nations of antiquity.

"It is familiarity and long usage alone which have caused the originally non-moral motive to be converted into a moral motive; it is the same process which I have above applied to religion, and which to my mind holds good without exception for all standards of law, morality, and custom, in the widest sense of these words. Practical motives have called every one of them into existence" (p. 339).

In working out the details of such a theory for the first time, all sorts of assumptions have naturally to be made, and it is here that the author feels he lays himself open to the attacks of criticism. It is, however, fair to state that his general line of argument is not seriously affected, even though a few bricks may have to be removed here and there from the superstructure. Thus he may be wrong in maintaining against Schrader, and most other living anthropologists, that the Aryan cradleland lay in Baktriana, or about the northern slopes of the Hindu Kush, rather than in the South Russian or the Eurasian steppe lands anywhere between the Carpathians and the Pamir uplands. Nevertheless, the foundations of his theory remain unshaken, because nobody denies that the migrations did actually take place, wherever the centre of dispersion is to be located. These migrations, on which everything depends, are aptly compared to a stream, which disappears underground and then after a long interval (the prehistoric migration period) reappears on the surface, where it develops five or more independent rivers (Greeks, Teutons, Kelts, Letts, Slavs, Illyrians), all having something in common (primordial unity), while each has its own particular character, acquired partly during the underground meanderings, and, to a less degree, during their subsequent evolution in their new European settlements. Possibly too much weight is attached to the influence of the subterranean passage, and some will be disposed to question the statement that "it is not Europe which has made the European; it is the European that has made Europe" (xiv.)—that is to say, that the European cachet was already impressed upon the several branches before they reached their present homes in the West. But the general contention can scarcely be gainsaid, and whether more is due to one environment than to another is a question of secondary importance.

More disputable is the assumption that the primitive Aryans must have had their primæval home in a hilly region because they were pastors, and "mountains are the natural foster-places for the herdsman, plains for the agriculturist" (p. 391). The very reverse would seem to be the case, as we see in Arabia, where the Himyarites of the Yemen uplands have been skilful husbandmen throughout all recorded time, while the kindred Bedouins of the Nejd plains still remain nomad pastors; in Africa, where the Tibbu cultivators of the Tibesti range are surrounded by the nomad Tauregs of the Saharan oases; in the New World, where agriculture was highly developed on the Peruvian highlands, but almost unknown to the redskins of the Mississippi prairies; lastly, in Asia itself, where the Aralo-Caspian steppes continue to be roamed by the Kirghiz and other Turki nomads, while tillage is mainly confined to the Fergana and Bokhara uplands. And, it may be asked, were the primitive Aryans themselves such exclusive nomads as they are here represented? They certainly had the yoke, as shown by the root yug, ζεύ, &c., common to all the Indo-European tongues, Sanskrit not excepted. It may, no doubt, be true that it was applied not to the plough but to the wain or cart. But the wheeled vehicle was surely the invention, not of a pastoral, but of an agricultural people—unless, indeed, it was borrowed before the first dispersion from the neighbouring Babylonians.

This last suggestion is not made by Prof. von Ihering, who in the unfortunately unfinished second book ascribes almost all the other elements of culture possessed by the primitive Aryans either directly to the Babylonian Semites, or else indirectly to them through their Phœnician kinsfolk. This important section, which would not appear at first sight to be necessarily connected with the subject in hand, has been introduced, the author tells us, partly for the "direct interest of the task itself," and partly for "the historic interest that exists in the contrast between Aryans and Semites." In any case, no one would wish it omitted, and if its general conclusions can be accepted, they will go far to solve a great difficulty in connexion with the development of Aryan culture itself. The apparently sudden transformation of the rude Hellenic hordes after their irruption into Thessaly, the Peloponnesus and Ionia, has always seemed a somewhat inexplicable phenomenon, especially when contrasted with the state of sheer barbarism which continued to prevail for ages afterwards among all the other Indo-European tribes who occupied the rest of Europe. Greece, all things considered, cannot be regarded as a much more favoured land than Italy, or even Gaul. But, as we are here reminded, it lay nearer to the earliest seats of human culture in the Nile and Euphrates basins, and it was mainly from the latter region that the Hellenes received nearly all the elements of that civilisation which they rapidly developed in their new homes. From them these elements were passed on, either directly or again through the enterprising Phœnician navigators, to the other Aryan settlers along the shores of the Mediterranean, and so on eventually to the Kelts and Teutons of Central Europe. Less is said about Egyptian influences, but this is obviously due to the fact that the author accepts without reserve Hommel's views regarding the Babylonian origin of Egyptian culture itself. Hence, everything is ultimately traceable to Babylonia, which was "the first seat of civilisation," and "the model nation of historic causality," in which respect "it stands alone in the world." Of course, much of this has been told before, and much is still sub judice. But the whole subject is here treated with singular learning and acumen, while fresh light is thrown on many interesting features of early Mesopotamian culture.

The translation is on the whole fairly well done. But there are numerous misprints and errors, for which the author's unrevised proof sheets cannot be held wholly responsible. Thus, at p. 275, the Latin porcus is made cognate to an Iran. orc, where Iran presumably stands for Ir. (that is, Irish) in the original. Again, we have "Iberians in Armorica" (p. 87); "Spanish grandexa," which is good Italian, but impossible Spanish; modo for modo; singulus for singulis; juga (Sanskrit) for yuga; bajit (Hebrew) for bayit, and the German j generally left untranslated. But far more serious is the misuse of the terms Aryan and Indo-European, which in English philological and ethnological works are universally taken as synonymous, but which are here used, the former as the general name of the Asiatic, the latter as that of the European division of the family. The result is all the more confusing since the distinction is not consistently adhered to, so that we have Aryan in the title itself, where we should expect Indo-European, and elsewhere such perplexing expressions as "the descent of the Indo-Europeans from the Aryans"; and "how was the Indo-European evolved from the Aryan?" In future editions it might be well to conform to the prevailing English use, and where a distinction is needed, Western Aryans or Western Indo-Europeans might be applied to the European division, and Aryans to the Asiatic, in accordance with German usage.

PLACE AUX DAMES.

Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign.
By Mrs. Oliphant, Mrs. Lynn Linton, and Others. (Hurst & Blackett.)

It is only right and proper that the harvest of Jubilee books should include a survey of female fiction during a reign which has been marked by such extraordinary fecundity in this sphere. In the handsome volume before us the publishers have induced a number of women writers to discourse upon novelists of their own sex. All living writers are rigidly excluded, so we have a record without prejudice, and the whole is an interesting history of the great and the little in the past fifty years.

There is no criticism one half so instructive as that of the practitioner of the art which is criticised. The expert, the man or woman who knows the pains and pleasures and difficulties of the trade by actual experience, must always speak with more authority than the irresponsible smatterer. So one turns with some interest to the first two essays in the book, where two writers of eminence are commented upon by two women who in their time have written excellent fiction. Perhaps a more sympathetic critic could have been found for Charlotte Brontë than the late Mrs. Oliphant. This lamented author was of a somewhat different temper from the impetuous morbid creator of Jane Eyre. Mrs. Oliphant, too, as a critic, was apt to be carried captive by momentary dislikes, by prejudices, and by her own love for robust writing. The laudator temporis acti is a difficult character to sustain, and if it is once assumed a certain narrowness and unfairness is apt to follow. The present writer did not often find himself in agreement with Mrs. Oliphant; all the more reason, then, why he should commend this essay as a singularly fair, reasonable, and satisfactory piece of work. It is easy to recognise the greatness of the Brontës' work, but it is not quite so easy to see reasons for the idolatry of which the two sisters are at present the centre. Beginning with Mr. Swinburne's panegyric, we have had a flood of eulogies, minute biographical details, and unimportant essays in criticism. Jane Eyre, Villette, Wuthering Heights are in their way masterpieces, but this is no reason why they should be declared perfect and set on a pinnacle which only makes their imperfection seem more obtrusive. The books have that final quality of excellence—a profound emotional effect; they exhibit life harshly, crudely, often incorrectly, but always with vigour; and the atmosphere of bleak moors has so penetrated to their fibre that they have something akin to high poetic imagining. But let us recognise the plain fact—they are abundantly faulty. It is life, but life viewed from the narrowest standpoint, a groping after a real world which was always imaged in the light of the writer's sombre and restricted vision. Hence come the ugliness of so much of it, the frequent lack of insight, the lapses into the strained and the grotesque. Mrs. Oliphant's own words on the matter seem to us to be not far from the truth:

"The books upon which this tremendous reputation is founded, though vivid, original, and striking in the highest degree, are not great books. Their philosophy of life is that of a school-girl, their knowledge of the world almost nil, their conclusions confused by the haste and passion of a mind self-centred and working in the narrowest orbit. It is rather the most incisive and realistic art of portraiture than any exercise of the nobler arts of fiction—imagination, combination, construction—or humorous survey of life or deep apprehension of its problems—upon which the fame is built."

The nobler arts were indeed there, but the major factor was the faculty of deft portraiture, the setting-down of a number of cruelly exact observations, the harvest of a quiet eye. When, as in the character of Rochester, Charlotte Brontë passes beyond her experience she has recourse either to conventional exaggerations or unreal heroics.

Of Charlotte Brontë, the woman, Mrs. Oliphant writes with truth and sympathy. The small, fiery little governess was the precursor of a new era of thought and feeling. A realist in art, before men began to talk of realism, she is the first sign of the revolt from the Early Victorian sancta simplicitas—the age of the Mrs. Gores and Mrs. Marshs, and "heroines in white muslin," to a more wholesome criticism of life. Almost unconsciously, certainly with no clear intellectual perception of the results implied, she gave voice to the craving of her sex for more equality and freedom. Herself prim, self-contained, old-fashioned, demure and shy before strangers, she had the curious fortune to figure before the world as the prophet of a new cause. It was little that she asked for, but that little was demanded with such fierce importunity that the world awoke and began uneasily to look at the matter for itself. Here, again, Mrs. Oliphant is excellent:

"There was, however, one subject of less absolute realism which Charlotte Brontë had at her command, having experienced in her own person, and seen her nearest friends under the experience of, that solitude and longing of women of which she had made so remarkable an exposition. The long silence of life without an adventure or a change; the forlorn gaze out of windows which never show any one coming who can rouse the slightest interest in the mind; the endless years and days which pass and pass carrying away the bloom, extinguishing the lights of youth, bringing a dreary middle age before which the very soul shrinks, while yet the sufferer feels how strong is the current of life within her own veins, and how capable she is of all the active duties of existence—this was the essence and soul of the existence she knew best."

Mrs. Lynn Linton, like Mrs. Oliphant, is a lover of old fashions in literature, a great advocate of the sensible and the rational, and a sworn foe to the morbid. Her criticism of George Eliot is sane, and on the whole adequate. She is a little too fond of finding petty errors in her author, small anachronisms and little faults of spelling. But she does ample justice to the qualities of insight, knowledge, and an excellent gift in narration which make the greater novels a perpetual delight. It has been the fashion to contrast George Eliot with Charlotte Brontë, and though the comparison has led many—notably Mr. Swinburne—into exaggeration, it is instructive to note how the merits of the one are the defects of the other. George Eliot was a great intelligence, highly cultured, reasonable, and well-balanced, with a kindly, tolerant view of life and a strong disposition to work out all her scenes and characters as illustrations of certain ethical and philosophical principles. When her knowledge failed she fell to sermonising, with the result that when she is obviously forced and unreal, her unreality is that of the moral allegorist, the maker of cosmic parables. Charlotte Brontë was far inferior both in training and primary intellectual power, and when she became extravagant she fell into the sentimental. But in all her faults she preserved one quality, which George Eliot only attained to at rare intervals and by arduous and conscious art. She had the gift of direct emotional effect—a gift which defies exact analysis, but seems to consist in an extraordinary vividness of fancy by which the very essence and atmosphere of a scene or landscape is projected upon the reader's mind. Now great narrative must have other attributes, but it must have this also—in the words of Hilda Wangel, it must be "frightfully thrilling." George Eliot at her best attained it, and then we have the very perfection of the quality, for it is joined with the more purely intellectual qualities of subtlety, insight, and breadth of view. But it is a curious fact that the former, and in many ways inferior, writer has the gift always at her command, which the well-equipped scholar has to strive hard to attain.

The remaining essays in the book are shorter and of less importance. We are glad to find Mrs. Marshall saying a good word for the author of Lob lie by the Fire and Jackanapes—books of which at least one child was a devoted admirer. It is only fair, too, that Mrs. Henry Wood should be treated with some respect, for her industry was phenomenal and she had some notion of constructing a story. As for Mrs. Norton, we always found the character of the author more interesting than her work; and though in one respect, as Lord Dufferin has recently told us, she was not the prototype of Diana of the Crossways, there remains the figure of a brilliant, capable woman. Mrs. Macquoid writes pleasantly of Julia Kavanagh and Miss Edwards, and Mrs. Parr of the author of John Halifax. But why was so incompetent a critic as Miss Edna Lyall allowed to write on Mrs. Gaskell? "Sorrowfully true to life," "tender, noble, and womanly" are epithets that fly about with such terrible frequency that the reader is bewildered. The essay is in its way amiably appreciative, but a writer of such rare quality as the author of Cranford deserved more competent treatment.

The book has also notices of lesser writers: of Mrs. Crowe, Mrs. Archer Clive, Lady Georgiana Fullerton, Miss Pardoe, Miss Geraldine Jewsbury, the friend of Jane Welsh Carlyle, and of "A.L.O.E." Distinguished authors none of these were, but they found their way into many homes in their day, and a strong sentimental interest attaches to most of them, which warrants their inclusion here.

THE VINDICATION OF JOHN CABOT.

Cabot's Discovery of North America. By S. E. Weare. (John Macquenn.)

A SINGULAR fate has dogged the footsteps of the men who won the way to the Western world. When Columbus set foot on one of the Bahamas, probably Cat Island, he thought himself off the coast of Cathay. He had brought with him gracious letters from Ferdinand and Isabella for delivery at the Court of the great Khan, and to the day of his death thought his discoveries were off the Asiatic main. So persistent was this belief, that even on his fourth voyage, after he had already touched the continent at the Gulf of Paria, he took with him interpreters skilled in Arabic as likely to be useful in securing the favour of so great a potentate as Kublai Khan. He was looking for India and blundered upon America, and thought till the last that it was Asia. In the mind of Columbus the lands he found—San Domingo, Cuba, and Jamaica—occupied the place which geography assigns to the islands of Japan. He had broken in upon a new world, and thought he had landed only on an unfamiliar side of the old. He added the two Americas to the world, and was within touch of the Pacific, and never was aware of either. It is in keeping with this irony of things that the new world he found for Europe should bear the name of a traveller who came later when he had shown the way, and that they should be called Americans who dwell in a land upon which neither he nor Vespucci ever set eyes.

In life as after his death the fates dealt strangely with the fortunes of Columbus, and few more striking vicissitudes are told of anywhere than the change by which the disgraced Viceroy was set in irons in his own Domingo, and so sent to Spain across the very ocean which had yielded her secret to him, fettered in the bottom of a caravel. He had added a hemisphere to the dominions of the Spaniard, and his latest biographer tells us that his death was a relief to the king; while "the world at large thought no more of the mournful procession which bore that wayworn body to the grave, than it did of any poor creature journeying in his bier to the potter's field."

But perhaps the saddest contrast of all is that between the fervent hopes which Columbus undoubtedly formed for the conversion of the natives to Christianity, and the fact that at his death the absolute annihilation of the whole race of the Antilles was already well within view. And it is among the revenges of time that the most important colony which Columbus founded for the Spanish Monarchy should now be the black republic of Hayti.

And if this was the fate of Columbus, what of Cabot, the true discoverer of what is now Canada and the United States? Mr. John Fiske writes:

"In the drama of maritime discovery, as glimpses of new worlds were beginning to reward the enterprising crowns of Spain and Portugal, for a moment there came from the North a few brief notes fraught with ominous portent. The Power for whom Destiny had reserved the world-empire of which these Southern nations were dreaming stretched forth her hand, in quiet disregard of papal bulls, and laid it upon the western shore of the ocean. It was only for a moment, and long years were to pass before the consequences were developed. But in truth the first fateful note that heralded the coming English supremacy was sounded when John Cabot's tiny craft sailed out from the Bristol Channel on a bright May morning of 1497."

These be swelling words; but, in truth, for ages the very existence of John Cabot was forgotten, and this volume is written solely to vindicate the claims of the great discoverer against the pretensions of his son. In neither of the ancient English chronicles—Barrett's History of Bristol and the Fust MS.—in which mention is made of the discovery of North America, does Cabot's name even occur. We learn, indeed, from Barrett that, on June 24, 1497, "was Newfoundland found by Bristol men in a ship called the Mathew." Again, according to the Fust MS.,

"this year 1497, on St. John the Baptist's Day, the land of America was found by the Merchants of Bristow in a shippe of Bristowe called the Mathew, the which said ship departed from the port of Bristowe the second day of May, and came home again the sixth of August next following."

Both these records agree as to the dates, and the name of the vessel, and the consequent glory of Bristol, and also in ignoring the gallant explorer who led the expedition. This may probably have been due to mere insular jealousy of the foreign adventurer. Thus we find Raimondo de Soncino, in a letter written in the year of the discovery to the Duke of Milan, after describing John Cabot as a Venetian, saying, "The said Messer Joanne, as he is a foreigner and poor, would not be believed if his partners, who are all Englishmen and from Bristol, did not testify to the truth of what he tells." And so little was the fame of the poor Venetian esteemed in England that until some thirty years ago it was confidently taken for granted that the real discoverer of North America was his son Sebastian. Whether Sebastian Cabot ever led an independent expedition, or even if he accompanied his father in the true voyage of discovery, is uncertain, but we know that for over forty years he took credit to himself among the Spaniards for the work which his father achieved. The world was for ages led astray by statements made by men like Peter Martyr and Ramusio, who were personal friends of Sebastian and wrote as he directed. Peter Martyr even goes so far as to speak of John Cabot as dead at the time when the discovery was made. Happily in recent years the Spanish and Italian archives have redressed the balance and made known the truth. The evidence here supplied is of the most convincing sort, and comes to us in the shape of letters written by the Spanish and Venetian and Milanese envoys immediately after the return of the Mathew in 1497. These representatives of rival commercial Powers naturally felt it their duty to keep their respective courts thoroughly well informed as to what was being done by the English adventurers, and fortunately their testimony in all essential points is unanimous.

John Cabot had little to show as the result of his discovery of North America. Touching land probably somewhere off Cape Breton,

"he saw," says the Venetian Lorenzo Pasqualigo, "no human beings, but he has brought here to the king certain snares which had been set to catch game, and a needle for making nets; he also found some felled trees, by which he judged there were inhabitants."

Raimondo de Soncino, writing to the Duke of Milan in December, 1497, announces that the king was so pleased with what he regarded as the acquisition of a part of Asia for the British Crown, that he meant to give Cabot ships for a new expedition in the spring,

"and will give him all the criminals, so that he may go to this country and plant a colony there. And in this way he hopes to make London a greater place for spices than Alexandria."

We know that this second expedition actually sailed, and that one of the vessels had to put back into an Irish port through stress of weather—the rest is silence. When Cabot and his companions returned, or whether they returned at all, is simply not known. John Cabot disappears from our view. Even his name does not appear as the discoverer of North America until a comparatively recent date. What did Bristol care for the fame of the mere Venetian so long as the name of the Bristol vessel was remembered? and Sebastian Cabot, settled in Spain, had obvious reasons for being reticent and even unvarnished about his father.

Mr. Weare has set out the evidence which demonstrates the validity of John Cabot's claim with abundant care. But was it necessary at this time of day to give Alexander's Bull in extenso, and in English as well as in Latin? The book is also somewhat needlessly bulked by a preliminary chapter and long introduction about the current beliefs of the Middle Ages as to what lay beyond the Atlantic. It was the known success of Columbus, and not legends about St. Brandon and the seven cities, which caused John Cabot to sail into the West.

LIBEL AND LITERATURE.

An Outline of the Law of Libel. By W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., LL.D. (Macmillan.)

The Law of Libel and Slander. By Hugh Fraser, LL.D. Second Edition. (Wm. Clowes & Sons.)

THE distinction between libel and slander being, broadly, that libel is a written statement, and slander a spoken, the intimate connexion between libel and literature is evident. It is highly important that every writer should be thoroughly acquainted with the law of libel. To the journalist it is vital, but the novelist requires knowledge no less. Actions have been frequently brought for identifiable fiction which libelled a living person; and in these days of outspoken criticism, it is as necessary for the novelist as for his reviewers to know how far a critic may go safely, and for how much malice he can be mulcted in damages. The public, too, who are both readers and juries, may as well be "up-to-date" as to the relations between libel and literature. Dr. Blake Odgers, in his admirable and neatly bound little manual, just issued, which looks almost like a book of poems, has done no little service both to literary men and the public by his excellent and concise exposition of the law. For lawyers, the law has to be put technically, and Mr. Fraser, in the second edition of his well-arranged text-book, gives the profession the benefit of a clear summary of the leading and latest cases. But Dr. Blake Odgers, in the reprint of his more popular lectures, has treated the theory and practice of libel so that he who runs, or rather sits at his desk, can read. The writer, who is not a barrister, will have no excuse for ignorance of the main issues in the special sort of legal risk to which he exposes himself. He must not do an injury to the reputation of any person, unless he can prove either that his statements are true (a complete answer) or that his criticism is a fair comment on a matter of public interest. If he has said only what can be proved to be true, cadit questio. But "fair comment" is often a difficult matter to define. Let him remember, then, that (a) it is immaterial whether he honestly believes that his words are true—that will not absolve him; (b) it is also immaterial how poignant or severe or exaggerated his ridicule or his reproaches may be, if they are justified at all; (c) all statements of fact must be absolutely accurate; (d) it is his statements of opinion only which are protected; (e) the criticism must be relevant to some matter of public, and not of merely personal, interest; (f) and his attack must not be "malicious" in the ordinary sense of the word. Dr. Blake Odgers illustrates all these points with considerable wit as well as learning. He sometimes goes a little far, however, in his obiter dicta. For instance, on the question of malice:

"Suppose that A. and B. are both suitors for the hand of the same young lady. A. writes a book or a play which is severely criticised in the Times. The criticism, though severe, is, nevertheless, a fair comment on the play. It honestly expresses what the critic really thought of the production. B. reads this, and is delighted, and he sends a copy of that issue of the Times to the mother of the young lady, hoping and intending thus to injure his rival. Will an action lie for malicious publication? I think it will."

But surely non constat that the opposition of a mother would ruin his rival with the daughter! However, the point illustrates the fact that malice is often a thorny question. Or, take another instance, as to publication:

"Suppose the defendant is a German merchant, and the plaintiff a German too, a clerk in the office of an English merchant. The defendant considers that he has some cause of complaint against the plaintiff, so he writes a letter in German to the employer of the plaintiff. The envelope is properly fastened down, and addressed to the English merchant, who opens it; he sees it is in German, so he calls for the German clerk, the plaintiff, and hands it to him, saying, 'Tell me what this is about.' Thereupon it becomes the duty of the plaintiff to translate this German letter to his employer, and in so doing he, the plaintiff, necessarily publishes to his employer a libel on himself. Can it be said that this is a publication by the defendant? Can the principal be the agent of the defendant to create a cause of action against him? The defendant compelled the plaintiff to injure his own reputation, and it seems hard he should escape liability."

Dr. Odgers will be happy to argue this case in the courts on either side if it arises. But the decision would surely depend partly upon whether the letter was a libel at all, and also, if privilege were pleaded, upon the question of malice. The privilege resulting if the defendant and his correspondent have common interest in the subject-matter of the communication is destroyed if malice can be proved, and here it probably could be. This German instance recalls the many curious cases where everything turns on the meaning of the words. "Thou art a daffodowndilly" of a lawyer was formerly actionable. "You are a bunter," of Mrs. Rawlings (in 1858), was not. But it might have been if the proper innuendo had been set out. Sometimes, however, the Courts will put off their judicial nescience. In these literary days the judges know more than they did. In 1848 a lady recovered damages from a man who wrote that "her warmest friends had realised the fable of the Frozen Snake"; and when a newspaper said of a solicitor that "Messrs. Quirk, Gammon & Snap were fairly equalled, if not outdone," a copy of Ten Thousand a Year was put in at the trial and taken as read.

"I myself," says Dr. Blake Odgers, "was once paid to read The Strange Story of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde; some one had compared a virtuous plaintiff to Mr. Hyde; and a copy of Mr. Stevenson's book accompanied my instructions."

So that it is dangerous to compare people with characters out of books. By the way, it is rather odd to reflect, after noting how interesting and dramatic Dr. Odgers makes the law of libel, that no novelist, so far as we know, has brought a libel action into his plot. Breach of promise and divorce we have had, but who has depicted a libel action? Our space is, however, exhausted. Dr.

Odgers has much that is of value to discuss as to the history of reporting, the present unsatisfactory law of newspaper libel, and the development of "the liberty of the Press" (which Lord Kenyon defined to mean that "a man might publish anything which twelve of his countrymen think not blamable"). He might with advantage have discussed some of the cases where novelists have been sued for defaming living persons under a pseudonym. This is the only omission we notice in his useful, concise, and really delightful volume.

THE RACE OF CROMWELL.

Waylen's House of Cromwell. Edited by J. G. Cromwell. (Elliot Stock.)

CANON CROMWELL'S revised edition of Waylen's book is very welcome. It contains a considerable amount of new matter, and is altogether a distinct improvement on the original work, although in the absence of consistent and systematic references it cannot be regarded as wholly satisfactory. Among many points of interest space will only allow us to indicate a few. In the account of the Cromwells of America we are warned that American citizens of a certain class (whom philanthropists that know them not are fond of claiming as their "black brethren"), in lieu of bedecking themselves after the fashion of their forefathers with the borrowed finery of cocked-hats and epaulettes, are in these latter days much addicted to proclaiming their freedom and independence by appropriating the name of the great Protector. The common early practice of naming children after a deceased brother or sister is abundantly illustrated in these pages; though there is no instance that quite rivals one which we remember to have seen in the Visitation of Suffolke, where the attempt of a parent to perpetuate his own Christian name had to be repeated four times before persistence won success. The old, but always improving, tale is told of Sir Charles Henry Frankland, the roué baronet who was converted from his evil ways by the earthquake of Lisbon. Everyone knows how, in the twinkling of an eye, he turned, figuratively speaking, from devil to monk; how, in the new-found fervour engendered by the "horrors of the hour," he forthwith made an honest woman of the lady under his protection by going through a brace of marriage ceremonies with her—one Roman and one Anglican; and how from that hour the "now sobered and chastened," and very much married, couple lived virtuous ever afterwards, and eventually died respected by all who did not know them. Two good anecdotes are reproduced—the one about Napoleon and Sir James Macintosh, and the one about Frances Cromwell and Jerry White.

The latter is perhaps worth telling yet again. Frances was the Protector's youngest daughter, and the Rev. Jeremiah White, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, was one of his chaplains. The divine sought to better his fortunes by securing, apprentice-fashion, the hand of his master's daughter. Her father, however, had more exalted aims for her establishment in life.

"Having been given reason to suspect that his aspiring chaplain had carried his amatory professions too far, Cromwell managed to entrap the couple just at a moment when Jerry was on his knees, caressing the Lady Frances's hand. 'What is the meaning of that posture before my daughter?' demanded he. Here Jerry's wit came to his aid. 'May it please your Highness, I have long unsuccessfully courted the young gentlewoman yonder, my lady's waiting-maid, and I was now therefore humbly praying her ladyship to say a word in my behalf.' Turning to the waiting-maid, Oliver went on: 'Well, hussey, and why should you refuse Mr. White's offers? You must know that he is my friend, and I expect that you will treat him as such.' Here the ready wit of the maiden proved smarter even than Jerry's. 'If Mr. White,' says she, 'intends me that honour, I shall not oppose him.' 'Sayest thou so, lass?' rejoined Cromwell. 'Call Goodwyn; this business shall be finished at once.' Mr. Chaplain Goodwyn arrived; the parties were married on the spot, and Cromwell, by way of solatium, made them a present of £500."

The chapter on Cromwell's Church policy, though obscured by mystical jargon, contains some really valuable observations. The section that treats of the problem concerning his remains does not profess to be more than a sketch; still, even so, it is curious that there is no allusion to the strange story recorded in the Harleian Miscellany (ii. 285) to the effect that the body hanged at Tyburn was really that of Charles I., which, in the anticipation that the Protector's tomb would be violated, had been substituted, not without a souppçon of pleasantry, in the coffin of the latter. In respect of accuracy there is little enough to complain of in the book, but a statement on p. 7 needs emendation. To say that "it is next to impossible to give the exact date of the birth, marriage, or death of anybody in England prior to 1538, because before that time there was no regular and systematic registration of births, marriages and deaths kept in this country," is incorrect in two ways. On the one hand, in the case of tenants-in-chief, the Inquisitiones post mortem furnish us with a mass of such dates as regards that class of landholders; on the other hand, though it is true that Thomas Cromwell started the parochial registers in 1538, they were anything but "regular and systematic" till after 1660. The vulgar delusion that Alexander Borgia died from poison should not have been permitted to disfigure p. 11. In conclusion we present Canon Cromwell with a reference or two which may be useful for a subsequent edition of his book: to p. 356 of Nicolas' Siege of Carlsberg, where there is an important note on John de Cromwell, and to pp. 400-402 of vol. i. of Gairdner's Letters, &c., of Richard III. and Henry VII. ("Rolls Series"), where additional information will be found anent John Williams, and, among other things, how he "honorably and valiantly acquitted himself" at the Westminster Tournament of November, 1494.

THE QUEST OF THE GOLDEN ILLUSTRATORS.

English Illustrations in the Sixties. By Gleeson White. (Constable & Co.)

MR. JOSEPH PENNELL and Mr. Gleeson White have between them succeeded in diverting collectors into a new channel. By this time they must—with lecture, with article, and with book—have sent scores of keen young men to Farringdon-street and Aldgate, where the literary barrows most do congregate, on the search for odd numbers of the illustrated magazines of what Mr. Pennell has called the "Golden Age of Illustrators"—namely, the sixties. For the moment the first editions of Stevenson and Lang have no charm, large-paper minor poets are without interest, three-volume Merediths cease to attract, Dickens and Thackeray monthly parts have lost fascination. The new quarry is back numbers of Cornhill and Good Words, Once a Week and the Sunday Magazine. For such collectors Mr. Gleeson White has prepared a comprehensive work, which needs only to be reprinted without plates in the form of a handbook to be quite invaluable. In its present handsome form, enriched by some excellent reproductions of the best drawings of the great period (1857-1870), it is almost an end in itself: a beautiful monument raised to commemorate the strength and directness of English black and white art at its best.

We say strength and directness, for these were the leading characteristics of the artists whom Mr. Gleeson White has worked so hard to honour. Here and there among them was one who added grace and beauty to his equipment, notably Frederick Walker, Mr. Whistler, and occasionally Millais and Sandys, but in the main they were strong and direct before anything. And how strong and direct; how faithful to the fact! When we compare the illustrations of Once a Week with the most popular of those which had gone before—the hideous extravagances of Cruikshank, the tiresome caricatures of Phiz, the mass of unobserved and unthinking work which did duty for illustrations in the thirties and forties—and then when we look at the majority of process blocks of today and the hurried, unthinking work which they perpetuate, we understand the enthusiasm of critics like Mr. White and Mr. Pennell.

Of the giants of the sixties, Millais and Frederick Sandys were the greatest. Millais's "Prodigal Son," "The Tares," and, in another manner, "Grandmother's Apology"; Sandys' "The Old Chartist," "If," "Until Her Death," "Life's Journey," and "Little Mourner"—these are among the finest things in the book. Mr. Whistler's early drawings from Once a Week are miracles of grace, and Mr. White shows us what an artist was lost when the late George Du Maurier threw in his lot with Punch. The late Lord Leighton and Charles Keene are misrepresented: there is nothing from "Romola" in the Cornhill, and only one of the illustrations to The Cloister and the Hearth. We could well have spared the examples of Simeon Solomon, E. H. Pickersgill, and Mr. Du Maurier in his comic mood, to make room for these. We should also have liked more Walkers. Where, for instance, is "Philip in Church"? Instead of this we have several drawings by Arthur Hughes, to whom we refuse to give a tithe of Mr. White's admiration, and a positively repellant design by J. Leighton. The landscapes of Mr. J. W. North and the figure studies of Mr. H. S. Marks lead us to regret that there is to-day no inducement to artists to put black-and-white work before colour. It is sad, indeed, to reflect what ravages photography is working with the art

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Coriolanus. Edited by R. F. Cholmeley.
King John. Edited by F. P. Barnard.
 ("Arnold's School Shakespeare.")

WE have received two new volumes of this excellent and rapidly growing series. Mr. Cholmeley's Coriolanus is a useful piece of work, very much on the lines of the Macbeth and Twelfth Night for which he is already responsible. Coriolanus is at best a difficult play for young students, owing to its compressed and contorted style, but Mr. Cholmeley's paraphrases will do something to lighten their task. The notes on scansion do not always command our assent; and surely it is not correct to say that Alexandrines are "very rare," for Coriolanus happens to be one of the plays in which they are most frequent.

Mr. Barnard's King John is a somewhat elaborate edition, with a longer introduction and fuller notes than we remember to have seen in any earlier number of the series. It is perhaps fitted for a more advanced type of student than that aimed at by its fellows. The notes are exceedingly good and interesting, and are evidently written with a wide knowledge of heraldry and kindred archaeological lore. An especial feature of the Introduction is the long historical account of the dramatis personæ. Mr. Barnard gives a noteworthy explanation of that important and, from an historical point of view, enigmatic character, Philip Faulconbridge.

"Just as Shakespeare's Sir John Falstaff is a medley of Sir John Oldcastle and Sir John Fastolf, in like manner the Bastard of The Troublesome Raigne and of King John is a composite character, to form which three several historical personages have been laid under contribution. All three were bastards, all three performed notable actions, all three possessed the common feature of conspicuous valour."

These three bastards, according to Mr. Barnard, are Philip Fitz-Richard, Fawkes de Breauté, and a fifteenth century bastard of Faulconbridge, Thomas Neville. The theory is plausible, and accords well enough with the spirit of Elizabethan play-writing. It requires, we think, to be supported by passages from Hall, Holinshed, or any other chronicler whom the author of The Troublesome Raigne may be supposed to have used, showing what information as to each of these three worthies appears to have been at that writer's disposal. It is not safe to assume in an Elizabethan author a modern knowledge of minor historical detail. We observe that an impossible statement, to which we have previously taken exception, still appears in the Life of Shakespeare appended to the Introductions of these volumes. It is that Shakespeare was a member of the Chamberlain's Company in 1593. The company referred to began its career in 1594.

* * *
Beauties and Antiquities of Ireland. By T. O. Russell. (Kegan Paul.)

MR. RUSSELL's book will be very useful to tourists who have projected visits to the romantic and beautiful spots he describes, and it will make others wish to see them. It is not, strictly speaking, a guide-book, as described in its sub-title. Mr. Russell gives but few particulars of hotels, conveyances, and other details of travel. For these the tourist can go to the ordinary manuals; Mr. Russell's aim is to supply his higher wants. He writes as a student of Irish history, and an enthusiastic admirer of Irish scenery; and it is to spots which history and scenery unite to make remarkable, such as Tara Hill, Uisneach Hill, Cashel, Dunluce Castle, and Glendaloch, that Mr. Russell invites his readers. Steeped himself in the myths and the more or less authentic history of the early Irish kings, and glorying in every rath, lise, cromlech, and round tower that remains to support those bright legends, Mr. Russell makes a pleasant companion. We wish that in dropping guide-book formality, he had dropped guide-book phraseology when describing scenery. Phrases like "a brilliant gem of nature," "a gem of scenic loveliness," and "scenic attractions" are too frequent. Mr. Russell discusses anew the interesting question whether our Coronation Stone in Westminster Abbey is the very Lia Fail, or Stone of Destiny, on which the over-Kings of Ireland were crowned; and he decides, in opposition to Dr. Petrie (who thinks that the pillar stone now at Tara is the true Lia Fail), that it is. He is so satisfied of this that he would carry the pedigree of the stone, if possible, farther back. He suggests a scientific examination with a view to determining whether the precious relic which has come to us vid Tara and Scone was not, originally, a meteorite from space.

* * *
My Father as I Recall Him. By Mamie Dickens. (The Roxburghe Press.)

THE death of Miss Dickens while her book was in the press lends a pathetic interest to her graceful and affectionate tribute to her father's memory. Miss Dickens has not so much added to our knowledge of Charles Dickens, even in his private life, as she has renewed and deepened it. Naturally she has dwelt much on her father's home-loving nature, his gaiety at his own hearth, his splendid achievements as a playmate. We will quote, however, a reminiscence which has literary interest. Miss Dickens had been seriously ill, and her father liked to have her carried into his study, to remain with him while he wrote:

"On one of these mornings I was lying on the sofa endeavouring to keep perfectly quiet, while my father wrote busily and rapidly at his desk, when he suddenly jumped from his chair and rushed to a mirror which hung near, and in which I could see the reflection of some extraordinary facial contortions which he was making. He returned rapidly to his desk, wrote furiously for a few moments, and then went again to the mirror. The facial pantomime was resumed, and then turning toward, but evidently not seeing, me, he began talking rapidly in a low voice. Ceasing this soon, however, he returned once more to his desk, where he remained silently writing until luncheon time. It was a most curious experience for me, and one of which I did not, until later years, fully appreciate the purport. Then I knew that, with his natural intensity, he had thrown himself completely into the character that he was creating, and that for the time being he had not only lost sight of his surroundings, but had actually become in action, as in imagination, the creature of his pen."

Miss Dickens has scattered through her pages many a trifling memory that we can welcome: even so elusive a circumstance as this, that one day, on the road from Rochester to Cobham, her father pointed out to her "the exact spot where Mr. Winkle called out: 'Whoa; I have dropped my whip!'"

* * *
Wrekin Sketches. By Emma Boore. (Elliot Stock.)

MISS BOORE has done what we should like to see other village ladies do. She has studied, and written down in an unassuming way, the history of her own neighbourhood. There is no fear of such a record proving dull or valueless provided it has been constructed with care, Miss Boore's being a case in point. Wisely, she has given most of her space to her own little Shropshire village of Uppington, the Opetone of the Domesday Book, and to the villages around it. She plunges into the early English lore of the neighbourhood, finding suggestive facts in the Domesday Book, in Pipe Rolls, and Hundred Rolls, and church accounts. And she has stories of those elusive days which the very old can just remember to have seen, or to have heard of. One of these stories concerns the Uppington gibbet, which Miss Boore herself recollects as a harmless gate-post. Even then she would gallop past it when riding that way in the evening. The most trivial, inconsequential story of village life seems to have a nameless charm, and though Miss Boore has really nothing particular to tell us about one "Tailor Locky," who flourished in the village a hundred years ago, yet it is pleasant to know that he kept seven 'prentices and several journeymen, and that he rode out of Uppington every morning to meet the newspaper, and that he wore a pigtail, which the boys played with in church. Miss Boore has a chapter on Gronow Owen, the Welsh bard, and on parson Richard Allestree, who was born at Uppington in 1619, and is one of the writers to whom The Whole Duty of Man is still attributed. We doubt if it was wise of Miss Boore to include Shrewsbury in her book, but as a village annalist she has done a service to her neighbourhood and its occasional students.

SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1897.

No. 1313, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

NOT many books have been published this week. Yet the stream that was dammed begins to flow. A trickle of new editions—rather than new books—shows the change. We have, for instance, a new and revised edition, in one volume, of Mr. Stanley's In Darkest Africa. As a rule, books of exploration have their day and cease, and we confess that we had thought of Mr. Stanley's work, important though it is, as a book of the past. It reappears in a cheap one-volume edition. Mr. Stanley remarks that the issue of his work at the present price cannot be profitable to either author or publisher, but he consents to this edition in the belief that his readers may thereby be better able "to follow intelligently the developments that are being constantly made there by the Congo State, Great Britain, and Germany, the three Powers that are now in possession of the regions traversed by our Expedition."

We have received from Messrs. A. & C. Black a new edition of Sartor Resartus adapted to school use. The editor, Mr. J. A. S. Barrett, has supplied the most copious notes and an introduction of nearly fifty pages in length. Sartor Resartus, he thinks, "is fitted to be a class-book of the greatest usefulness to junior students, stimulating to their thought and formation of their character." We hesitate to endorse this, and feel rather sorry for the junior students who will soon be tackling these 350 pages of text and notes. Undoubtedly it is true that "to the more serious student" Sartor Resartus "becomes in many cases a guide, philosopher and friend, directing him to the wisdom of Goethe and the beauties of Jean Paul, and proving itself the wine as well as the food of life." But wine and food, to be enjoyed, and to be nutritious, must be approached with the natural appetite. The reading of Sartor should be one of the divine accidents in every youth's life. However, the whole question of the adaptation of standard books to schoolroom use is, we think, in need of consideration, and we shall perhaps return to this subject.

Messrs. Macmillan persevere in doing justice, and perhaps more than justice, to Capt. Marryat. They have added Frank Mildmay to their series of standard novels. Mr. H. R. Millar illustrates, and Mr. David Hannay, as usual, edits. It was Frank Mildmay that gave Marryat his first taste of fame. But Mr. Hannay points out that the story is inferior to Peter Simple, Midshipman Easy, or Masterman Ready, and that it cannot escape the charge of coarseness. Yet the British sailor of the eighteenth century could not be drawn in delicate lines; and Mr. Hannay remarks that "on the few occasions when the writers of the century looked at the existence on board ship it filled them with horror." He continues, in a passage which we quote as being of interest just now:

"The vein of Cockneyism which is to be found all through them accounts for much. Smollett and Fielding were assuredly not squeamish, yet they both appear to have shared the disgust which filled Dr. Johnson when he stood at the break of the quarter-deck, and looked down on the overcrowding below, and was offended by the foul language and the fouler smells. From all this they recoiled. Smollett's picture of the Navy was overcharged with effect; but he would not have painted it so fiercely, all in black as he did, if it had not revolted him."

From Messrs. Henry & Co. come three new editions in their new "Random Series": two of them are Mr. Barry Pain's The Kindness of the Celestial and In a Canadian Canoe, the third is a new edition of the translation of Louis Couperus' novel, Ecstasy, by Mr. A. Teixeira de Mattos and Mr. John Gray.

Mr. Edward Bellamy, the author of Looking Backward, is known in this country practically by that work alone; and thousands of readers have probably wondered when they would next hear of him. He has now written a sequel to Looking Backward, which he entitles Equality. Looking Backward, he writes,

"was a small book, and I was not able to get into it all I wished to say on the subject. Since it was published what was left out of it has loomed up so much more important than what it contained that I have been constrained to write another book. I have taken the date of Looking Backward, the year 2000, as that of Equality, and have utilised the framework of the former story as a starting-point for this which I now offer."

Mr. Bellamy then summarises the plot of Looking Backward, and the new story begins from the point where Julian West, having awaked from his dream in Dr. Leete's house, goes downstairs to tell it all to Edith, who is gathering flowers in the garden on which "the morning sun of the twentieth century" is shining. Equality is a much longer story than its forerunner, filling, indeed, more than three hundred and fifty closely printed pages.

Maeterlinck again and already! His book of essays, Le Trésor des Humbles, was a conversational success only a month or two ago, and, to a few people, something much better. Now we have Maeterlinck the dramatist presented to us by the translator of the essays, Mr. Alfred Sutro. Aglavaine et Sélysette is the tinkling title of Maeterlinck's new five-act drama. Mr. J. W. Mackail, whose literary activity, we notice, takes rather a wide range, writes an introduction. He says:

"For the play, which is here presented in an English dress, no special words of preface are required. It may be left to make its own impression. Some of its indefinable charm of language must no doubt be lost in a translation; and the rounded completeness of Pelléas et Mélisande, the finished repose in which it ends, are scarcely rivalled here. Aglavaine et Sélysette ends on a cry, haunting indeed, but not satisfying. In the Trésor des Humbles M. Maeterlinck appeared as a professed Neo-Platonist, a thinker and mystic, saturated in Emerson, and finding inspiration from Plotinus and Swedenborg. This growing philosophic passion may involve a certain expense of dramatic quality. But there is here an even higher attainment in delicate insight, and in the power of expressing by simple words some of the subtlest and most elusive shades of emotion."

Mr. Henry Arthur Jones issues, through Messrs. Macmillan, his comedy, The Case of Rebellious Susan. "My comedy isn't a comedy at all; it's a tragedy dressed up as a comedy," he tells Mrs. Grundy, in a pleasant, bantering letter of dedication. And as for the moral of the play, he anticipates Mrs. Grundy's demand for one:

"If I dare hint so much to you, dear lady, it is well at times not to be too ferociously moral. There is a time to be ferociously moral and a time to refrain. The present, my dear Mrs. Grundy, is an eminently suitable time to refrain. Let us not be always worrying books and plays for their morals. Let us not worry even life itself for too plain or too severe a moral. Let us look with a wise, sane, wide-open eye upon all these things, and if a moral rises naturally from them let us cheerfully accept it, however shocking it may be; if not, let us not distress ourselves. . . . Refrain, my dear lady! Refrain! Refrain! And if you must have a moral in my comedy, suppose it to be this—'That as women cannot retaliate openly, they may retaliate secretly—and lie.' And a thoroughly shocking moral it is, now we have got it. But, oh! my dear Mrs. Grundy, Nature's morality is not your morality nor mine. Nature has ten thousand various morals, all of them as shocking as truth itself. The very least of them would fright our tale from its propriety if it were once guessed at."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

[In the following list prices are given where they have been supplied by Publishers.]

BIOGRAPHY.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF THE QUEEN. By One of Her Majesty's Servants. C. Arthur Pearson, Ltd. 2s. 6d.
ARNOLD OF RUSSY: HIS SCHOOL LIFE AND CONTRIBUTIONS TO EDUCATION. Edited by J. J. Findlay, M.A. With an Introduction by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Hereford. Cambridge University Press. 5s.

BELLES LETTRES, POETRY, DRAMA, ETC.

THE TEMPLE DRAMATISTS: THE MEKEV DEVIL OF EDMONTON: A COMEDY. Edited by Hugh Walker, M.A. J.M. Dent & Co. 1s.

SARTOR RESARTUS. By Thomas Carlyle. Edited, with Notes, by J. A. S. Barrett, M.A. A. & C. Black. 6s.

THE MERMAID, AND OTHER POEMS. By E. Patterson. Published by the Author (Cardiff).

SHAKESPEARE: A REVOLUTION. Anonymous. Skeffington & Son.

DIES DOMINICA. By Margaret Evans and Isabel Southall. Elliot Stock.

AGLAVAINNE AND SÉLYSETTE: A DRAMA IN FIVE ACTS. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alfred Sutro. Grant Richards.

FICTION.

A AFRICAN MILLIONAIRE. By Grant Allen. Grant Richards.

THE PURSUIT OF THE HOUSE-BOAT. By John Kendrick Bange. Osgood, Mollvaine & Co. 2s.

EMPTY POCKETS, AND OTHER STORIES. By Mildred Berkeley. Edwin, Vaughan & Co.

EQUALITY. By Edward Bellamy. William Heinemann.

WHILE THE BILLY BOILS. By Henry Lawson. Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, ETC.

HANDY GUIDE-BOOK TO ENGLAND AND WALES. By Edward Smith. George Allen.

OXFORD AND ITS COLLEGES. By J. Wells, M.A. Illustrated by Edmund H. New. Methuen & Co.

NEWFOUNDLAND IN 1897. By Rev. M. Harvey. Sampson Low.

JOURNES AMONG THE GENTLE JAPS. By Rev. J. Li. Thomas. Sampson Low.

IN DARKEST AFRICA. New edition, corrected and revised. By H. M. Stanley. Sampson Low.

BLACK'S GUIDE TO NORTH WALES. A. & C. Black. 3s. 6d.

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE late Mrs. Oliphant had been a contributor to Blackwood's Magazine for over half a century, and we are informed by the publishers that during the whole of that period her contributions averaged one to each number of the magazine.

A TOUCHING notice of Mrs. Oliphant's connexion with "Maga" appears in its current number. "More than half a century ago," we read,

"Mrs. Oliphant, as a young girl of remarkable literary promise, was led by the gentle 'Delta' tremblingly before the dread tribunal of Christopher North. 'So long as she is young and happy, work will do her no harm,' said the sage, who little knew that he was addressing one who more than any other was to maintain unimpaired the traditions of his beloved 'Maga,' and to find the crowning work of her life in recording its not uneventful annals. She was already an old contributor when she wrote her first 'Christmas Tale' for the memorable number in which George Eliot began the 'Scenes of Clerical Life'; and that faithful, loyal, brilliant work was destined to long outlive the young and happy years of which the 'Professor' spoke, and which, alas! were all too few; and literature, instead of being the joy of a happy leisure, became the unflinching solace of a life that knew many and bitter sorrows."

Mrs. Oliphant always wrote anonymously in the magazine, but her personality had long been seen between the lines of "The Old Saloon," and "The Looker On."

THE mention of Mrs. Oliphant's "crowning work" is, of course, an allusion to the history of the "House of Blackwood," on which she was engaged in her last days. This work was, we believe, completed by her, but in a touching farewell letter to Mr. Blackwood Mrs. Oliphant expressed her regret—one that every writer will understand—that she could never hope to see its proof-sheets. The following paragraph, in this, as yet unpublished, work, is quoted by Mr. Blackwood:

"It has been the fate of Blackwood's Magazine to secure a genuine attachment from its contributors more than any other literary organ has ever had: the same sort of feeling which makes sailors identify themselves with their ship, rejoicing in the feats which they attribute somehow to her own personality, though they know very well what is their own share in them, and maintaining a generous pride in the vessel, which would be but a paltry feeling were it translated into a mere self-complacence as to their own achievements. I hope this is being kept up in the younger generation; it certainly was very strong in the past."

It is not surprising that so long and close a literary connexion ripened into one of intimate friendship between author and publisher, one of those friendships which, as Mr. Blackwood says, "go to preserve all that is best and most inspiring in the traditions of letters."

WE are informed that Mrs. Oliphant, who had exceptional advantages for such a task, completed shortly before her death a personal life of Her Majesty, which will be issued in due course by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

THE American papers reported the Jubilee procession very fully. The New York Journal engaged Mark Twain to cable a short account. We take from his article a few sentences:

"I was not dreaming of so stunning a show. All the nations seemed to be filing by. They all seemed to be represented. It was a sort of allegorical suggestion of the Last Day, and some who live to see that day will probably recall this one if they are not too much disturbed in mind at the time. . . . The feature of high romance was not wanting, for among them rode Prince Rupert of Bavaria, who would be Prince of Wales now and future King of England and Emperor of India if his Stuart ancestors had conducted their royal affairs more wisely than they did. He came as a peaceful guest to represent his mother, Princess Ludwig, heiress of the house of Stuart, to whom English Jacobites still pay unavailing homage as the rightful queen of England. The house of Stuart was formally and officially shelved nearly two centuries ago, but the microbe of Jacobite loyalty is a thing which is not exterminable by time, force or argument. . . . The Queen Empress was come. She was received with great enthusiasm. It was realisable that she was the procession herself; that all the rest of it was mere embroidery; that in her the public saw the British Empire itself. She was a symbol, an allegory of England's grandeur and the might of the British name. . . . It was a memorable display, and must live in history. It suggested the material glories of the reign finely and adequately. The absence of the chief creators of them was perhaps not a serious disadvantage. One could supply the vacancies by imagination, and thus fill out the procession very effectively. One can enjoy a rainbow without necessarily forgetting the forces that made it."

THE tribute to the late Laureate from a little band of Montenegrin poets was not the least noteworthy feature of the Jubilee. In the storm and stress of such an occasion there is a tendency to forget the past in the present. Hence we can the more appreciate the action of the few foreigners who laid a wreath of flowers on Tennyson's tomb in the Abbey in recognition of his stirring words in praise of the Montenegrin pluck and independence, and the part played by him in glorifying the Queen's reign.

THE absence of Mr. Rudyard Kipling from the band of poets who have sung the Diamond Jubilee has been much commented upon. Mr. Kipling, however, knows best, and we may rest assured that if he wrote nothing for the occasion it was because he had nothing to add to The Seven Seas. Meanwhile, we notice in the Saturday Review, in an article on the omissions from the list of Jubilee honours, this fine tribute of praise to the author of "The Song of the Banjo":

"There is one name in literature which, from the special point of view of the growth of the Imperial idea, might have well received recognition—we mean Mr. Rudyard Kipling. There is no question that it is he who has chiefly implanted in English minds the idea of the vast federal empire around the globe, the central idea which has made this Jubilee different from anything ever witnessed before. In this sense Kipling is greater than Wolsey, greater than Roberts, greater than both combined. Yet he has been given no honour. Verily, the administrators and defenders of the empire have been exalted at the expense of its extenders, of its real makers."

Our own view, as expressed last week, is that Jubilee honours are not ennobling; but we are glad to see Mr. Kipling thus spoken of.

MUCH interest attaches to the Logia, or Sayings of Christ, which Mr. Henry Frowde (Oxford University Press) is about to publish for the Egypt Exploration Fund. The papyrus leaf on which the sayings are written in uncials was found on the borders of the Libyan desert in January last, by Messrs. B. P. Grenfell and A. S. Hunt, and it has been jealously guarded ever since. The collection of sayings may have been made even earlier than the beginning of the second century, and it is affirmed that at any rate the writing itself cannot be later than the third, or a hundred years prior to any existing MS. of the Gospels. The Logia are detached sayings, without context, emphatic and precise in character. Each verse begins with the words "Jesus saith."

Two illustrated editions of the book will be issued, one for a few pence with the design of placing the treasure within the reach of everybody. In the better edition the papyrus page will be reproduced by colotype process, which shows the colour of the papyrus, and renders the writing clearer; and even in the cheaper edition the sayings will be reproduced by means of a tone block. In both editions Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt, will append translations and notes, and give parallel passages, &c., and the

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JULY 3, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

The Choir Invisible. By James Lane Allen.
(Macmillan & Co.)

Heralded by trumpets Mr. James Lane Allen's new novel comes to us from America. I have no hesitation in saying that The Choir Invisible is a book to read, and a book to keep after reading. Mr. Allen's gifts are many—a style pellucid and picturesque, a vivid and disciplined power of characterisation, and an intimate knowledge of a striking epoch and an alluring country. He transports us to Kentucky in the year 1795. The plot is not novel, Mr. Allen lays bare no sore, he develops no problem: it is just the story of a man who loved an attractive woman who was unworthy, intertwined with the history of another who was pure gold. That is all, but so magical is the wilderness environment, so fresh the characters, so buoyant the life they lead, so companionable, so well balanced, and so touched with humanity the author's personality, that I hereby send him greeting and thanks for a brave book. Mr. Allen is not so well known in this country as in the United States, but The Choir Invisible will remedy that. He has already written several novels, including Summer in Aroady, and A Kentucky Cardinal. I have not read either of those books—in fact (here is a frank confession), before I began upon The Choir Invisible I had not read one line of Mr. Allen's writings, and knew him only through appreciations in the American press. But it is clear he is a man who has worked long and diligently at his art, and that while he was chastening and controlling a manner, his matter was increasing in volume and quality.

What would he make of a modern story, I wonder. Here he has as background a glorious and undiscovered country, where the imagination is fired by mere descriptions of nature, and by pen pictures of the looks and dress of pioneer men. It is all so fresh, so new, so right, so sane, so different from the tired life that encompasses us. Does not this stir the imagination?—

"On the outskirts of the town lay the wilderness, undulating away for hundreds of miles like a vast green robe, with scarce a rift of human making."

Or this?—

"Seated on the roots of an oak were a group of young backwoodsmen—swarthy, lean, tall, wild and reckless of bearing—their long rifles propped against the tree or held fondly across the knees; the gray smoke of their pipes mingling with the gray of their jauntily worn raccoon-skin caps; the rifts of yellow sunlight blending with the yellow of their hunting shirts and tunics; their knives and powder-horns fastened in the belts that girt in their gaunt waists: the heroic youthful sinew of the old border folk. One among them, larger and handsomer than the others, had pleased his fancy by donning more nearly the Indian dress. His breech-clout was of dappled fawn-skin; his long thigh boots of thin deer-hide were open at the hips, leaving exposed the clear whiteness of his flesh; below the knees they were ornamented by a scarlet fringe tipped with the hoofs of fawns and the spurs of the wild turkey; and in his cap he wore intertwined wings of the hawk and the scarlet tanager."

Or this description of the side-tracks through the primeval forest?—

"Into this high road of the mastodon and the bison smaller pathways entered from each side, as lesser watercourses run into a river; the avenues of the round-horned elk, narrow, yet broad enough for the tossing of his lordly antlers; the track of the countless migrating shuffling bear; the slender woodland alleys along which buck and doe and fawn had sought the springs or crept tenderly from their breeding coverts or fled like shadows in the race for life; the devious wolf-runs of the maddened packs as they had sprang to the kill; the threadlike passages of the stealthy fox; the tiny trickle of the squirrel, crossing and recrossing without number; and ever close beside all these, unseen, the grass-path or the tree-path of the cougar."

As I have said, the plot of the story is of the slightest; but apart altogether from its engaging setting the story is told extremely well, and the objectivity of the characters will please the most fastidious. Amy Falconer is a fascinating creation, and the scene between her and John Gray, wherein this pretty minx does not explain why she cannot accompany him to the ball, is told with a delightful touch, and in the vein of the finest comedy.

Mr. Allen has a wide range, and from passages of summer-day philandering turns easily to such a vigorous chapter as that describing John Gray's fight with a cougar, the dreaded panther of the backwoodsman, which has for its kindred the royal tiger and the fatal leopard of the old world. The episode is too long to quote in full, but I must find room for the passage where the man first discovers the near, the very near, presence of the beast. It is early dawn, a fine drizzling rain has set in, and in a mood of deep dejection he has wandered into the schoolhouse.

"He sat at the upper end of the room, gazing blankly through the doorway at the gray light and clouds of white mist trailing. Once an object came into the field of his vision. At the first glimpse he thought it a dog—long, lean, skulking, prowling, tawny—on the scent of his tracks. Then the mist passed over it. When he beheld it again it had approached nearer, and was creeping rapidly toward the door. His listless eyes grew fascinated by its motions—its litheness, suppleness, grace, stealth, exquisite caution. Never before had he seen a dog with the step of a cat. A second time the fog closed over it, and then, advancing right out of the cloud with more swiftness, more cunning, its large feet falling as lightly as flakes of snow, the weight of its huge body borne forward as noiselessly as the trailing mist, it came straight on. It reached the hickory block which formed the doorstep; it paused there an instant, with its fore-quarters in the doorway, one forefoot raised, the end of its long tail waving; and then it stole just over the doorway and crouched, its head pressed down until its long, whitish throat lay on the floor; its short, jagged ears set forward stiffly like the broken points of a javelin; its dilated eye blazing with steady green fire—as still as death. And then, with his blood become as ice in his veins from horror, and all the strength gone out from him in a death-like faintness, the schoolmaster realised that he was face to face unarmed with a cougar, gaunt with famine and come for its kill."

Mr. Allen's narrative skill is but one of the many qualities of a ripe, vigorous, and sympathetic nature. The Choir Invisible is a fine achievement.

* * * * *

An African Millionaire. By Grant Allen.
(Grant Richards.)

This is not a hill-top novel. An African Millionaire belongs to Mr. Grant Allen's other fictional manner—his derivative manner. It owes its existence, I should conjecture, to Mr. Conan Doyle's Adventures of Sherlock Holmes. Mr. Grant Allen was too wise to attempt to invent another and better detective; so he decided upon the converse, and has given us a series of the great frauds practised by the notorious Colonel Clay upon Sir Charles Vandrift, the African millionaire. The book purports to be written by Sir Charles Vandrift's brother-in-law and secretary, who, after the manner of Watson in Mr. Grant Allen's model, does his best to cheapen himself. These self-effacing chroniclers can become very tiresome! I have read Mr. Allen's book through, but I cannot admit ever to feeling genuine interest, so obviously manufactured are the stories. Every story of crime or deception is, of course, manufactured—even the matchless mosaics of Gaboriau were manufactured—but there is all the difference in the world between the detective stories of a man with a natural bent towards mystification and the stories of a man who produces them merely because they are the fashion. Mr. Grant Allen is a literary opportunist. He is a very clever one, but he is not painstaking enough to carry me away with any of his inventions.

For less exacting readers, for readers who demand less verisimilitude, An African Millionaire may be exciting. But even they will find hard nuts to crack. Such a young woman, for example, as Colonel Clay's wife could not have reappeared in half-a-dozen different roles in broad daylight, as she is made to do, and never be detected. Only where false beards or whiskers can be worn would such deception be possible, especially with men whose suspicions are aroused. Again, no one possessing Colonel Clay's intelligence would ever dare to assume in New York the name and personality of a well-known English man of letters. The interchange of authors between the two countries has long been too brisk. Again, Mr. Allen has not sufficiently carefully co-ordinated the episodes. In the first story Colonel Clay is made the height of Sir Charles Vandrift—that is to say, middle height; subsequently he becomes on one occasion "a little parson"; on another, a German professor, of long, thin build; on another, a detective described as a small man. Let Colonel Clay disguise his features as he will, his stature must remain practically unaltered. There are other discrepancies disquieting to a reader who, like myself, loves a good story of crime above everything: the total results being that I cannot recommend An African Millionaire to specialists in this kind of fiction. Nor is it possible to quote from it.

* * * *

Darab's Wine-Cup, and Other Tales. By Bart Kennedy.
(Sidney Oliff.)

Mr. Kennedy has a wild and whirling imagination, a lurid imagination, an imagination that revels in tragedy. Also he has declared war against the principal verb. The result resembles the horror and confusion of primal chaos:

"She fell asleep and she dreamed of gold. Bright, yellow, terrible gold. Gold that glittered, that flashed, that shone with shine unutterable. Gold. Gold that slimed, that crushed, that choked. The unspeakable transmuter that changed all things even to gold. That brought all things to its own level. That weighed all things. That moved all things. That slew all things. That was at once as life and death. Frightful paradox—Gold."

Here you have a picture of the thinker and the poet:

"He had attained to the full flower of his individuality. He was a king by the divine right of his intellect. Thoughts sublime, pictures vivid, truths potent, came from him. Flowers of wisdom grew in the garden of his imagination. Through him spoke the varied phases of Nature—of life. Dashings of waters, songs of birds, thrills of love, subtleties of feeling, and the trend and complexities of civilisation were revealed in his pictures."

A glance at the portrait at the beginning of the volume, with its upreared head, scornful lip, and flashing eye, with the trend and complexities of civilisation indicated by a pince-nez, will leave no doubt as to the original from which this stirring description was drawn.

Finally, I may cull from the garden of Mr. Bart Kennedy's imagination an admirable and penetrating criticism of his own romantic manner:

"He couldn't tell exactly where he was going, or why he was going, or where he would stop. He was just going. That was all."

* * *

The Romance of Golden Star. By George Griffith.
(F. V. White & Co.)

Mr. Griffith's leading character is a revived mummy from a primal South American civilisation. He was found by an exploring professor and restored to life after a sleep of 360 years by a doctor experienced in the occult. The story is essentially one of action and adventure, and except when the mummy croons about his lost kingdom and the glories of his former life, I have been able to read it with interest and attention. After so startling a beginning as the resurrection of Vilcaroya, one is, of course, prepared for an essay in the romantic manner, and, to do Mr. Griffith justice, his accounts of the old Incas and their treasure houses are very well done, and at least as plausible as were the jewel caves in King Solomon's Mines of yore. I can quite well imagine that an adventurous boy would want to take his passage as a stowaway for South America on the strength of them. The women of the book, one of whom has also done time as a mummy, are superfluous, and impede the current of the narrative. Women naturally would be in the way on a treasure expedition. Here is one of Mr. Griffith's descriptions of Peruvian magnificence:

"From the cornice to the floor hung the bright-hued hangings, and against these were ranged along the floor on either side threescore seats of silver, and the floor was paved with diamond-shaped blocks of gold and silver set alternately. Behind the throne on which I sat rose from the floor to roof a sloping wall of golden ingots, and on either hand stood a great golden vase, heaped high with unset gems, emeralds and diamonds, pearls and sapphires and rubies, precious almost beyond price; and on the roof above my throne a great golden image of the sun, encircled by spreading rays of gems, glowed and sparkled in the light of the candles and torches."

The doctor becomes quite demoralised by the quantity of gold and jewels, and betrays his friends, so that he is shut up in a prison made of gold blocks, and then condemned to death:

"There is your house of gold. Go and dwell in it till it shall be safe for me to release you. Every day, as I have said, you shall eat and drink from plates and cups of gold, and you shall dream of gold until this gold-fever of yours is cured."

The manner of his death is consistent with his uncanny powers:

"Then with a soldier holding each of his arms, and two others grasping his shoulders, he drew a quick, deep, gasping breath. The blood rushed into his face till its pallor became purple. The next instant it became deathly white again. His jaw dropped, his eyes grew fixed and blindly staring, and then his shape seemed to shrink together like an empty bag, and he sank down between those who were holding him."

* * * *

The Light of the Eye. By H. J. Chaytor.
(Digby, Long & Co.)

Whatever faults may be found with Mr. Chaytor as a writer of fiction, he certainly does not lack a daring imagination. The Light of the Eye carries one among all sorts of strange people. College dons who work miracles and penetrate, disguised, into Tibetan Lamaseries; detectives who read Kant's Kritik for relaxation, or rather for mental exercise; and a vampire of the most approved order who creates a panic in London, in this nineteenth century, by draining the vitality of casual people in the street, and leaving them in a dying condition to puzzle the hospital surgeons. When I add that the plot centres round a diamond, cigar-shaped and three inches long, I feel that I shall have roused my readers to the highest pitch of excitement, an excitement which they must allay for themselves by reading the book, for I can tell them no more of the plot. I believe that average readers do not go to the novel for style, and therefore Mr. Chaytor's deficiencies in that respect will not distress them, but if they do not expect style, its absence will doubtless be atoned for by the sprinkling of familiar Latin quotations which adorn Mr. Chaytor's pages. With what I am more inclined to quarrel is his dialogue. His undergraduates talk in this sort of way:

"'Comfortable place you have here,' he began, 'and a further advantage is Florence Athelstone's society. I made her acquaintance when I was on tour, as she probably told you.'"

"'She has,' said Carronar, with some show of indifference.

"'And you are a bit—eh?'"

"'I don't see why you should say so, you seem impressed yourself.'"

"'Not I, my dear chap; she is all very nice, but I prefer someone with a sense of humour. She has none absolutely. And I have orders to look out for an heiress, American dollars preferred.'"

"'Sense of humour is no drawback. One doesn't want to be always on the gag.'"

"'Exactly; she is your affinity, you know.'"

"'Don't talk such trash!' said Carronar with vehemence."

This rather tempts one to adapt Shakespeare, and sing "It was an 'Arry and his Lass." Again, the young lady in question, Miss Athelstone, strikes me as expressing herself oddly in conversation with Carronar. Speaking of the attitude of her family towards her engagement, she says:

"'I fancy they are all keen on it; he has been here a good deal since you went away; he lives close at hand too, and I don't dislike him.'"

"'Is that all you can say of him? When did he ask you?'"

"A week ago; he was going away then."

"And what did he say?"

"Oh, I don't know. He is coming for his answer this afternoon, anyway."

"Well, it will be a wrench."

"It will indeed. You know I have always thought of you as a brother; there never was any restraint between us, or any of those idiotic compliments that so many fools think necessary."

I don't seem to recognise in this the gentle feminine accents of the daughter of a country vicar.

But these are faults of inexperience. At present Mr. Chaytor's dialogue, all his writing indeed, strikes me as not sufficiently painstaking. But his book is more readable than less faulty novels of the ordinary circulating library type.

* * *

God Save the Queen: a Tale of '37. By Allen Upward.
(Chatto & Windus.)

Mr. Allen Upward's new book may be called a special Diamond Jubilee novel. It tells of a conspiracy hatched by the friends of the Duke of Cumberland sixty years ago to place that very unpopular prince on the throne instead of Her Gracious Majesty. The idea is a bold one, and Mr. Upward has treated it adroitly, though I think he is scarcely fair to the officers of the Household Brigade, temp. William IV. For not only do these gentlemen hatch treason freely under the auspices of a shady Hanoverian baron, but they do not scruple to murder, under the forms of a duel, those of their brother officers who are on the other side, while one of them resorts to cheating at cards in order to force the hero of the story, Hervey, to throw up his commission because he is opposed to the Duke of Cumberland's faction. But Mr. Upward may fairly plead that conspirators seldom pick and choose as to the means they employ for gaining an end.

God Save the Queen is full of exciting moments and perilous adventures, and its author's light-hearted contempt for historical facts prepossesses me in his favour. His loyalty is unquestionable, but at times I find it a little overwhelming. Listen to this:

"Don't say Alexandrina," Fanny interrupted. "Her Royal Highness herself told me that she prefers her second name. When she ascends the throne she means to reign as QUEEN VICTORIA."

"The young man bowed. The magic of the syllables sounded in his ear like a deep trumpet blast, and stirred his heart with a prophetic thrill, as if already he could feel the glamour of the sixty years of freedom and happiness and glory that were to make that name immortal in the annals of the world."

But though Mr. Upward is liable to occasional moments of hysterical exaltation, he is not always at these heights. For the rest, his book contains some clever sketches of the great men of 1837—the Iron Duke, Lord Melbourne, Lord Palmerston, Lord George Bentinck, and so on. Indeed, one of the charms of a book of this kind is that it enables the author to prophesy gracefully after the event, as in the following remark of one of the characters about Palmerston:

"I believe he is an able man but without much principle. He has been in office for twenty years, but yet they say he wields no real influence. People don't take him seriously, and the Radicals don't trust him because he was lukewarm over Reform. But he is a good debater, and has a great knowledge of the Continent. I shouldn't wonder if he came to something yet."

Altogether, God Save the Queen is an ingenious piece of work, cleverly put together and eminently readable.

* * *

The Girls at the Grange. By Florence Warden.
(F. V. White & Co.)

I have not read a book of Miss Warden's since her clever detective story, The House on the Marsh. In the interval she seems to have pretty well exhausted her vein. The Girls at the Grange is a wonderfully improbable story—the first half being the more improbable and the second half the more wonderful. You jump from a demure household of four orthodox conventional girls and an obstinate, mouse-like mother to a gambling hell located in a Kent country-house. The ladies are invited to the country-house by a Jew money-lender; and as the invitation is apparently given for no consideration received, and out of pure gaiety of heart, one naturally suspects its motives. In the meantime one gets rather tired of Mrs. Drew's wax-like hand and her little shawl. Presently young men begin to turn up, and it appears that the respectable family are intended to throw a halo around the place, while the gambling goes on undisturbed. Of character-drawing there is but little. The eldest Miss Drew is a mere puppet, who tosses her head languidly, buries it in her book or breaks her eye-glasses. She is quite unnecessary to the story.

"In a corner of the room, with a reading-table beside her, sat Julia, the eldest daughter, who had not yet spoken. She was tall and thin, dark-haired and sallow, and she held a very high place in the family estimation on account of her intellectual qualities. She read a great deal, and she wore glasses to read with; and she let the family affairs trickle on for the most part without interference and without comment. It was understood that these things were beneath her."

The most amusing personage is Miss Doris. Her demure way of refusing a proposal is almost the only humorous touch in a wearisome book.

"Doris said nothing. She was always economical of words."

"You don't care for me, I suppose?" said he at last, in a low voice.

"I like you," replied Doris, very deliberately. "I have always found you very nice."

"But not nice enough for Manitoba?" suggested Sutton mournfully. "I was afraid you wouldn't!"

"It isn't Manitoba that I object to," replied she, after a long pause, "nor Florida either. I like oranges. But—you see, you would not go there of your own free will, but because you had to hide me away somewhere. Now, I won't marry to be hidden away!"

* * *

The Craftsman. By Rowland Grey.
(Ward, Lock & Co.)

One is perhaps getting a little weary of the literary person as a subject for fiction. And nearly all the characters in The Craftsman are engaged in writing, or in acting, or at least in type-writing plays. Rowland Grey writes freshly, and as if she took her work seriously. I should not be surprised if she gave us an excellent story some day. The present one is slight, but it contains two or three excellent studies of character. The best is Markham Le Mesurier, the playwright. The book begins with the failure of his "Repentance of Miriam," and ends with the success of his "Remembrance," and his happy marriage with Melita Frayne. Contrasted with him is Hawtrey Sharron, the superficial writer of popular comedies. It is the contrast of the artist and the charlatan. In the moment of success Mesurier realises his love for the woman to whose influence over him that success is mainly due:

"It has been a great night. If life never holds another like it, it will still have been worth living to the utmost. What do you think was the supreme moment?"

"When they called for you again and again with all their might, when the whole theatre rang with applause, when you knew you had conquered, made your name?"

"There was a pause, broken only by the merry jingle of the time-keeping bells."

"No, not then."

"When Vane Tillotson thrilled us all so in the third act, when it was so still you might have heard a pin fall?"

"No, not then. Melita, the happiest moment of all was when, in the last act, I saw your face as you watched. How tender it grew! How you listened!—listened as if you, too—Then I heard another voice within me speaking clearly. It told me that in all the world there was only one woman I could love. I am poor and faulty, unworthy of your utter purity, but I love you—I love you."

The story ends with a charming little idyll of the honeymoon.

"Como in spring sunset, with an April sky flushing the gleaming lake with rose and traces of lucent gold. Judas trees, all in imperial purple, on the cool, green shores. In the lush meadows, millions of poets' narcissus, keeping rare company with spotted orchis and the cowslips we vainly fancy to be England's pride. The angelus softly calling from the white churches perched in the misty hills. And upon the water a gaily painted boat."

"Is it only in fairy tales they live happily ever after? They had waited a year to be married when spring came back again, and found it worth their patience. Three days ago London in a grey fog; and now all this splendour of budding life, this scented air, this encompassing enchantment."

SOAP

is scientifically defined as the neutral compound of fatty acids with an alkaline base. Neutral is the important word.

Eeckelaers' Toilet Soaps

alone fulfil the conditions perfectly. Excess of alkali renders soap caustic: super-fatting renders it greasy and disagreeable. A really skilful soap manufacturer makes soap neutral.

ASK the Perfumer (or Perfumery Department at "the Stores") for the following, in boxes of three tablets:—

ECKELAERS' BROWN WINDSOR SOAP .. .. .	1s.
ECKELAERS' SPRING ROSE SOAP .. .. .	1s. 6d.
ECKELAERS' OPOPONAX SOAP .. .. .	1s. 9d.
ECKELAERS' BOUQUET DE VIOLETTES SOAP .. .. .	2s.

The exquisite perfume and dainty boxing of these soaps peculiarly recommend them. Unrivalled in the nursery.

Mends Everything.

LEPAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co., Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co., and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition, London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use.

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber, Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums, Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers' Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron.

Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s.; Pints, 3s.; and Quarts, 4s. 6d. each; and in bottles for family use at 6d. and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order. Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's SWISS MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

Guy's Tonic acts immediately upon the Stomach, Liver, and entire Intestinal Tract.

"22, Oxford Road,
"Finsbury Park, N.

"I have now taken Guy's Tonic, and unhesitatingly testify to its worth. Guy's Tonic acts immediately upon the Digestive Organs.

"A. B. COPE."

Guy's Tonic, by causing thorough Digestion, Absorption, and Assimilation, insures good Blood-making, thus removing Debility and Emaciation.

"Woolhara, Morthoe,
"North Devon.

"Since I commenced to take Guy's Tonic my Appetite has improved, and I am putting on Flesh.

"LAWSON COAD."

Guy's Tonic, by regulating the Functions of the Liver, Kidneys, and other Glands, keeps the Blood pure and the Body in good Health.

"20, Melville Street, Edinburgh.

"I really feel quite vexed with myself for not letting you know long ago how very much benefited I feel from your valuable Guy's Tonic. I have not felt so well for years. I shall ever be grateful to Guy's Tonic for the good, robust Health I am now enjoying.

"MARIA BAYNE."

Guy's Tonic being a Nervine Nutrient invigorates and revitalises the Brain and nervous System, and through these acts specifically upon every Organ and Tissue in the economy of man.

"The Quay, East Loos, Cornwall.

"I have taken two bottles of Guy's Tonic. It is doing me good, I sleep better, and do not suffer so much in my Stomach and Nerves as I did. I have been so weak at times that I could neither eat, work, nor sleep.

"M. PEARCE."

Guy's Tonic should be instantly resorted to

When Digestion is accompanied by Flatulency;

When Pain, Weight, Fulness or Distension is felt after Eating;

When there is Drowsiness after Meals;

When there is Distaste for Food of all kinds;

When there is a Dull, Weak, Failing Appetite;

When there is a Loss of Flesh, and Strength is gradually diminishing.

All Chemists and Stores sell Guy's Tonic.

ALEXANDER POPE

From the Drawing by W. Hoare, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery

Logia themselves will also be transcribed in ordinary Greek characters.

It may be mentioned that the explorers in the course of four months' work at Oxyrhynchus, aided by upwards of 120 men and boys, discovered sufficient papyri to fill twenty-four large packing-cases. The Egyptian Government has retained 150 large and complete rolls, and Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt will examine and edit some of these, and the fragments that they have brought home, with a view to subsequent publication.

In 1894, Mr. George Smith was the guest at a dinner given in his honour by the contributors to the Dictionary of National Biography. This month Mr. Smith intends to return the compliment, and entertain those gentlemen who have helped to make that work the monument of usefulness it is. Some of the lady biographers who have assisted in the task are, we understand, not a little hurt at their exclusion from this banquet. But possibly Mr. Smith has a little plan of his own for their peculiar benefit.

In commenting upon the ignorance of the best English fiction displayed by the modern undergraduate, who is alleged by a writer in the Granta to read nothing but the trashiest novels of the day, the Spectator drops into prophecy, and does it, we think, a little clumsily. It is a difficult matter to prove a prediction erroneous at the time it is made, and yet we feel that the Spectator must be wrong when it deprecates the taste of undergraduates, because "from this class of young men are shortly to come our novelists, our journalists, our poets." It is not from this class of young men that have come our novelists, our journalists, our poets heretofore, and we doubt if the condition of affairs is about to alter.

TRADITION is with the Spectator in the matter of poets, although the most illustrious of the younger poets of to-day are not university men. Browning and Tennyson and Matthew Arnold were once undergraduates. But Mr. Kipling was not, nor Mr. Francis Thompson, nor Mr. Yeats, nor Mr. Watson. Among novelists of distinction it has been the exception to be a university man. Thackeray was, it is true. But Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, Dickens, Trollope, Ainsworth, Lever, Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy, "Mark Rutherford"—none of these were university men. As for journalism, the school for journalists is not the universities but the world.

THE Westminster Gazette, in correcting a misprint a little while since, said "the title of Mr. S. Levett-Yeats's new story was given in our columns the other day as 'A Galahad of the Greeks.' It should, of course, have been 'A Galahad of the Creeks.'" This "of course" seems yet another slight on Turkey's luckless victims,

MR. GEORGE DU MAURIER's last novel, The Martian, ends in the July number of Harper's. The closing chapters have that playful yet pathetic tenderness of which Mr. Du Maurier was a master. This little song, from the French of Sully-Prudhomme, is printed in the final chapter:

If you but knew what tears, alas!
One weeps for kinship unbested,
In pity you would sometimes pass
My poor abode!

If you but knew what balm, for all
Despond, lies in an angel's glance,
Your looks would on my window fall
As though by chance!

If you but knew the heart's delight
To feel its fellow-heart is by,
You'd linger, as a sister might,
These gates anigh!

If you but knew how oft I yearn
For one sweet voice, one presence dear,
Perhaps you'd even simply turn
And enter here!

MR. BIRRELL, in an article on Johnson in the Speaker, incidentally offers counsel concerning dust. "Dust," says he, "is a delusion. You should never dust books. There let it lie until the rare hour arrives when you want to read a particular volume; then warily approach it with a snow-white napkin, take it down from its shelf, and, withdrawing to some back apartment, proceed to cleanse the tome." Yet we think the habit of dusting books regularly is one to be encouraged. The man who dusts his books often may now and then go so far as to open one.

SOME time ago Miss Kate Sanborn, the American authoress, wrote a book describing her experiment with an old farm which she rescued from decay to fruitfulness. The book became very popular. An American paper now contains the following advertisement:

"'ADOPTING AN ABANDONED FARM.'—The scene of, and the former home of, the popular novelist, Kate Sanborn; 3 minutes from station, post-office and electric cars; now offered at an abandoned farm price; 1150-lb. horse, cow, hens, pung, sleigh, double and single harnesses, farm wagon, new democrat, tipcart, wheelbarrow, grindstone, all farming tools, &c."

MR. GEORGE ALLEN has just sent to press The Free Library: its History and Present Condition, from the pen of Mr. J. J. Ogle, the librarian of the Bootle Free Library. The volume is edited by Dr. Richard Garnett.

MESSRS. A. CONSTABLE & Co. will shortly publish a work dealing with "The Siege of Delhi in the Indian Mutiny." The author, Colonel H. M. Vibart, endeavours to show that the fall of Delhi was principally due to Colonel Richard Baird-Smith. In all the mass of Mutiny literature Colonel Baird-Smith's great services have been but scantily recognised, and it is Colonel Vibart's wish to place before the public the true positions of the various actors in the scene.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXIV.—POPE.

THERE was born in eighteenth century England a pale little diseased wretch of a boy. Since it was evident that he would never be fit for any healthy and vigorous trade, and that he must all his life be sickly and burdensome to himself, and since it is the usual way of such unhappy beings to add to their unhappiness by their own perversities of choice, he naturally became a poet. And after living for long in a certain miserable state called glory, reviled and worshipped and laughed at and courted, despised by the women he loved, very ill looked after, amid the fear and malignity of many and the affection of very few, the wizened little suffering monstrosity died, and was buried in Westminster Abbey, by way of encouraging others to follow in his footsteps. And though a large number of others have done so with due and proper misfortune, in all the melancholy line there is, perhaps, no such destined a wretch as Alexander Pope. What fame can do to still the cravings of such a poor prodigal of song, in the beggarly raiment of his tattered body, that it did for him. The husks of renown he had in plenty, and had them all his life, as no other poet has had. But Voltaire testified that the author of that famous piece of philosophy, "Whatever is, is right," was the most miserable man he had ever known.

This king of the eighteenth century is still the king of the eighteenth century by general consent. Dryden was a greater poet, meo judicio, but he did not represent the eighteenth century so well as Pope. All that was elegant and airy in the polished artificiality of that age reaches its apotheosis in the "Rape of the Lock." It is Pope's masterpiece, a Watteau in verse. The poetry of manners could no further go than in this boudoir epic, unmatched in any literature. It is useless, I may here say, to renew the old dispute whether Pope was a poet. Call his verse poetry or what you will, it is work in verse which could not have been done in prose, and, of its kind, never equalled. Then the sylph machinery in "The Rape of the Lock" is undoubted work of fancy: the fairyland of powder and patches, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" seen through chocolate-fumes. The "Essay on Man" is nought to us nowadays, as a whole. It has brilliant artificial passages. It has homely aphorisms such as only Pope and Shakespeare could produce—the quintessence of pointed common sense: many of them have passed into the language, and are put down, by three out of five who quote them, to Shakespeare. But, as a piece of reasoning in verse, the "Essay on Man" is utterly inferior to Dryden's "Hind and Panther." Even that brilliant achievement could not escape the doom which hangs over the didactic poem pure and simple; and certain, therefore, was the fate of the "Essay on Man."

The "Dunciad" De Quincey ranked even above the "Rape of the Lock." At my peril I venture to question a judgment backed by all the ages. The superb satire of parts of the poem I admit; I admit the exceedingly fine close, in which Pope touched a height he never touched before or after; I admit the completeness of the scheme. But from that completeness comes the essential defect of the poem. He adapted the scheme from Dryden's "Mac-Flecknoe." But Dryden's satire is at once complete and succinct: Pope has built upon the scheme an edifice greater than it will bear; has extended a witty and ingenious idea to a portentous extent at which it ceases to be amusing. The mock solemnity of Dryden's idea becomes a very real and dull solemnity when it is extended to literal epic proportions. A serious epic is apt to nod, with the force of a Milton behind it; an epic satire fairly goes to sleep. A pleasantry in several books is past a pleasantry. And it is bolstered out with a great deal which is sheer greasy scurrility. The mock-heroic games of the poets are in large part as dully dirty as the waters into which Pope makes them plunge. If the poem had been half as long, it might have been a masterpiece. As it is, unless we are to reckon masterpieces by avoirdupois weight, or to assign undue value to mere symmetry of scheme, I think we must look for Pope's satirical masterpiece elsewhere. Not in the satire on women, where Pope seems hardly to have his heart in his work; but in the imitations from Horace, those generally known as Pope's "Satires." Here he is at his very best and tersest. They are as brilliant as anything in the "Dunciad," and they are brilliant right through; the mordant pen never flags. It matters not that they are imitated from Horace. They gain by it: their limits are circumscribed, their lines laid down, and Pope writes the better for having these limits set him, this tissue on which to work. Not a whit does he lose in essential originality: nowhere is he so much himself. It is very different from Horace, say the critics. Surely that is exactly the thing for which to thank poetry and praise Pope. It has not the pleasant urbane good humour of the Horatian spirit. No, it has the spirit of Pope—and satire is the gainer. Horace is the more charming companion; Pope is the greater satirist. In place of an echo of Horace (and no verse translation was ever anything but feeble which attempted merely to echo the original), we have a new spirit in satire; a fine series of English satirical poems, which in their kind are unapproached by the Roman, and in his kind wisely avoid the attempt to approach him. "Satires after Horace" would have been a better title than "Imitations"; for less imitative poems in essence were never written. These and the "Rape of the Lock" are Pope's finest title to fame. The "Elegy on an Unfortunate Lady," has at least one part which shows a pathos, little to have been surmised from his later work; and so, perhaps (in a much less degree, I think), have fragments of the once famous "Eloisa to Abelard." But the "Pastorals," and the "Windsor Forest," and the "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day," and other things in which Pope tried the serious or natural vein, are only fit to be remembered with Macpherson's Ossian and the classical enormities of the French painter David.

On the whole, it is as a satirist we must think of him, and the second greatest in the language. The gods are in pairs, male and female; and if Dryden was the Mars of English satire, Pope was the Venus—a very eighteenth century Venus, quite as conspicuous for malice as for elegance. If a woman's satire were informed with genius, and cultivated to the utmost perfection of form by lifelong and exclusive literary practice, one imagines it would be much like Pope's. His style seems to me feminine in what it lacks; the absence of any geniality, any softening humour to abate its mortal thrust. It is feminine in what it has, the malice, the cruel dexterity, the delicate needle point which hardly betrays its light and swift entry, yet stings like a bee. Even in his coarseness—as in the "Dunciad"—Pope appears to me female. It is the coarseness of the fine ladies of that material time, the Lady Maries and the rest of them. Dryden is a rough and thick-natured man, cudgelling his adversaries with coarse speech in the heat of brawl and the bluntness of his sensibilities; a country squire, who is apt at times to use the heavy end of his cutting whip; but when Pope is coarse he is coarse with effort, he goes out of his way to be nasty, in the evident endeavour to imitate a man. It is a girl airing the slang of her schoolboy brother. The one thing, perhaps, which differentiates him from a woman, and makes it possible to read his verse with a certain pleasure, without that sense of unrelieved cruelty which repels one in much female satire, is his artist's delight in the exercise of his power. You feel that, if there be malice, intent to wound, even spite, yet none of these count for so much with him as the exercise of his superb dexterity in fence. He is like Ortheris fondly patting his rifle after that long shot which knocked over the deserter, in Mr. Kipling's story. After all, you reflect, it is fair fight; if his hand was against many men, many men's hands were against him. So you give yourself up to admire the shell-like epigram, the rocketing and dazzling antithesis, the exquisitely deft play of point, by which the little invalid kept in terror his encompassing cloud of enemies—many of them adroit and formidable wits themselves. And you think, also, that the man who was loved by Swift, the professional hater, was not a man without a heart; though he wrote the most finished and brilliant satire in the language. FRANCIS THOMPSON.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. GABRIEL MONOD's volume of Portraits et Souvenirs is interesting and instructive. The first, Victor Hugo, is the slightest, but M. Monod writes of Michelet at first hand. He owes his vocation as historian to this incomparable master, and enthusiastically repays his debt. On Michelet's flagrant defects he is silent, shows his evocative, impassioned, unexpected moods, the intensity of his vision and interpretative genius, but conceals what irritates the sober foreigner in his tempestuous character, his excessive picturesqueness, his sentimentality, the too French, rhetorical and hysterical note, with the prolonged Hugoesque strain that runs through his most erudite work. But there is a charm in the logical naïveté of such a scholar as M. Michelet, and this M. Monod reveals. His study of J. R. Green, our own historian, is judicious and sympathetic. He concludes with a noble tribute to the English race:

"No other people has ever raised to such a height the sentiment of human dignity as the English race has done. It may have deserved hate—it has always commanded esteem. It has given admirable examples to the world not only of work, of perseverance, of individual initiative, but also of the love of liberty, of resistance to oppression, of immovable fidelity to duty. The ruin of England would not only mean the defeat of freedom in the world, the world itself would lose something of its nobility."

A fine phrase of the German historian Georges Waitz he records:

"My best works are my pupils; I hold to them the most, and believe I have best succeeded with them. My books will be surpassed and forgotten, but they will have served to form savants who will produce better ones."

Women should esteem Victor Duruy if only because, in the teeth of clerical opposition, he was the first minister to establish lecture courses for French young girls. The pages on James Darmesteter are full of tenderness and delicate sympathy, not however equal to the exquisite and luminous essay of Gaston Paris, but worth reading. The most interesting essays are those on the Russian explorer Mikluho-Maclay, and on the Bayreuth Festival. Of Wagner's personality he writes:

"He was not a man, he was an element, a force of nature, a force guided by sovereign will and intelligence. Those who assisted at this evocation of a world of form and sound at the master's voice have before them an unforgettable vision of the creative spirit ordaining chaos to draw therefrom the Universe."

A strain of diabolical cleverness runs through all the Dernières Lettres de Femmes of M. Marcel Prévost. This brilliant writer's study of women is exclusively concerned with matters of "temperament." Sex is too insistent, but within its limitations it is confoundingly cruel and true. The pity is that so probing and analytical a regard as his should so persistently pass by the woman without "a temperament." For there are many, and their characters, lives, and purposes are not the least happy and interesting. So century-end an author could not be expected to understand or consider such a naïve and old-fashioned an affair as a sentimental passion, yet a large study of the feminine heart should embrace this purer view of passion, for sentiment did not really disappear with the Keepsake period. M. Prévost inters it with the Tulleries. Adultery then covered its tear-bedewed face with the veil of honest remorse, and evoked irresistible passion as an excuse; now a young woman of society visits her old-fashioned godmother and cries radiantly:

"'You know, godmother, it's for to-morrow.' 'What's for to-morrow, dearest?' 'Why—Maurice. . . . I try a dress at Blanchet's at six, and, if I can get away in time, I'll come and tell you all about it, that will be an alibi.'"

And the sentimental godmother of Empire days, who betrayed her husband in the romantic way years ago, sits and muses tearfully on this new-fashioned method of besmattering the matron's honest robe between a visit and trial of a gown. "In those days," she reflects, "it was not the fashion to make fun of love between lovers. We only laughed at wedded love." May not the hard, cynical, new manner be a sensible step toward improved morals? The Empire state of affairs was by no means the best. In spite of the viciousness, wilful and boastful, gaining thereby a shadow of innocence, is there not a fresh little point of wisdom and sound cool reason in Aline's concluding remark, after she has, in the manner of our cynical "Jeunes," described the affair:

"'Are you happy at least?' asks the sentimental godmother, ready to pardon frailty if it implied happiness. 'Oh, it is less of a bore being forbidden fruit. But really that women should find it worth risking their tranquillity for so little! . . . But just think of my husband's face if he knew!'"

A young widow of society invades her brother's appartement one evening, and hearing that he sups in the equivocal world, insists that he shall take her as "a young person" making her official début in Paris. The ladies of the party, all lovely and well dressed, maintain a provincial correctness of deportment, talk rents, affairs of change, social questions, dramatic art, music, &c. The aristocrat believing the conversation to run on these correct lines on her account, begins to tell an anecdote of the great world, with virtuous consternation as a result. Her brother blushes and explains to the ladies of the other world, "You see, she does not know. In a little while she will behave better." He explains afterwards to his sister: "It is always like that. You see for yourself what going on a spree means. It isn't very funny, but one must pass one's evenings somehow." Meditating on what she has seen, the aristocrat cries: "How well I understand that they should play at respectable women in the hours of repose, as we of our world reverse the game in our provincial leisure." The idea has been worked at greater length in that amusing piece Paris Fin-de-Siècle.

M. André Theuriot's new novel, Boisfleury, is a well-written, readable, insignificant book. The landscape is agreeable that surrounds a dull little town among the mountains, but not a character interests us. We are asked to follow the futile flirtation and still more futile liaison of an extremely futile young man, who, had he not been French, and consequently condemned to look for a dot, might have married the girl he preferred first to jilt tearfully, or the widow he preferred afterwards to seduce joyously, and breaks what we are asked to regard as his heart, an organ of no account whatever.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Dernières Lettres de Femmes. Marcel Prévost.
Les Jeunes. Henri Lavedan.
Nos Fils. Hugues Le Roux.
Dans la Brume. Léon de Tinseau.
Autour de Balzac. Vicomte de Spoelberch de Louvenjoul.

MRS. OLIPHANT,

BY ONE WHO KNEW HER.

It is difficult to realise that one who was so full of life and mental vigour has passed away. The name of Mrs. Oliphant is so well known wherever English is read that it seems almost useless to enumerate the works which have made her name a household word among us. If she had only written the Chronicles of Carlingford, The Beleaguered City, and The Life of Edward Irving she would have taken her place among the best writers of the century.

Margaret Wilson was born at Wallingford, near Musselburgh, in 1828, and in 1849 her first book, Margaret Mailland, was published. In 1852 she married her cousin, and from that time until three weeks ago she never ceased from writing. In health and in sickness, in joy and in sorrow, in weal and in woe that indefatigable brain and pen worked on. Her husband, Francis Oliphant, was an artist, and some of his designs for glass windows gave promise of much success. But he only lived seven years after their marriage, during most of which he was in delicate health, ultimately dying of consumption in Italy.

Children were born, and the mother's hands and head were kept busily employed, while her heart ached sadly as three of the five babies died, leaving her at her husband's death with one boy and one girl, to whom, six weeks later, a little delicate boy was added. The last to come to her, he was the last to leave her, and when he, too, died, after years of ceaseless care and watching, she felt she had no further reason for living on. Burden upon burden was laid upon her willing shoulders, and not one was cast off by herself; she bore them kindly and tenderly, till they were lifted from her by no act or wish of her own. Her brother and his family were her welcome honoured guests, and at his death his children became as near as possible to her own; nor were these the only children to whom she became a second mother. Never was there a woman who gave so generously or who worked so hard for what she gave; never was she too busy to receive guests—to converse delightfully on the most trivial subjects; to sympathise and help in every trouble that was brought to her. She was a most tender and efficient nurse in sickness, as many a friend now mourning her can testify. Wonderfully dainty and womanly in all her ways; her sewing was a delight to see, and she could never tolerate the idea of machine-made clothes on babies or ladies. Her indignation was always roused by cheap clothing, and when she was shown or heard of any "bargain" she fired up at once, calling the material "coarse and rough," and the work either "abominably bad or shamefully underpaid, and in either case not fit for any gentlewoman to wear." Many and many an evening have I spent in her house at Windsor, but never once have I seen her occupied in any way but in forwarding the entertainment of the family circle. A hand at whist or a game of patience were her favourite pastimes, and she played both with the eagerness of a child. When the rest of the party retired the second part of her working day began, for she wrote steadily from about 11 p.m. till 2 or 3 a.m. The first half of her working day was the forenoon, and no pressure of work ever took her away from the family or social circle during the afternoon or evening. It will hardly be believed that during her long life she never had a study of her own. She seemed to read everything, but was seldom seen with a book in her hand. She delighted in stories of all kinds, and listened to or read them with the avidity of a girl; but gossip and scandal of any kind was abhorrent to her, and checked by her severely. She had no taste nor desire for what is called Society, but good company was her greatest pleasure, and, till the death of her eldest son, no more cheerful house than hers could be found in all England, though even then the burden of life was very heavy on the shoulders of the brave woman, for the large household was expensive, and all outgoings had to be met by unflagging, never-ceasing work. Her life is a record of astounding industry, too often pursued under the stress of hard necessity.

Mrs. Oliphant wrote her first work, Margaret Mailland, in her teens; it was published and went through three editions in the year she came of age. The delicate husband and an increasing family very soon drove her to continue the literary work, begun as a girl's recreation, as the one means of subsistence for her husband and children. At one time during Mr. Oliphant's long illness she wrote a three-volume novel in six weeks, nursing him day and night the while; perhaps only a woman can fully appreciate the quiet heroism of this. Six weeks after his death her youngest child, her much-loved "Cecoo," was born. Left with three children, Mrs. Oliphant returned to her native Scotland to maintain the heroic struggle with the cruellest fate, which hereafter made up her whole life. Of the novels which she poured out ceaselessly from that time until a few months ago, some are already forgotten, others will live as long as there is any interest in the Victorian age. It was not possible for a writer so prolific to be always at her best. If she had written less she would have written masterpieces. Occupied as she was with her children and her home, she could not afford to write masterpieces always; but the loss of the artist is to the honour of the woman. Mrs. Oliphant seldom went very deep for the subjects of her fiction; she purposely avoided the more violent passions of humanity, and shrank from working out situations to the bitter end. Yet her vision of life was singularly clear, her observation wonderfully keen and true; her characters are seldom extraordinary men or women, but they are always men and women. Unlike many of her female contemporaries in fiction, she always wrote the purest English. Novels with a purpose were unattractive, and problems of sex hateful to her. Realistic novels she disliked, because the simplicity and purity of her own nature prevented her from believing in conscious vice and wickedness. "My dear," she would say, "there must be some mistake, people are not so bad as that; there must have been some misunderstanding."

But the work she most loved was the strangely beautiful allegories of which The Beleaguered City and The Land of Darkness are good types. The Little Pilgrim has been a true help and comfort to many thousands of aching hearts, and to write these weird and lovely stories gave her real pleasure, and was rest not toil to her.

In biographies she was also prolific, and of these The Life of Edward Irving and of her kinsman Laurence Oliphant are perhaps the most widely known. Then there is the series of books on Florence, Venice, Rome, Edinburgh, and Jerusalem; episodes in her life of astonishing energy, though they would have been a life's work for anybody else.

The inner history of this wonderful productiveness is unspeakably sad. Her brother's health broke down; she added him and his three children to her own family, but no sooner had she come to love his son as her own than he too died, just as he had started on a most promising career. Of the two nieces one married and the other remained with her, watching and waiting on her to the very end, with the tenderness and devotion she so richly deserved. For the last three months the married one and her children were also with her.

Her own three children, who remained to her at her husband's death, left her one after another, in spite of the tenderest care and watching. Maggie, her only daughter, went first, dying in Rome, at eleven years old, leaving an aching void which time never filled. Cyril, the eldest, died next, after a very short illness, in the prime of life. And, at last, after years of delicate health, literally kept alive by constant care and watching, her youngest boy—her adored "Cecco"—was laid near his brother. Fate seemed to take a delight in torturing her; yet no suffering could break her gallant spirit or sour her gracious kindness. She bore her acutely painful illness with unflinching courage, and died with as brave dignity as she had lived. Within a few days of her death she wrote to her old friend Mr. Blackwood, and whatever his answer to that letter was it set her mind at rest. She said to me a few days before her death: "I have no anxiety now, for the first time since I left my mother. I am in perfect peace."

To her last published story, The Ways of Life, a pathetic interest attaches by reason of its preface, entitled "On the Ebb-Tide"; which may now be read as a kind of prophetic farewell to her literary work. As pathetic is the fact that her last written work was a "Jubilee Ode" in the June number of Blackwood's Magazine. There she bade farewell to the Victorian era, with which so nearly her work coincides. But Mrs. Oliphant was very much greater than all her work. Generous, loyal, tireless, dauntless, and upright in all her ways, yet always sweetly charitable, she was at once the most womanly of women and as manly as the manliest of men. She rests, at last, between her two boys in Eton Cemetery.

THE BOOK MARKET.

BOOK SALES AND REPORTS.

WE last week reported, in interview form, on the effects of the Jubilee celebrations upon Book-selling and the prospects of the autumn season. Some further reports reach us this week from the provinces. Mr. Charles Linnell, of the firm of Messrs. Cornish Bros., Birmingham, writes as follows:

"The Spring Publishing Season of 1897 was more successful than that of 1895, or of 1896. Seldom, if ever, have we had such good books as those by Dr. Nansen, Lord Roberts and Captain Mahan; these three works have had a steady and a continuous sale—and are still selling. It is most fortunate that these three important books were issued in the Spring—fortunate for the Publishers and for the Booksellers, for had these books appeared in the autumn they would have prevented the sale of other books which only 'catch on' at Christmas-tide. As it is, they have not checked the sale of other books, they have had an elevated and dignified time to themselves, and they have stood quite apart from the common rush of Christmas literature. It is a lesson to the publishers—good sterling literature should be kept for the spring season. In fiction we had no literary novelty. The novel of 'real life' has been done to death. Our friends are weary of the romantic treatise on social evils, bearing the form of fiction, unpleasant as a novel, and intolerable as a long pamphlet. It is singular that while a keen appetite has been stimulated and gratified for romances of many lands, few writers have turned to Anglo-Saxon history for incident and historical portraits.

"The Jubilee literature has sold splendidly. Books on the Queen's reign have been in great demand. The first place must be given to Mr. McCarthy's new volume, then comes Mr. Escott's Social Transformations, and then the more personal Lives by Mr. Knight, Miss Tooley and Mr. Tullock. Mr. Stead's Studies of the Sovereign and the Reign is much praised. The effect of the Jubilee on bookselling has been most favourable.

"It is too early to write about the hopes and the fears of the autumn publishing season: Mr. Holmes' Queen Victoria will be the book. We are told that three new editions of the 'Waverley Novels' are to come. Each, doubtless, will have its particular merits; and the fame of Scott is wide enough for all these editions. No edition of his works, if worthily produced, will ever lack purchasers. We are glad to welcome new editions and new illustrations in rapid and prosperous succession. How we have prayed that Dickens may some day have the loving care like unto that given to Scott, and that Thackeray will ere long be seen in a format which will please and delight the reader!"

Messrs. D. B. Friend & Co., of Brighton, also favour us with a careful report as follows:

"The Spring Bookselling Season, especially the early part, has been about an average one, and a steady demand has been maintained for the better class of New Fiction and good reprints of Standard Novels. But perhaps the most noteworthy point in regard to current literature has been the issue of two such high-priced books so close together as Col. Roberts's Forty-one Years in India and Nansen's Farthest North, both of which have been so deservedly popular, not to speak of a third—viz., Capt. Mahan's Life of Nelson, which followed so quickly in the wake of the other two. The enormous sale which these have had surely points to the fact that there is still a large public who do care for, and will buy, good books, irrespective of price.

"The effect of the Diamond Jubilee on the Bookselling Trade, however, has been decidedly adverse on the whole, though it goes without saying that the various books on Her Majesty the Queen have been greatly in demand; in many cases, however, both for presents and prizes, they have been substituted for other books rather than purchased additionally.

"The prospects for the coming season do not seem particularly bright at present, though we are 'promised' a good season by various prophets, who unfortunately, however, are not in a position to guarantee the fulfilment of their predictions. Still, if the number of books announced is any criterion as to the business to be done, it will undoubtedly be a good season."

OUR Bristol correspondents, Messrs. Georges Sons, are unable to report even sales in Fiction, and they add in explanation: "The shadow of the Jubilee hung over the 'spring season' and deadened sales. During the past month all spare cash of ordinary bookbuyers appeared to be saved for London expenses; and the book trade has been as nearly at a standstill as we have ever known it."

MESSRS. BUMPUS (Holborn, W.C.) report: "Trade during the last week has been very brisk, our sales being principally of standard works, well bound."

THE BOOKS THAT ARE SELLING. LONDON.

FICTION.

Uncle Bernac. By Conan Doyle.
The Whirlpool. By George Gissing.
The Plattner Story. By H. G. Wells.
A Rose of Yesterday. By Marion Crawford.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Sixty Years a Queen. By Sir Herbert Maxwell.
Social Transformations in the Victorian Age.
By T. H. S. Escott.
Social England. Vol. VI. By H. D. Traill.

POETRY.

New Poems. By Francis Thompson.
Barrack-Room Ballads. By Rudyard Kipling.
The Battle of the Bays. Owen Seaman.

TRAVEL.

In Darkest Africa. New cheap edition. By H. M. Stanley.

BELLES LETTRES.

The House of Dreams. By Laurence Housmann.
The Temple Classics and Dramatists.

BIRMINGHAM.

FICTION.

Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
The Plattner Story. By H. G. Wells.
The Massarenes. By Ouida.
Uncle Bernac. By Conan Doyle.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Forty one Years in India. By Gen. Roberts.
Life of Nelson. By Captain Mahan.
Lectures on Oliver Cromwell. By Prof. Gardiner.
Social England. Vol. II. By H. D. Traill.
The Renaissance in Italy. New edition. By J. A. Symonds.

POETRY.

New Poems. By Francis Thompson.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.

FICTION.

Uncle Bernac. By Conan Doyle.
The Green Book. By Maurus Jókai.
A Rose of Yesterday. By Marion Crawford.
The Seats of the Mighty. By Gilbert Parker.
On the Face of the Waters. By Mrs. F. A. Steele.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Life of Nelson. By Captain Mahan.
Forty-one Years in India. By Gen. Roberts.

TRAVEL.

Through Finland in Carts. By Mrs. Alec. Tweedie.

BRISTOL.

FICTION.

No movement.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Cabot's Discovery of America. By S. E. Weare.
The Renaissance in Italy. New edition. By J. A. Symonds.
History of the Papacy (Reissue). By Bishop Creighton.

BRIGHTON.

FICTION.

Uncle Bernac. By Conan Doyle.
Phroso. By Anthony Hope.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

Personal Life of Queen Victoria. By Miss Tooley.
Victoria, Her Life and Reign. By Knight.

POETRY, ETC.

New Poems. By Francis Thompson.
Temple Classics.

SALE OF THE ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY.

WHEN the summary of the Book Sales for the year 1897 comes to be made, it will be found that the sale of the collection of books from Ashburnham-place will distinguish this year from that of any other of the last two decades. For a comparison we must go back to the days of Heber, Roxburgh, and Sunderland.

Within the past few days, one half of the "lots" described in the present catalogue have been sold; while the catalogue itself consists only of about one-fourth of the entire collection. The rest is to be placed on the market at a later date, but some idea of what is to come may be formed when we state that there is a Pliny of 1472, printed on vellum; a unique set of the first five editions of Walton's "Angler," "in the finest condition, and in the original sheep binding"; a number of very rare works on Witchcraft and kindred subjects, published in the time of Elizabeth and James I.; and several important works relating to the discovery and early history of America. It is now well known that the library was formed by the fourth Earl, between the years 1815 and 1877. Within that period, the Earl devoted himself to the "art of collecting," and whether his efforts were towards the acquisition of manuscripts, pictures, coins, or books, his taste was always excellent. With books, in particular, he was careful to a degree; and the copies of the rarer items are often in the finest condition. For this the library has acquired a special reputation; and this consideration, coupled with the fact that large commissions have been sent from American buyers, must account for the truly phenomenal prices which the books have so far realised.

The sale commenced on Friday last (June 25), and this first day produced a competition of an exciting nature. The editio princeps of Aristotle's "Opera" (1483), illustrated with exquisite illuminations, and printed upon vellum, fell at last to Mr. Quaritch; but he had to pay £800 for it. The Oxford edition of Aretino's Latin translation of the same writer's "Ethics" (1479, and the second book with the Oxford imprint) realised £121. This also Mr. Quaritch acquired. The price paid for a little work of nine leaves which, apparently, was printed from Caxton's type, and perhaps by Machlinia, was absurd. It is by Arusiens, and dealt with the treatment of a "grete sekenesse called Pestilence." The same copy sold in the White Knight's sale for £9; Messrs. Sotheman & Co. paid £147 for it! Three editions of "The Story of Kyng Arthur" sold well. The first was Copland's (1557) for which Mr. Quaritch gave £39. The second, Castell's edition, Mr. Quaritch acquired for £29 10s. For the third Mr. Leighton gave £24. It bore Redborne's imprint, and was Utterson's copy.

Other items of note were: Aretino's "Historia del Popolo Fiorentino" (1476), printed on vellum, £74 (Murray); Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso" (1534), in a fine sixteenth century Italian binding, £22 (Bain); Harrington's translation of "Orlando" (1591), on large paper, £36 (Ellis). It transpired that this copy had belonged to Cecil, Lord Burleigh; Arnold's "Chronicle" (1502?), a very imperfect copy, £9 15s. (Quaritch); the second edition of 1521 Mr. Quaritch also bought for £15 15s.; Ascham's "Scholemaster" (1570) £17 (Pickering); Ascham's "Toxophilus" (1545), £18 10s. (Maggs). For another copy of the same edition Mr. Quaritch gave £12 15s., and for a presentation copy from the author to the Earl of Essex he gave £30 10s.

The second day furnished buyers with a remarkable collection of various editions of Dame Juliana Berners' treatise on "Hawking." The first edition, known as "The Book of St. Albans," was printed in 1486. The present copy had belonged to the Duke of Roxburgh, and when in his possession was imperfect. The Earl of Ashburnham perfected it, and Mr. Quaritch paid £385 for its 89 leaves. The other editions sold as follows:

Wynkyn de Worde (1496), £160; Vele and Copland for Toye, n.d., £61; Wyllyam Powell, n.d., £76; John Waley, n.d., £62. The book of "Fysshynge with an Angle," by Dame Berners, which Wynkyn de Worde printed in Fleet-street sometime about the year 1532 was sold for £360. In an unbound state it cost the late earl £19 19s. Bale's "Illustrium Maioris Britanniae Scriptorum" (1548), which is the first book printed at Ipswich, was bought for £50 (Townley). This particular copy had belonged to King Edward VI. Bacon's "Essaies" (1598), the rare second edition, Mr. Bain acquired for £32, and Mr. Ellis paid £20 for a large paper copy of the first edition of the "Advancement of Learning" (1605).

The third day might be called "The Bible Day." A hint of the exceptionally high prices which were to rule was obtained on the very first "lot." It was the rare block book, "Biblia Pauperum" (1430?), with rude woodcuts on one side of each of the forty leaves. This copy was last sold for £36 15s. It now brought £1,050, and Mr. Quaritch, senior, placed it carefully on the table before him.

The event of the day was the sale of the famous so-called "Mazarine Bible" (1450-55), printed by Gutenberg and Fust with metal types. Although Mr. Quaritch paid £4,000 for it, the bidding was not at all brisk. It commenced at £500; the next bid was £1,000, and Mr. Quaritch made it £2,000. From that to the final amount the bids came timorously. No doubt it would have brought more had there been a certainty about the two leaves which were presumed to be in facsimile. The auctioneer informed the company that all the four copies of this famous work sold in these rooms had gone to Mr. Quaritch's bids; this, however, was the first copy on vellum.

Other Bibles sold as follows: Libri Moysi Quinque (Paris, 1541), £30 (Quaritch); Biblia Sacra Polyglotta (Plantin, 1570-1), £79 (Murray); Biblia Sacra Latina, Editionis Vulgatæ (1462), £1,500 (Quaritch); The Pentateuch, Tyndall's Translation, Hans Luft (1534), £492 (Quaritch)—this was Lord Aston's copy, which realised £121 in 1845—Coverdale's Translation of the Bible (Antwerp, 1535), £820 (Quaritch)—first edition in English—this copy was, of course, imperfect; Cranmer's Bible (1539), £73 (Tregaskis), (1550) £53 (Quaritch); (1553)—Queen Elizabeth's copy—£93 (Quaritch); Bishop's Bible (1568)—first edition—£70 (Quaritch).

Up to the time of our going to press we are only able to deal with the fourth day's sale, which began with a few Bibles of lesser importance, and was followed by some rare books of woodcut illustrations of Biblical subjects: Holy Bible (1680), £20 (Bain); Biblicæ Historiæ (Sebald Beham), £15 15s. (Quaritch); Hans Holbein's Bible Illustrations (1539), £12 10s. (Bain); (1543) £9 5s. (Bain); (1549) £8 5s. (Pickering).

Two books distinguished this day. The first was Colard Mansion's edition (1476) of Boccaccio's "De la Ruine des Nobles Hommes et Femmes." Unfortunately, it transpired that it had all the preliminary leaves, to the number of six, in facsimile, and two other leaves were also suspected. Although the Sunderland copy, which had no painted miniatures, had realised £960, this copy with these miniatures Mr. Quaritch obtained easily for £695. The second book was the first of the Caxtons in the catalogue—Boethius's "Consolations" (1479?). Mr. Tregaskis paid for it the abnormally high price of £510. Among the more interesting of the remaining "lots" may be mentioned: Bidpay's "Directorium Humane Vite" (1480?), £18 10s. (Leighton); Blome's "Gentleman's Recreation" (1686), £10 5s. (Tregaskis), £10 15s. (Quaritch), and £9 (Ellis); Blundeville's "Fower Chiefest Offices of Horsemanshippe" (W. Seres, n.d.), £13 (Quaritch); Boccaccio's "De Cercaldi Historiographi" (Éditio princeps), £22 (Edwards); Boccaccio's "Falles of Sondry . . . Princes and Princesses" (1554), £27 (Bain); "De Mulieribus Claris" (1473), £71 (Quaritch) and £73 (Quaritch); "Decameron" (Maçon's first French translation, 1545), £33 (Quaritch); "Decameron" (first English translation, 1620), £49 (Quaritch); Boece's "Chronicles of Scotland" (Edinburgh, 1536), £58 (Ellis).

DRAMA.

THE foreign invasion of the West-end theatres has assumed remarkable proportions. Both Mme. Sarah Bernhardt and Mme. Réjane, who are old friends, and Mme. Odilon, of the Vienna stage, a newcomer, have been in full blast; so that it becomes a matter of difficulty to sort out one's impressions of so polyglottous a week. What stands out strongest in my retrospect, perhaps, is the pleasure with which I made Mme. Odilon's acquaintance. The German drama has much less attraction for the English public than the French, not merely because the language is less familiar, but from a difference in the artistic and literary sympathies of the Teuton and the Englishman. Almost the one dramatic link between the two great northern races is their belief in Shakespeare, and that, perhaps, is more academic and less vital among playgoers in this country than in Germany. In France, Shakespeare, though accepted as one of the world's classics, is hardly known. Somehow the German translations of him are as good as the French are poor, and this may help to explain why Shakespeare is in some sort an exception to the rule we have been considering—namely, that our dramatic affinities are far more French than German. Certainly all German companies visiting this country hitherto have had a somewhat unfavourable tale to tell. The Saxe-Meiningen company were admired for their stage-management mainly; the Coburg company, who played at Drury Lane a year or two ago, having only their repertory and their acting to recommend them, were, I fear, rather severely cold-shouldered by the paying public. Has it been reserved for Mme. Odilon and her colleagues of the Volkstheater, Vienna, to "change the luck," as they say, in the most superstitious of all the professions? Apparently so. At all events, they are the first of the German-speaking companies within my experience of the stage, extending over twenty years, who have been able favourably to impress English opinion. For one thing, their repertory is light and, if one may so say, exceedingly un-German, and for another, Mme. Odilon is able to win a personal triumph by reason of the brightness of her style, her vivacity, her beauty, her charm. One need not, for that reason, set her down as a great actress. Her admirers call her "the Austrian Réjane," and the phrase expresses her limitations, not to say her inferiority; since we do not hear of Mme. Réjane being described as "the French Odilon." It is not the happiest of phrases. Mme. Odilon reflects fairly well one aspect of Réjane's talent. She is sunny, playful, coquettish; but her personal charm, embodying a voluptuousness, a fund of animal spirits, a grisorio of a singularly attractive character, carries her further than the French actress in that direction. Mme. Réjane is a product of art; Mme. Odilon, with her hoydenish abandon, impresses one as a pure effusion of nature. The Austrian actress is cast for light comedy, but if she could sing, which probably she does not, she would assuredly excel in opéra-bouffe. She possesses a most captivating sort of stage beauty. Short, perhaps, according to English notions, she is admirably moulded, on the opulent scale, and moves with kittenish grace. The piece in which she made her début at Daly's, "Untreu," an adaptation from the Italian, brought out all her best qualities. She had to read a lesson in manners to a dolt of a husband on the one hand, and to a too presumptive lady-killer on the other, and right merrily she did it, with never a lapse into the serious vein, except when adding a touch of scorn to the raillery that she poured upon her ill-starred admirer. The company supporting Mme. Odilon is adequate, without being as polished as that of a Parisian playhouse of corresponding rank to the Volkstheater.

In dramatic instinct unquestionably the French excel. This was once more proved by the manner in which Mme. Réjane and her company interpreted that remarkably cynical and, in the derogatory sense of the phrase, up-to-date play "La Douleureuse," which has been the most striking success of the past season in Paris. With its audacious negation of principle, truth, honour, loyalty, so far as the chief dramatis personæ are concerned, such a piece, if played in a tactless fashion could not fail to ruffle the sensibilities of the public. The Vaudeville company skate over the thin ice of the story with an unfailing dexterity, which almost amounts to an instinct. They possess the art of the demi-mot; a shrug of the shoulders, a look or an intonation suffices to save the situation from vulgarity. Dialogue divorced from action in an English play tends to drag, and our dramatists have contracted the habit of cutting down every scene, so to speak, to its bare poles, so that the audience may escape tedium. To a greater extent than is generally suspected, this is due to the inability of the English actor to render the niceties of diction. He carries no small change with him. He studies only broad and palpable effects. But a couple of French actors will carry on a purely literary conversation with such a mastery of light and shade that they hold the attention of their audience as closely as if they were discussing matters of dramatic moment. In the first two acts of "La Douleureuse" this peculiarly French art —l'art de bien dire—is strikingly illustrated, for here the author is engaged in depicting, by dialogue mainly, the character of the money-worshipping, heartless, soulless society of the Bourse and the Boulevard, there being as yet no necessary question of the play to be considered. That develops, properly speaking, in the third act, where the significance of the slangy title of the play—the reckoning—becomes apparent. M. Maurice Donnay is one of the les jeunes, and wedded accordingly to the pessimistic; but he writes in this instance with a moral purpose, which is to show that every evil deed has to be paid for, and that society, nature, Providence, or what you will, inexorably exacts its price for the same—i.e., la douleur. The swindling financier who gives his soirées in the first act shoots himself as the police come to arrest him. That is his reckoning. Deceiving husbands are in turn deceived by their wives. That is their reckoning. The dramatic interest of the story develops when the principle comes to be applied to the lovers who occupy the foreground of the picture—Hélène, widow of the financier above mentioned, and her friend, the fashionable sculptor Philippe. In this disloyal monde they have vowed each other fidelity, but the lover in due time deceives his mistress with her bosom friend, and learns, to his undoing, that the woman he has so fully trusted has had a previous lover of whose existence she never breathed a word.

That is their Nemesis at last, and consistently treated the story ought to finish there; but the exigencies of the happy ending, from which even authors of the new school do not escape, has induced M. Donnay to add a scene of reconciliation for the disillusioned lovers, upon the prospect of whose marriage the curtain falls. The great scene of the play is that where Mme. Réjane, as Hélène, has her past brutally flung in her teeth by her lover, who, of all men, is least entitled to reproach her, seeing that it is through an infidelity on his own part that he has learnt her guilty secret. With what infinite delicacy does Mme. Réjane treat the wounded feelings of the false wife, and, in a sense, the disingenuous mistress too, in this her hour of reckoning! The squalid facts of the situation have a glamour thrown round them with which there is nothing comparable in the entire range of the drama, except the magic displayed by Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in rehabilitating her sentimental courtesan, Marguerite Gautier. It is art, this, of the highest kind; and not even Mme. Sarah Bernhardt could equal the essential tenderness and true womanliness of Mme. Réjane's interpretation. "La Douleureuse" is a play which could hardly be written in English, and which could not be acted if it were—I mean from the purely artistic point of view. Neither our dramatists nor our actors cultivate the nicety of touch displayed in this performance, both on its literary and its histrionic side. Their work may be as truthful, but it is done with a bigger brush.

J. F. N.

MUSIC.

"WHY revive 'Faust' after the failure last year of 'La Reine de Saba'?" Thus wrote a well-known French critic in 1864, referring to the repris of the opera at the Paris Théâtre Lyrique. The strong points of the work were recognised by Berlioz and other writers when it was produced in 1859, yet not one of them seems to have had an inkling of the great popularity which it was destined to achieve. Wagner's music-dramas have killed many an opera, but "Faust" still lives. The librettists, MM. Barbier and Carré, certainly did not rise to the height of the argument of the German poet and philosopher, but that in no way interferes with the success of the work; their book was cleverly constructed, and, moreover, eminently suited to display the composer's gifts at their fullest. There is something in "Faust" to suit all tastes; and though the music may at times be superficial, or even commonplace, there is many a page in which the most carping critic must acknowledge merit of a very high order. The successful performance of the opera at Covent Garden on Monday night shows that it still lives. But, then, Mme. Melba played the part of Marguerite, and with her lovely voice and perfect method of production she makes all her music sound so fresh, so natural, so insinuating. This great artist has been reproached with a certain coldness in her acting and facial expression, and, certainly, judged by the most lenient standard, one could scarcely speak of her as a born actress. Her Marguerite on Monday displayed, however, surprising movement and warmth. M. Alvarez, the Faust, as usual, sang and acted well; yet, after all, he is a stage figure rather than a human being. M. Ancona was a good Valentin, and M. Plançon played Mephistopheles with his usual ability. Signor Mancinelli conducted.

LAST week I paid a visit to the music section of the Victorian Era Exhibition, Earl's Court, and although, perhaps, it is not as large as one could wish, there are many objects of interest in it. The musical fashions of this world change rapidly, and Mendelssohn is not thought so much of now as he was in the early years of the Queen's reign; but he has been an important figure in the period which the Exhibition seeks to illustrate. The autograph pianoforte score of "Elijah," the greatest of modern oratorios, is exhibited by his daughter, Mrs. Benecke. There is another souvenir of the composer—viz., the assignment to Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co. of the "Hymn of Praise," and near to it the assignment to the same firm of Gounod's "Mors et Vita." For the one was paid £31 10s; for the other £4,000. The difference is enormous, and all the more striking seeing that the earlier work has probably proved a far richer mine; and of the two it is by far the finer. The world-wide popularity of Gounod as the composer of "Faust," and the success, in this country at any rate, of "The Redemption," explains in large measure the high price paid for a work which, many attractive pages notwithstanding, cannot be pronounced great. The Mozart corrections of the harmony exercises of his pupil Attwood, a composer who just lived to see the commencement of the Queen's reign, will of course prove specially attractive to musicians.

There are many autograph scores of living composers: Sir A. Sullivan, Drs. Parry, Mackenzie, Stanford, Bridge, &c. Of the first named there are the "sketches" for the popular "Mikado" and the score of the work itself. Among the portraits, nearly 200 in number, the one of Paderewski, painted by the Princess Louise, is a prominent object. Of others I would mention those of Joachim, Sarasate, Dr. Hubert Parry, and Sir Walter Paratt.

Of musical instruments may be named a very fine Erard pianoforte presented by George the Fourth to Princess Victoria; the tone is still good, and the touch excellent. There is also the pianoforte on which Rubinstein played at Windsor in 1857. A list, by the way, of all the distinguished vocalists and instrumentalists who have appeared at Windsor during the sixty years of the Queen's reign would have been welcome.

The exhibits have been carefully arranged and catalogued by Mr. William Barclay Squire of the British Museum.

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

IN spite of the rapid and unparalleled advances which we have all been boasting about, science does not seem to have lost its Tithonus-like activity at the close of the Queen's long reign. On one hand the Turbinia, the new model torpedo boat fitted with Parsons' steam-turbines, has been cutting records and capers at Cowes, among the long lines of stately warships, that defied all attempts at pursuit, and must have seriously upset the complacency of the Admiralty Constructive Department. The Turbinia is a good ten knots faster than any vessel of her size and tonnage ever made, and is besides the fastest vessel now afloat. Having just experienced a day on board of her at Spithead, I can testify that when running thirty-three knots an hour she is perfectly free from vibration and the other discomforts usual on torpedo boats. What her full speed may be I do not know, for she has never steamed at full pressure yet, and blows off even at the speed mentioned. Probably she has another two knots in hand. The space occupied by her machinery is extremely small and free from moving parts. The boiler space is less for the power than would be the case with other forms of machinery, and three screw valves control the whole navigation. The length of the boat is 100 feet, beam 9 feet, displacement a little over 44 tons, and she develops 2,200 horse power. She has nine screws, on three separate shafts, which revolve at over 2,000 revolutions per minute.

THIS is the latest word in marine engineering, and it may have an important bearing on our light navy during the next few years. Side by side with this, however, there has been creeping up a new form of navigation altogether, that of the air; and before the Queen's reign is done we may see this long-dreamt-of achievement placed upon a practical footing. I have beside me the third volume of an American publication, The Aeronautical Annual for 1897, which contains some extremely interesting matter. To begin with, it sketches the history of Samuel Pierpont Langley, the popular secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and his successive "aerodromes" or flying machines, the latest form of which was made familiar to readers of the Strand Magazine last month. Prof. Langley's machines are only models, weighing, with fuel and water sufficient for a short flight, about 30 lb. The weight of the machinery for driving them is 7 lb. This consists of a small 1 h.p. piston engine with two cylinders, and a copper-coil boiler heated by a sort of naphtha blow-flame. Propulsion is got by two propellers working in opposite directions. To this extent the aerodrome recalls the flying-machine of Mr. Hiram Maxim, on which also I once enjoyed a memorable ride, in company with Lord Kelvin, Lord Rayleigh, and a number of other scientific experts. The difference between the two machines is probably this: Mr. Maxim's engineering skill has enabled him to produce a more perfect mechanical combination than the "aerodrome," whereas Prof. Langley's long study and unique knowledge of aerial conditions has produced a machine better adapted to suit itself to wind pressure, and more capable of flight. Mr. Maxim's, on the other hand, is a full-sized machine, while Prof. Langley's is a model.

THERE is another branch of aeronautics which consists in gliding with wings, instead of being propelled through the air by machinery. This is associated chiefly with the name of Otto Lilienthal, who did more than any man living to master the conditions of equilibrium in the air, and whose untimely death from a fall was a great loss to science. Lilienthal, however, has his followers, one of whom, an Englishman named Pilcher, has made considerable strides towards success. His soaring machine is described as a single plane machine (it was the addition of a second plane above, in many people's opinion, that caused the accident to Lilienthal), with two long, bat-like wings fitted to a central frame shaped like a boat. The wing surface is 23 ft. from tip to tip, and 8 ft. across, giving an area of 180 sq. ft. Mr. Chanute, of Chicago, another old student of gliding flight, or soaring, uses much more complicated machines than this, some having six or eight pairs of wings. In a business-like way he has been in the habit of retiring to a camp among some deserted sand-hills with his assistants, and there trying flights from a summit under every condition of opposing wind. His experiments are worth reading, and form a not unimportant contribution to the literature of soaring compiled by Lilienthal.

H. C. M.

MURRAY'S HANDBOOKS.

Mr. Murray begs to call attention to the "Index and Directory" with which the Newer Editions of his Handbooks are supplied. These contain all information as to Hotels, Conveyances, &c., and are constantly kept up to date, so that purchasers of his Guide-books are always supplied with the very latest information.

EUROPEAN HANDBOOKS FOR SUMMER TRAVEL.

- FRANCE, Part I.; Normandy, Brittany, The Seine and Loire, Bordeaux, the Pyrenees, &c. 36 Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.
- FRANCE, Part II.; Central France, Auvergne, The Cevennes, Burgundy, The Rhone and Saone, Provence, Marseilles, Alsace-Lorraine, Champagne, &c. 23 Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.
- HOLLAND and BELGIUM. Eighteen Maps and Plans. 6s.
- DENMARK and ICELAND, Schleswig, Holstein, Copenhagen, Jutland, and Iceland. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.
- SWEDEN, Stockholm, Upsala, Gothenburg, The Shores of the Baltic, &c. Maps and Plans. 6s.
- NORWAY, Christiania, Bergen, Trondhjem. The Fjelds and Fjords. With special information for Fishermen and Cyclists. By T. MICHELL, C.B., H.B.M., Consul-General for Norway. Maps and Plans. 7s. 6d.
- RUSSIA, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Finland, Crimea, Caucasus, &c. Edited by T. MICHELL, C.B., H.B.M., Consul-General for Norway. Maps and Plans. 18s.
- THE RHINE and NORTH GERMANY, The Black Forest, The Harz, Saxon Switzerland, The Giant Mountains, Elsass, and Lothringen. 83 Maps and Plans. 10s.
- SOUTH GERMANY, AUSTRIA, Tyrol, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, Salzburg, Styria, Hungary, and the Danube, from Ulm to the Black Sea. 2 Parts. 34 Maps and Plans. Part I., 7s. 6d.; Part II., 6s.
- SWITZERLAND, Alps of Savoy, and Piedmont, Italian Lakes, and Part of Dauphiné. Maps. 3 Parts. Part I. The Bernese Oberland, Geneva, Lucerne, Engadine, &c. 6s. Part II. The Alps of Savoy and Piedmont, Italian Lakes, and Part of Dauphiné. 6s.
- NORTH ITALY and VENICE, Turin, Milan, The Italian Lakes, Verona, Padua, Venice, Genoa, &c. Edited by H. W. PULLEN, M.A. With 34 Maps and Plans. 10s.
- CENTRAL ITALY and FLORENCE, Tuscany, Umbria, The Marches, &c. Edited by H. W. PULLEN, M.A. With 24 Maps and Plans. 6s.

ENGLISH HANDBOOKS.

"The general quality of Murray, the scientific character of the information, the accuracy and interest of the historical particulars, to say nothing of the lowness of the price, place his Guides far ahead of any competitors."—Saturday Review.

- EASTERN COUNTIES: Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, and Cambridge. 12s.
- KENT, 7s. 6d.; SUSSEX, 6s.
- SURREY, HANTS, and the ISLE of WIGHT.
- HERTS, BEDS, and HUNTS. 7s. 6d.
- OXFORDSHIRE. Oxford with its Colleges. 6s.
- WILTS, DORSET, and SOMERSET. 12s.
- WORCESTER and HEREFORD. 5s.
- GLOUCESTER. 6s.
- DEVON, 7s. 6d.; CORNWALL, 6s.
- HANDBOOK for ENGLAND and WALES. Stations, Hotels, and all Places and Objects worth seeing. 1 vol., Maps, 12s.
- HANDBOOK for SCOTLAND. Thoroughly Revised, with special detailed Information for Pedestrians, and entirely new Maps. Printed on specially thin and light paper. 9s.
- "In spite of the enterprise devoted to the production of guide-books in the past fifteen years, Murray's Handbooks still maintain their place as facile princeps, and of all the Guide to Scotland is the high-water mark of guide-book excellence for tourists of intelligence."—Observer.
- HANDBOOK for IRELAND. New and thoroughly Revised Edition. With entirely new Set of Maps and Plans. Printed on specially light and thin paper. 9s.
- NORTH WALES, 6s.; SOUTH WALES, 6s.
- NORTHAMPTON and RUTLAND. 7s. 6d.
- DERBY, NOTTS, LEICESTER, and STAFFORD. 9s.
- SHROPSHIRE and CHESHIRE. 6s.
- LANCASHIRE, 6s.; YORKSHIRE, 12s.
- LINCOLNSHIRE. 7s. 6d.
- DURHAM and NORTHUMBERLAND. 10s.
- THE LAKE DISTRICT of WESTMORELAND and CUMBERLAND. 6s.
- Arranged Alphabetically, with List of Railway Stations, Hotels, and all Places and Objects worth seeing. 1 vol., Maps, 12s.

MURRAY'S CYCLISTS' ROAD-BOOKS.

CYCLISTS' ROAD-BOOK, from London, through Chichester, Portsmouth, Southampton to the New Forest, and back by Romsey, Winchester, Dorking, Leatherhead, and Epsom. Illustrated by a Road Atlas at the end of the Book. Fcap. 8vo, 2s.

MR. EDWARD WHYMPER'S GUIDES.

Ready. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

CHAMONIX and MONT BLANC. By Edward Whymper, Author of "Scrambles amongst the Alps," "Travels amongst the Great Andes." With 65 Illustrations and Maps.

ZERMATT and the MATTERHORN. With Seventy-five Illustrations and Maps. 3s. net.

[Nearly ready.]

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1314.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.

New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues sent on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 31 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
No. 32, 34 MISCELLANEOUS. (702, 732 lots.)
No. 33 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.

CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 7, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.

CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
1, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.

MSS. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 37th Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 15, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C.,
have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated and other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 24-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.

126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.

SIRPHILIP H. HERKOMER, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

RARE Old (Black) OAK FURNITURE.
originally came out of the Yorkshire Dales. FOR SALE—viz., Grandfather's Clock (brass face); Dowry Chest; Corner Cupboard; Side Table; Pipe Rack; and Tam-o'-Shanter Table—accept 15 Guineas the lot. Bargain. Seen here, or sketches sent.—"LADY," Oakdene, Richmond, Yorkshire.

EDUCATIONAL.

EPSOM COLLEGE.—ANNUAL EXAMINATION
for SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS early in JULY.
New Junior department just opened for 100 boys. Preparation for London Matric. and Prof. Scient. Exams. the Army, Navy, and Universities. Numerous recent successes. NEXT TERM begins
SEPTEMBER 16th.—Apply to the Bursar, 5, The College, Epsom, Surrey.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

CHARLES LOWE, Book Exporter, New Street, and Baskerville Hall, Birmingham, OFFERS Pretty Tea Set (Worcestershire), £8 (cost £15).—Large Tapestry Picture, 8 feet by 7, £40.—Woodburn Portrait (Gallery), 3 vols., nice old blue morocco,
£7 10s.—Hogarth, the atlas folio, genuine early copy, £5 10s. (pub. £30, 1830).—Large old Mahogany Bookcase, £10 (cost £30).

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at 1s. 6d.

house of subscribers) from TWO

GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may

UNIT in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,

and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 341, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.;

48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and

at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all
Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of

HERR HANFSTAENGL of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process

For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,

Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book

Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,

&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Office: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

Just published, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

GOLD AND SILVER:

An Elementary Treatise on Bimetallism.

By JAMES HENRY HALLARD, M.A. Oxon.,

Sometime Lecturer for the Bimetallic League

in Liverpool.

CONTENTS: Introduction.—What is Bimetallism?—The Story of the Standards.—The Great Fall of Prices.—Eastern
Competition.—Misconceptions and Misrepresentations.—
Conclusion.

RIVINGTON, PERCIVAL & Co., 34, King Street,
Covent Garden, London.

Now ready, price 3s. 6d. net.

BACKWARD LOOKING.

Verses: Occasional, Miscellaneous.

Being a volume of poems written about twenty-five years ago, and now published for the first time with introductory verses, entitled

1897 THE QUEEN'S YEAR.

Publishers: WILLIAM POLLARD & Co., Exeter;
Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent & Co., London.

JARROLD &amp; SONS' NEW BOOKS.

A BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George KNIGHT, Author of "Dust in the Balance," "Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"It is a great novel. One of the best, if not the best, novel that this season has produced. It is an ennobling and invigorating book that everyone should read."—Weekly Sun.

"The celibacy of the priesthood is a difficult subject to handle. But Mr. Knight's 'The Winds of March' cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS SEMAPHORE: a Farical Novel. By HAL GODFREY. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"It may be said to out-Anster Anster, being even more extravagant in conception than 'Vice Versa' or 'The Fallen Idol.' A happy contrast to the morbidly introspective studies of distorted characters that for some time past he've deluged the book market."—Daily Telegraph.

"The story is very funny and very well told, almost as good as was 'Vice Versa'."—Glasgow Herald.

"It is the funniest novel that has appeared for many months."—Star.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By LEWIS MACNAMARA. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Deserve to rank with Miss Jane Barlow's 'Irish Idylls.' One of the best contributions to Irish literature for some considerable time."—Irish Independent.

"A picturesque group of idylls, the high literary quality of which alone suffices to recommend them irresistibly to general perusal. All are excellent word-paintings."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of exceptional merit and cannot be too highly commended because of the literary treasure it contains. One of those intensely fascinating books."—Belfast News Letter.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in
THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS
BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI.

ENTITLED

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.

"The interest of the story prevents the reader ever dreaming of laying aside the book till the end."—Glasgow Daily Mail.

"A tale of mystery.... just suitable for a railway journey."—Pail Mail Gazette.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C.
Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

PROF. SAINTSBURY'S NEW VOL.

IN THE FAMOUS SOOTS SERIES.

THIS DAY.

Price 1s. 6d., cloth; with gilt top, 2s. 6d.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

IN THE SAME SERIES. JUST PUBLISHED.

NORMAN MACLEOD. By JOHN WELLWOOD.

THE "BLACKWOOD" GROUP.

By Sir GEORGE DOUGLAS.

FLETCHER of SALTOUN. By G. W. T. OMOND.

TOBIAS SMOLLETT. By OLIPHANT SMEATON.

JAMES BOSWELL. By W. KEITH LEASK.

SIR JAMES Y. SIMPSON.

By his Daughter, EVE BLANTYRE SIMPSON.
Second Edition. Tenth Thousand.

List of the "FAMOUS SOOTS" Series post free.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER,
21, Paternoster Square, E.C.; and Edinburgh; and of any Bookseller.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

With Illustrations and Maps, 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

WITH the TURKISH ARMY in THESSALY. By CLIVE BIGHAM, Special Correspondent of The Times, Author of "A Ride Through Western Asia."

MORNING POST.—"His statistics have been admirably kept, and the numbers and dispositions of the Turkish troops carefully and closely noted from beginning to end.....is accompanied by excellent illustrations and charts.....Deserves to be widely read."

BY HENRY ARTHUR JONES.

THE CASE of REBELLIOUS SUSAN.

A Comedy in Three Acts. By HENRY ARTHUR JONES, Author of "The Tempter," "The Masqueraders," "Judah," &c. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

NATIONAL DEFENCES. By Major-General MAURICE, C.B. [ENGLISH CITIZEN SERIES.

Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THIRTY YEARS of TEACHING. By

L. C. MIALL, F.R.S., Professor of Biology in the Yorkshire College. Reprinted, with additions, from THE JOURNAL of EDUCATION.

Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.

ELECTRICITY and MAGNETISM for BEGINNERS. By F. W. SANDERSON, M.A., Head Master of Oundle School. With Illustrations.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

A MEMORIAL OF THE JUBILEE.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

Studies of the Sovereign and the Reign.

By W. T. STEAD.

With a splendid Colotype Portrait of the Queen for a Frontispiece.

Price 3s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

- I. FROM REPUBLICANISM to MONARCHY.
- II. THE QUEEN and the EMPIRE.
- III. THE QUEEN as PERMANENT EDITOR of the REALM.
- IV. THE QUEEN as DEFENDER of the FAITH.
- V. THE QUEEN'S FAMILY LIFE.
- VI. THE EMPIRE in 1836 and 1896.

The Westminster Gazette says: "The book is essentially noteworthy as containing a mass of readably arranged information not readily accessible elsewhere."

The Daily News says: "Of the many volumes published in memorial of the great Jubilee, none will be found more suggestive of thought than this."

The Dundee Advertiser says: "The volume deals in an original spirit and fashion with a subject which necessity has of late rendered hackneyed. The need for treating it in an original way was great, and Mr. Stead has not failed."

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, Mowbray House,
Norfolk St., W.C.; and 125, Fleet St., E.C.

Just published.

NOTABLES OF BRITAIN.

An Album of Portraits and Autographs of the most Eminent Subjects of Her Majesty in the Sixtieth Year of Her Reign.

Crown 4to, pp. 212, handsomely bound in buckram, with gilt lettering.

Among those who were graciously pleased to give special sittings for this unique publication were—

- H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES.
H.R.H. THE PRINCESS OF WALES.
H.R.H. THE DUKE OF YORK.
H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF YORK.
THE MARQUIS OF LOBNE, LL.D., M.P.
HIS GRACE THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.
LORD WOLSELEY, &c., &c.
H.I.M. THE EMPRESS FREDERICK OF GERMANY and H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE also contributed special Autograph Portraits.

The book is not merely a Portrait Gallery, it is also a collection of most interesting autographs.

The Star says: "This is really a Jubilee memento worth preserving."

"REVIEW OF REVIEWS" OFFICE, Mowbray House,
Norfolk St., W.C.; and 125, Fleet St., E.C.

8vo, 6s.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW,

No. 371, will be published on THURSDAY, JULY 15.

CONTENTS.

- I. MARTIN LUTHER.
- II. TWO AMERICAN WOMEN.
- III. ASIA MINOR Rediscovered.
- IV. ON BECOMING AUTHOR.
- V. UNPUBLISHED LETTERS of GEORGE CANNING.
- VI. THE ANNALS of BANFF.
- VII. THE NOVELS of GEORGE MEREDITH.
- VIII. HENRI TAINE.
- IX. JOB and the FAUST.
- X. THE SOUTH AFRICAN COMMITTEE.
- XI. THE EASTERN CRISIS.

London: JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

SECOND EDITION.

TWELVE BAD WOMEN. Edited by ARTHUR VINCENT. Illustrated. Cloth, 16s.

Graphic.—"This always interesting, and sometimes even fascinating book."

LOUIS BECKE'S NEW VOLUME.

PACIFIC TALES. By Louis Becke,

Author of "His Native Wife," "By Reef and Palm," &c. With Portrait of the Author. Cloth, gilt top, 6s.

Colonies and India.—"Most entertaining stories, vividly written, and full of humour and pathos."

FROM the FOUR WINDS. By John SINJOHN. Cloth, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"Stories each one of which is a masterpiece of pathetic or humorous narrative.....These admirable tales."

NEW EDITION.

MRS. KEITH'S CRIME. By Mrs.

W. K. CLIFFORD. With Frontispiece by the Hon. John Collier. Cloth, 6s.

World.—"Is certainly the strongest book that Mrs. W. K. Clifford has given to the public. It is probably, too, the most popular."

THE PARLIAMENT of GLADSTONE and DISRAELI.

THE INNER LIFE of the HOUSE of COMMONS. From the Writings of WILLIAM WHITE.

Introduction by JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. 2 vols., cloth, 16s.

H. W. Lucy in the Daily News.—"We have here preserved precious photographs of historic scenes and memorable persons. Having spent his days and nights with Addison and other classics in the old bookshop, the Doorkeeper brought to his new task an excellent literary style, with a pleasant dash of the old fashion.....His records have the inestimable advantage of being edited by Mr. Justin McCarthy, who, with long experience and close sympathy with the House of Commons and its history, was the very man for the task of dealing with a mass of memoranda extending over ten years. I do not know what he may have left out; he has certainly known what to preserve."

THE "BRITISH EMPIRE" SET OF "THE STORY OF THE NATIONS."

Fully Illustrated, and with Maps and Index, bound in cloth, price 6s. each.

SOUTH AFRICA (Cape Colony, Natal,

Orange Free State, South African Republic, Rhodesia, and all other Territories South of the Zambesi). By G. MCCALL THEAL, LL.D. Fourth Edition, revised, enlarged, and brought up to date.

African Review.—"The Author threads his way, with the confidence and ease born of intimate knowledge, through the labyrinth of annexation and surrender, triumph, and defeat."

THE AUSTRALIAN COMMON-

WEALTH (New South Wales, Tasmania, Western Australia, South Australia, Victoria, Queensland, New Zealand). By GREVILLE TREGARTHEN.

Athenaeum.—"The story of the convict days of the parent colony is well told, and the whole volume is readable."

CANADA. By J. G. Bourinot, C.M.G.,

LL.D., D.C.L. DOUGLAS SLADE in the Literary World.—"A very sound and a very readable and picturesque book."

BRITISH INDIA. By R. W. Fraser,

LL.B., I.C.S. Times.—"Mr. Fraser has succeeded in a remarkable degree.....He tells with accuracy, with fairness of spirit, and in good English."

The WEST INDIES and the SPANISH

MAIN. By JAMES BODWAY, F.L.S. Second Edition.

Morning Post.—"A work which condenses with much lucidity all that the general reader need know of one of the most interesting regions of the New World."

SCOTLAND. By John Mackintosh,

LL.D. Third Edition. Graphic.—"A good and useful sketch, and Dr. Mackintosh has performed his task in a thorough and workmanlike manner."

IRELAND. By the Hon. Emily Law-

LESS. Fifth Edition. Spectator.—"This clear and temperate narrative."

In all 48 Volumes have appeared in "The Story of the Nations." An Illustrated Descriptive List of the Series will be sent post free to any address on application.

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S ILLUSTRATED SPRING LIST will be sent post free to any address on application.

LONDON:

T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Mr. Sidney Lee's Life of Shakespeare ... ..	23
Bad Women ... ..	24
The Campaign in the Matoppos ... ..	25
A Collector's Confessions ... ..	25
The Old Dramatists ... ..	26
Compact Biography ... ..	27
The Mirror of the Sinful Soul ... ..	28
Gabriele von Bülow ... ..	28
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	29
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	31
New Books Received ... ..	31
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	32
ANATOLE FRANCE ... ..	33
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXXV., DOUGLAS JERROLD ... ..	34
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	35
SALE OF THE ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY ... ..	35
DRAMA ... ..	36
SCIENCE ... ..	37
MUSIC ... ..	37
CORRESPONDENCE ... ..	38
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..	38
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	29-33

REVIEWS.

MR. SIDNEY LEE'S LIFE OF SHAKESPEARE.

Dictionary of National Biography. Vol. LI.: "Scoffin to Sheares." (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THE new volume, the fifty-first, of the Dictionary of National Biography extends from William Scoffin to John Sheares. Mr. Lee's article on Shakespeare is not likely to be the last word on the subject—that would be too much to hope—but it has every right to be regarded as the definitive biography of our greatest poet. No detail, however slight, of ascertained or ascertainable fact is overlooked, no legitimate inference is missed, and the dry light of common sense and accurate investigation is turned upon several misty creations of more imaginative biographers, dissipating them into air. Here, for instance, is a clear account of Shakespeare's income, which makes it perfectly plain that he might naturally enough out of his earnings as an actor, and his receipts as a shareholder in the Globe Theatre, have saved even the large sums invested at Stratford which have given rise to wild conjecture as to the sources of his wealth. Details as to investments, his pursuits, and his testamentary dispositions place succinctly before us Shakespeare the business man; no unimportant aspect of his nature, though in the judgment of many repugnant to our total conception of the poet. Mr. Lee has no sympathy with such sentimentalism. That Shakespeare may in the same week have written the finest things in "Hamlet" and instituted proceedings to recover a small debt seems to him perfectly natural, owing to the "objectivity" of Shakespeare's art; and consistently with this he sets his face against all attempts to seek in the circumstances of the poet's life any reason why at one period he wrote comedy and at another tragedy. "Every phase of feeling lay within the scope of his intuition, and the successive order in which he approached them bore no explicable relation to the course of his private life or experience."

No preconceived theory, therefore, directs Mr. Lee's attempt to date the Sonnets, which, like every sensible man, he takes to be autobiographical. Consequently he looks straight at the facts, and the facts lead him to a conclusion which is novel. The Sonnets were published in 1609. Shakespeare in them speaks of himself frequently as being past his prime:

"That time of year thou mayest in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few, do hang Upon the boughs."

And many critics have been tempted to associate the emotional crisis which the Sonnets describe with the mood that generated "Troilus and Cressida," "Measure for Measure," "Timon of Athens," "Antony and Cleopatra." Yet in 1602-3, when the first of these plays was written, the story was already an old one. As early as 1599, Jaggard published piratically, in the "Pamphleteer's Pilgrim," two of the Sonnets, one of which (cxliv.) is the plainest statement of the tragic situation:

"Two loves I have of comfort and despair
Which, like two spirits do suggest me still,
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill."

The rest of this poem states the further complication. Moreover, in 1598, Meres mentions the poet's "sugred sonnets among his private friends." It is certain, then, that some of the sonnets were written eleven years before the date of publication, and that the love story dated, at latest, from Shakespeare's thirty-fifth year. The question of age raises no difficulty; a man halfway through the thirties, who had lived Shakespeare's laborious existence, would feel battered enough beside such a radiant young Apollo as he describes. But Mr. Lee wishes to push the date still further back, to the period when Shakespeare was best known as the poet of "Venus and Adonis" and "Lucrece." In 1595 "Edward III." was ready for publication, and it contains a line from Sonnet xciv. Further back still, in 1594—Shakespeare's thirtieth year—there was published "Willobie his Avisa," in which the writer relates how, in search of a cure for unhappy love, he appealed to "his familiar friend, W. S. (an old player), who not long before had tried the courtesy of the like passion, and was now nearly recovered of the like infection." Here Mr. Lee does not command our assent. If all else fitted in, we should not stick at the identification of W. S. with Shakespeare. But, in the first place, we hold that the man who speaks in the Sonnets is a man at least verging on middle age; whereas, if W. S. were Shakespeare, he could not be thirty. Secondly, as to the line in "Edward III.," the sonnet may quote the play as naturally as the play the sonnet. At most, it proves that Sonnet xciv. was written before 1595; and this sonnet, which begins—

"They that have power to hurt and will do none, That do not do the things they most do show"— is the hardest of the whole series to interpret. Does it refer to the youth or the lady of the Sonnets? It is by no means an unlikely conjecture that the series, as published in 1609, includes, besides those directly connected with the love-story, such other poems of the same form as Shakespeare had at any time written. We do not place the Sonnets, therefore, so early as Mr. Lee does; but he has proved to demonstration that the story cannot be placed later in Shakespeare's life than his thirty-fifth year; and, consequently, that when he sketched in Cleopatra such a woman as he wrote of in the Sonnets he was going back on ten-year-old memories.

As to the persons, Mr. Lee makes short work of the view that Mr. W. H. was William Herbert. Not taking his view of the date, we attach little importance to the fact that Herbert was only fourteen in 1594. The important thing is, that in 1609 he was not Mr. W. H. but the Earl of Pembroke. T. T., Thomas Thorpe the publisher, had previously dedicated works to him, in which, as was natural, he gave to his patron full benefit of his titles. With Herbert disappears Mary Fitton. Even if the identification were otherwise probable, dates forbid it. Herbert's entanglement with that lady dates from 1600, a year after Sonnet cxliv. was well known enough to be pirated by Jaggard. Who then was the youth? Mr. Lee answers, on grounds of general probability, Southampton, the only noble with whom Shakespeare is known to have been on friendly terms, and whom he addresses in the preface to Lucrece in phrases that recall the tone of the Sonnets. Mr. W. H. the "only begetter" is, he thinks, the gentleman who "begot" or procured them for publication. "Beget" certainly has this sense in Elizabethan English, but we doubt this interpretation.

In the way of disagreement we have to suggest that Mr. Lee hardly allows enough weight to the influence of Lyly, who was the model for Shakespeare's prose style. In his interesting history of foreign opinion he does not emphasise sufficiently the epoch making production of De Vigny's "Othello" in 1829, the year before "Hernani," and Shakespeare's relation to the whole romantic school.

One interesting point is, we think new; but who can say what has not been said before in Shakesperian criticism? Ben Jonson in the Poetaster calls himself Horace. He speaks episodically of another poet whom he names Virgil, and thus describes his talent:

"His learning labours not the school-like gloss
That most consists in echoing words and terms . . .

Nor any long or far-fetched circumstance—
Wrapt in the curious generalities of arts—
But a direct and analytical sum
Of all the worth and first effect of arts.
And, for his poetry, 'tis so rammed with life
That it shall gather strength of life with being,
And live hereafter, more admired than now.

The resemblance to Jonson's lines prefixed to the folio of 1623 is striking, and if the line we have italicised does not apply to Shakespeare, to whom does it apply?

The article is a masterly piece of workmanship, well worthy of the monumental publication in which it appears.

BAD WOMEN.

Lives of Twelve Bad Women. Illustrations and Reviews of Feminine Turpitude set forth by Impartial Hands. Edited by Arthur Vincent. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is a book for cynics; but the cynic "as is a cynic," we imagine, will find it somewhat mild and disappointing. To the true-hearted cynic human wickedness is a matter of such day-by-day banality that a fresh specimen, to pique his interest, must either be rare in kind or excessive in degree. But of these poor twelve bad women celebrated by Mr. Arthur Vincent and his colleagues the honest cynic will feel that many were not much worse than the average of their sex, and that as for the others their badness was of a deplorably trite and uninspiring pattern.

Alice Perrers, for example, the favourite of King Edward III., and the first on the list of Mr. Vincent's "illustrations," appears, when all is said, to have done nothing more extraordinary than seize occasion by the forelock and put by a bit of money. Who will blame her for that? She understood, with fine feminine intuition, that an aged monarch could scarce be counted on to live for ever, and that for herself the situation was certainly one of "After him, the deluge." Rainy days would be sure to fall thick and fast; so Alice gathered her rosebuds while the sun shone. Her methods, it might be objected, were a trifle brusque and lacking in restraint; but then, it may be counterclaimed, they had a bold and noble picturesqueness. When Edward lay a-dying, for an instance, she drew the rings from his fingers and slipped them into her pocket. Other times other ways. Alice, though sprung of base ancestry enough, had not enjoyed the refining influences of a Board school education.

The second heroine presented to us by Mr. Vincent was likewise by name an Alice: Alice Arden, stepdaughter of Sir Edward North and wife to Thomas Arden, of Faversham, gent. "As malignant fate would have it, Alice became enamoured of a certain low-bred fellow, one Richard Mosby, a tailor by trade, and a servant in the North family—an ill-featured, odious rascal, of a swarthy complexion." And she and her tailor hired a couple of professional bullies to stab superfluous Thomas Arden in the back. To your cynic mere murder is a commonplace; he finds it every morning in his penny paper. But that a gentlewoman should bestow her affection upon a swarthy, low-bred mechanic is more serious. So we are glad to read that Alice was burned at Canterbury on March 14, 1551.

Mary Frith, alias Moll Cutpurse, who flourished from 1584 to 1659, was chiefly remarkable for the fact that she "walked in man's apparel," and could by no means be persuaded to embarrass herself with skirts. She was haled for this eccentricity before the Court of Arches, and "sentenced to do penance in a white sheet at Paul's Cross." She did her penance like the very man she would simulate, being maudlin drunk the while; and immediately afterwards resumed her breeches. For the rest, as her sobriquet implies, she was a common pickpocket, which signifies nothing to the cynic, who has schooled himself to regard pocket-picking as simply one of a hundred inevitable trades. Though harassed times enough by an inquisitive police, Moll always contrived somehow to cheat the gallows. She died a natural death, and left a will (if you please) "with a special provision that twenty pounds were to be set aside, that Fleet-street Conduit might run with wine at her expense when the King came home." The loyal soul! Another common, necessary pickpocket, to whom a chapter of this volume is devoted, was Jenny Diver, born about 1700. But Jenny had nothing like Moll's luck, being hanged at Tyburn in 1741.

The story of the doing to death of Sir Thomas Overbury, in the Tower of London, by the machinations of Lady Frances Howard, is not a pretty story, nor yet, to our thinking, an interesting story. Mere murder, we have ventured to protest before, is a commonplace. Lady Frances, it will be remembered, was the divorced wife of Robert Devereux, Earl of Essex, and the affianced bride of Robert Carr, Viscount Rochester and Earl of Somerset. Overbury was Carr's friend, and endeavoured to dissuade him from the projected marriage. "Will you never leave the company of that base woman?" was his blunt inquiry. Shortly thereafter Overbury found himself a close prisoner in the Tower, whither Lady Frances, anonymously, sent him poisoned tarts and jellies, while the under-keeper Weston, at Lady Frances's instigation, "mixed rosaker with his broth" (whatever rosaker may be; it sounds like something rather nice). The result was that Sir Thomas Overbury died. A couple of years later the Earl and Countess of Somerset were put to their trial for this ungenial crime, condemned to death, and finally, by the King's grace, pardoned. A tedious history, and a horrid.

That merry old soul, Barbara Villiers, Duchess of Cleveland, seems to us to have no right or title to a place in a galaxy of women typically bad. She was a termagant, if you like, and she improved her opportunities as the King's mistress to "make her pile." But if every woman with a tongue in her head is to be accounted bad, how many good women shall we have left in the world? And as for her money-hunger, that, after all, in the circumstances, was no more than human nature. We confess we have ever had a sneaking fondness for Barbara. She was exceedingly handsome, for one thing; and for another, she managed and hectored poor Old Rowley in a fashion that makes one want to hug her. As a literary portrait of her, that given by Mr. Alfred Kalisch in this volume strikes us as far too sombre and ascetic. We prefer Mr. Marriott Watson's brilliant sketch in "Galloping Dick."

Elizabeth Brownrigg (1720-1767) was, indeed, a thorough "bad 'un." "Cruelty personified" is Mr. Vincent's description of her. But the story of how she beat and tortured her apprentices is again, to our thinking, a story as dull as it is horrid—a story to be skipped. Dull, too, is the story of Elizabeth Canning. Elizabeth Canning was a housemaid and a liar. Well, most housemaids (if you doubt it, ask the cook) are liars, even if most liars are not housemaids; and Elizabeth expiated her perjury by seven years' transportation.

A third Elizabeth, Elizabeth Chudleigh, Duchess of Kingston, was a mercenary lady, of elastic virtue, who succeeded in muddling up her marriage relations to such a degree that she was at last convicted of bigamy, and, to the "great satisfaction" of Hannah More, "undignified and unduchessed, while she very narrowly escaped being burned in the hand." "This unprincipled, wilful, licentious woman," Hannah More called her; which only proves that, whether a prig or not, Hannah More was certainly no cynic. We remember another judgment of Hannah More's—to wit, that the theatre, she considered, was an institution "not becoming the countenance of a Christian." So perhaps she was generally a thought too austere.

Mary Bateman (1768-1809) did a lively business for a while as a witch and wonder-worker in various parts of Yorkshire. But, her most notable "miracle," and the process whereby she accomplished it, are matters a little too nauseous to be repeated. 'Twas all anent an egg her hen had laid, "bearing inscribed on it the words, 'Crist is coming.'" For this alone she more than deserved the gallows. It was, however, for the poisoning of Rebecca Perigo that she was hanged. Mr. Vincent shows a fine sense of the mot juste when he qualifies her as "a beastly woman." But why anyone should care to read of her beastliness is a puzzle for the cynic.

The head and front of the offending of Teresia Constantia Phillips seems to have been her inability to learn from experience the elemental truth that men were deceivers ever. Her first husband, Mynheer Muilman, treated her disgustingly enough in all conscience; yet, nothing daunted, she went on marrying and re-marrying to the end of her days, so that her last husband, if we reckon right, was her fifth. Between her marriages, no doubt, there were parentheses in which the place of husband was filled by a "protector"; but the cynic recognises necessity as the mother of many things besides invention, and forbears to cast a stone. Mr. Gilbert Burgess, who tells Constantia's story, holds that "no other ground of excuse and forgiveness can be found for her than that of quia multum amavit." We ourselves should be disposed to admit, as further softening circumstances, her pretty face and her pretty handwriting. Her autograph, as reproduced beneath her portrait, at the beginning of Mr. Burgess's article, is quite beautiful.

The twelfth and last of the ladies here commemorated is that sprightly and charming Mary Anne Clarke who, in the early years of this century, gained celebrity and excited envy as the extravagant favourite of the Duke of York. The Duke being Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's forces, and Mrs. Clarke commandress-in-chief of the Duke, young gentlemen desiring commissions, and officers pining for promotion, knew where to go "to be suited." Mrs. Clarke charged something like half the regulation prices. By and by the Duke tired of her and abandoned her, and of course forgot to pay the pension he had promised. We quite agree with George the Gorgeous, who "said that he thought his brother's conduct very shabby." Mrs. Clarke, however, had her revenge: she was the principal witness against the Duke, in Colonel Wardle's impeachment of him to the House of Commons. And what though the House, perfunctorily enough, acquitted His Royal Highness of "personal corruption," most of us "hae our doots" on that score. Anyhow, Mrs. Clarke went to Paris, and "there lived a quiet and reputable life, devoting her undoubted talents to the education of her children"—till she died in 1852. It seems to us rather unfair and unhumorous to include her in a book of twelve "bad" women. She was no saint, indeed; but one should be tried by the standards of one's class and period, by one's temptations and opportunities. No, we can't think it right to include Mary Anne Clarke in a catalogue of women distinctively bad.

THE CAMPAIGN IN THE MATOPPOS.

With Plumer in Matabeleland. By Frank W. Sykes. (Constable.)

This bright, breezy book is the best account which has yet appeared of the recent fighting in Matabeleland. Mr. Sykes served as a trooper in the M.R.F., and this story of his experiences gives us an excellent idea of the difficult conditions under which the war was waged, and explains very clearly why its operations were indecisive to the end. The military arrangements throughout had to be governed by two paramount considerations—distance and the difficulties of transport. Buluwayo was 585 miles away from the railway terminus at Mafeking, and the rinderpest was working wholesale havoc among the draught cattle. Indeed, the horror of that long march quite eclipsed anything which the relieving force had to put up with when it came to the actual scene of the rebellion. And the cattle plague did more than make the movement of troops exceedingly difficult, it regulated the scale on which the campaign could be conducted. More men might have been got to the front, but it would have been impossible to feed them; and this is the reason why a mere handful were set the impossible task of harrying the natives out of their strongholds in the Matoppos, and why a campaign which seemed likely to end in a "draw" had to be brought to a close by a peace made at the risk of Mr. Rhodes's life.

The march to the front was often through miles of putrefaction. The road was lined with dead oxen, the victims of the rinderpest. "It was a common occurrence to see the remains of whole spans, twenty or thirty, lying about within a radius of 100 yards." Often beside the rotting carcasses of the oxen were found the still laden wagons which their owners had been forced to abandon. These derelicts of the veldt, deserted and stranded, were a terrible temptation to thirsty and tired men not yet accustomed to military or any other discipline. The common excuse was: "If we don't, someone else will"; and the suggestion that such desirable stores might as well benefit British troopers as be left to be appropriated by Dutch transport riders from across the Transvaal border made every conscience easy. In many cases, accordingly, the men of the relieving force "freely plundered whatever they found on or near the wagons, breaking open cases of liquor, provisions, clothing, &c., and wantonly destroying or exposing to the weather what they were not in a position to make use of. American clocks were set up as targets. Hats, ties and other articles of clothing were hung about on trees. All kinds of liquor were broached and consumed on the premises. Champagne and liqueurs were drained out of tin mugs, while whisky, brandy and other spirits were tossed down by the bottle."

What wonder if the poor traders in Buluwayo when they heard of these things bitterly declared that the force which had been sent to relieve them had certainly relieved them of their goods. In many instances, however—indeed, whenever proofs were forthcoming—the Chartered Company paid compensation.

We get many glimpses of the ruthless way in which this avenging war was carried on. Thus we are told quite simply that when flanking parties on the march came across stragglers they were "either ridden down and shot on sight, or made prisoners and despatched by a firing party on the confines of the laager." The description of the fighting in the hills is graphic and effective, and helps us to understand what a murderous sort of "hide and seek" game it was. The superior arms of the whites were largely balanced by the superior agility of the natives and their knowledge of the country, the nature of which often enabled them to fire with deadly certainty, at close range, from behind rocks. Smoking the rebels out of their caves, and then shooting them as they bolted, was comparatively safe work; and occasionally the raiders were rewarded by the capture of great numbers of cattle and goats, but more often they would have to mourn the loss of half a dozen comrades, and then wonder whether that of the enemy had been at all greater in proportion. The inadequate numbers at the disposal of the British commanders led to the adoption of radically wrong tactics. The weak point of the plan adopted was clearly pointed out by a native critic when he said,

"the column would march into the hills and have a fight, and then at night go back to camp. That is no way to fight the Matabele. You must sleep in the hills after the battle, and keep on following the enemy from one kopje to another, and kill so many that you break his heart. But instead of that you go back to camp, the Matabele thinks you have had enough of it, and soon they collect together again, and are more confident than ever again."

In fact, it became apparent that a much larger force would have to be got together, and that, with the difficulties of transport, meant a long delay, or else a chain of forts would have to be built, by means of which the rebels might in time be starved into surrender. It was left to Mr. Rhodes to suggest a third alternative—that of securing peace by direct negotiations. It is an old story now how Mr. Rhodes carried out his own suggestion and induced the rebel chiefs to lay down their arms. It is an old story, but it is excellently well told in these pages. And it is impossible not to feel something of sympathy with these savage chiefs who so honourably respected the confidence the white man had placed in them, and who, addressing Mr. Rhodes, as he sat in their midst upon an ant-hill bare-headed and unarmed, said, "We are the nation. We have submitted to you, our father and great chief. Only remain in the country to look after us, and do not come and go."

In describing the causes which led to the massacres of the white settlers in the early stages of the rebellion our author lays stress upon the action of the Company in claiming Lobengula's cattle by right of conquest after the war of 1893. Obviously in the case of an absolute and savage despot it was difficult to distinguish between the royal herds and those which were the property of the subordinate chiefs. This led to a system by which the Native Commissioners were authorised to collect and send in a certain number of head each month according to the size of their respective districts. This system of appropriation was in force for eleven months, but as it was necessarily carried out in a rough and arbitrary manner, it led to much friction. Subsequently, at a meeting of the head-men of the nation, it was agreed that the Government should take 45 per cent. of the cattle, and that the remaining 55 per cent. should be branded N. C. (native cattle) and returned to the natives for their own use. Then came the rinderpest; and the enforced shooting of the animals so given back made the natives desperate. After that it seemed useless to trust the good faith of the white man any more. However, peace is now once more established, and confidence to some extent restored, and the approach of the railway to Buluwayo has revolutionised the conditions of any future struggle.

It only remains to say that Mr. Sykes's volume is freely illustrated with photographs and with some very spirited sketches.

A COLLECTOR'S CONFESSIONS.

The Confessions of a Collector. By William G. Hazlitt. (Ward & Downey.)

Book-lovers may be divided into two classes: those who love books for their matter, and those who love books for their form. One of the most voracious and retentive readers we ever knew never had more than a score or so of books in his rooms at Oxford. He bought, read, digested and sold; having made his mental meal, he did not care to see the relics of yesterday's dinner littering the place. He belonged to the former of the two classes. Mr. Hazlitt, into whose "Confessions" we have been dipping, is as typical a member of the latter class as you could wish to find. For years he has been a well-known frequenter of sale-rooms; he has burrowed among bookshelves, and spent a considerable portion of his life in handling the products of other men's brains. And yet from his confessions one may gather that in his view a book is not a thing to read, but a thing to pick up cheap and sell at a profit. And the impression left on our mind after reading this book, is that the true bibliophile stands on precisely the same level as the speculator in wheat-futures.

It is true that Mr. Hazlitt apologises for the commercial tone which leaves so unpleasant a taste in the mouth of the reader of his book. The res angusta domi compelled him to look after the pence, and his ambition was to draw up a catalogue of our earlier national literature. Wherefore he entered into engagements with certain private collectors, and also the British Museum, to seek for rarities and pass them on at a profit. One of his earliest clients appears to have been Mr. Henry Huth, whose library Mr. Hazlitt engaged to complete, and thereupon entered on a search for anything that could be bought at a reasonable price, described in his catalogue, and then resold to one or other of the wealthy collectors with whom he had relations. Forty years or so dealing in rare books has certainly supplied Mr. Hazlitt with an intimate knowledge of the varying values of editions and the tactics which are necessary to leave an auction room with a coveted work and the certainty of profit. For example, here is Mr. Hazlitt's description of his method at Arthur's, a shop which used to be found in Holywell-street:

"While Arthur was in business, there was a grammatical tract in English printed by De Worde in his catalogue at £3 3s. I went in to ask for it, and Ridler said that I could not have it. (Ridler was Arthur's assistant.) 'Is it out of the house?' I inquired. 'No,' said he, 'but it is put aside for a gentleman who always gives me something for myself.' 'What does he give you?' said I. 'A shilling,' quoth he. 'I will give you two.' The lot left the shop in my pocket."

This same Ridler must have been a quaint study. He described a certain volume as "difficult of procuration." It is pleasant to be able to record that Ridler had his reward in this world. The passage in which Mr. Hazlitt describes this is worth quoting as an illustration of his style and the chaotic state of his punctuation, which in the rest of our quotations we take the liberty of correcting:

"There are many among us, who remember Arthur in Holywell-street. He was a singular character, and had been a porter, I think, at one of the auction-rooms. My purchases of him were very numerous; and they were always right and reasonable, or I should not have been his client. He left £400 to Mr. Ridler his assistant, who, called in Reeves to appraise the stock, and obtained it within that amount."

It seems clear that Ridler got something; but we cannot decide whether it was the stock or the £400, and, if so, within what amount. At all events, if Arthur was always as fortunate as in the following transaction, he could afford to be generous to his assistant, so we hope it was the stock.

"It was Arthur who had the only copy ever been [surely the author wrote 'seen'] with the colophon of Slatyer's Palæobion, 1621; he got it for a few shillings of Lazarus in the same street, and sold it to Sir Thomas Phillipps, of Middle Hill, for £15."

Only for a few years, however, did Mr. Hazlitt confine his attention to books. He is a born collector, though a collector who values his find not for its intrinsic interest, but for its potential price in the market. The slightest impulse turned his energies to a new field. Someone gave his little son a bag of coins, forthwith Mr. Hazlitt was seized with numismania. He caught philately by seeing a collection of stamps in Reynolds's shop, but relinquished the pursuit because he "was advised that the liability to deception was excessive." Old china and pictures, too, engaged his attention; and you will find, if you can suppress your irritation at Mr. Hazlitt's style, his punctuation, and his all-pervading egotism, many curious glimpses of the underside of the curiosity market. Did you ever hear of the "circular system" which appears to be adopted by dealers in old china? It is the system "by which curiosities go the round of the watering-places and spas in quest of homes. I saw a Worcester jug at Bournemouth which had visited nearly every resort in the kingdom, and still awaited an admirer."

The picture market, as many of Mr. Hazlitt's stories prove, is beset with traps for the unwary. At Sotheby's, some years ago, a portrait of Charles I. appeared. "It was," says Mr. Hazlitt,

"a likeness of Charles the II. in the first instance; but an ingenious person, judging that the Martyred monarch was more negotiable than the Merry one, and unwittingly oblivious of the discordant costume, had painted in a head of Charles the First."

The collector of books, as you will find from these Confessions, has his ups and downs, his profits and his losses, just as those who speculate in pork. "I am perhaps entitled," says the author in his concluding chapter,

"to pay myself a few compliments on the singular rarity of occasions which have found me on the losing and victimised side. Thrice have I suffered for my sins; for it was always my own fault. I handled things which I did not understand; it is an error against which I should urge everyone to guard most strenuously."

And one of those errors Mr. Hazlitt managed to repair to some extent at the expense of a younger and more ignorant collector. It was a little matter of a xylographic block in which he found himself deceived. Here are the closing words of his Confessions, in which the commercial note of the book is well sustained:

"How grateful I was to the enthusiast in his teens who, when I had wasted a five-pound note on a worm-eaten xylographic block, put down a couple of guineas for it, and left me only poorer by the difference!"

SUPERFLUOUS CRITICISM.

The Old Dramatists: Conjectural Readings.
By K. Deighton. (Constable & Co.)

A LITTLE more than a century ago few subjects were of keener interest to scholars all the world over than the possibility of amending a doubtful or corrupt reading in any given classic. It was a game that suited the large leisure and considered ingenuity of our great-great-grandfathers. But to us whose days can never be described as spacious, whose eager panting existences are hedged in by vital problems that never touched those unpopulous days, such a pastime seems idle in its very essence. The taste for such things has gradually disappeared from the land; it lingered perhaps in some degree down to the death of Macaulay, who took a curious pleasure in the scholastic quibbles of the eighteenth century, and who was never so happy as when he was describing the history of the Battle of the Books, and carefully distinguishing between Bentley, the editor of Horace, and Bentley, the editor of Milton. When, therefore, in this year of grace, you come across a book of conjectural readings on the texts, not even of world-wide classics, but of old dramatists who, however extensively they may be admired, are certainly not often read—Marston, Marlowe, Heywood, Dekker, and Webster among others—you feel that it is a work born out of due season. This should be no volume in green cloth cover printed in clearest and most modern types; it should come bound in solid calf, with a rippling gold margin on the covers, with yellow leaves and heavy, solemn type. The date on its title-page should be MDCCXVII., not this gay and sprightly 1896; you cannot associate it, in a word, with the present condition of Hyde Park Corner or the modern London aspect, say, of the New North Road.

But if the book seems idle in its essence we know no epithet wherewith to describe the idleness of its details. Let us consider a few of the examples. In The Fawn the following rather absurd observation is made:

"No, let my wise, aged, learned, intelligent father—that can interpret eyes, understand the language of birds, interpret the grumbling of dogs, &c."

"For 'interpret eyes'" calmly comments Mr. Deighton, "I think we should read 'penetrate eyes,' the word 'interpret' being caught from the line below." He gives no further reason for the substitution of that meaningless phrase "penetrate eyes," being evidently persuaded that no writer could possibly use the same word twice intelligently in one sentence when it was possible to use another word unintelligently.

In Sophonisba the perfectly straightforward line occurs:

"Close the vault's mouth lest we do slip in drink."

"Probably sleep," says Mr. Deighton, although he kindly allows that slip may mean "be guilty of carelessness." Of course it is not sleep, nor does slip mean "guilty of carelessness." The word is "slip," and the meaning is the obvious one; men slip when they are in drink, though perhaps Mr. Deighton is unaware of it, as a casual walk down London streets on a Saturday night would prove to him; besides, only by reading the line as it stands is the warning made clear. It would be impossible, and, indeed, if it were possible, it would be unnecessary to accumulate examples of this kind; but one or two further emendations of a peculiarly unprovoked nature may be selected. In Eastward Ho! occurs the line,

"Poor man, how weak he is! the weak water has wasted away his strength."

"The second weak," says Mr. Deighton, should, I think, be omitted; and perhaps we should read washed for wasted." We leave that without comment; it appeals to us as the very superfluity of idleness. The following, however, goes one better still. This passage occurs in Valentinian:

"The wingéd feet of flying enemies
I have stood and view'd thee mow away like rushes
And still kill the killer."

They are not very glorious lines, but their meaning is perfectly plain. "I have viewed thee mow away flying enemies," the speaker says, "and at the same time kill the enemies who were not flying, but killed as they advanced." Now observe Mr. Deighton's amazing correction. "I would read," he says:

"And still toil kill the killer":

i.e., though you mowed them down like rushes, so great was their number that you were almost dead with the mere labour of slaying. The word toil is sufficiently like kill to have been accidentally omitted." How "still toil kill the killer" could ever come on earth to mean "you were almost dead with the labour of slaying," human ingenuity will never be able to explain to us; if it meant anything—and we have our doubts if it ever could mean anything—it would imply that the man was dead outright, a ridiculous conclusion; but the introduction of the word "toil" is itself a monstrous assumption, and is not really justified by possessing the illumination of one shred of meaning. Perhaps, however, the most unconsciously humorous passage in this curious book is apropos of the following lines from The Woman's Prize:

"They heave ye stool on stool, and fling main-pot-lids
Like massy rocks, dart ladles, tossing irons,
And tongs like thunderbolts."

Nares, it appears, thinks that "tossing irons" means pokers; but Mr. Deighton is not to be ruled by a mere Nares; "rather, I fancy," says he—"shovels."

With that quotation we may cease. In that last unfortunate emendation the significance, the aims, and the ambitions of all such labours are summed up. Mr. Deighton may complain that we regard the matter from too utilitarian a point of view, and that he concerns himself less with railways and shares than with art; but we will not even leave him that vantage-ground. If he had really taken up some hopelessly corrupt M.S. of beautiful literary art, and, by his shining inspiration, had brought it back to the loveliness of its creation, he would have deserved well of the world. This has, however, been neither his ambition nor, certainly, his achievement. He has potted over little lines of poetry about which, for the most part, it does not matter whether they were written thus or thus, and which do not seem to us much to be bettered even by a change from darkness into twilight. We may summarise the whole matter by declaring it as our honest opinion that it would probably be of the highest importance to Mr. Deighton to know (if any doubt on the matter existed) whether the missiles which the cook threw at the Duchess in Alice in Wonderland were pokers or shovels; he might never have guessed that they were frying-pans.

COMPACT BIOGRAPHY.

Norman Macleod. By John Wellwood.
(Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

THE "Famous Scots Series," of which this is the latest volume, is a lesson to biographers in the matter of brevity. The volumes comprising it each fill about 150 pages, and they prove how possible it is to give within those limits a life-like portrait of a remarkable personage. The length of modern biographies is their bane. Many a good man's memory has been smothered of late years in the pages written to keep it alive. We have seen this again and again. And if, as we hold is mournfully true, biography has become largely dissociated from fine literary work, is it not due to this passion for length? The abandonment of selection and condensation which reigns in biography would wreck any literary art. In most cases a long biography is an unfair tax. We have few years in which to live our own lives, and write our own letters. We do not say that a biographer should give us, in place of an oil portrait, only a sketch; rather let him paint us a miniature that we can look closely into, and even fondle. If only when a man of note—not of the very first fame—passes from us, we could look to have in a year's time a short biography, written with as much art as goes to many a second-rate story!

Well, here is a life of Norman Macleod in 150 pages. We have enjoyed it very much. Macleod seems remote now, like all early Victorian men and things; but he was a fine fellow, and we have not been bored even by his ancestry. The Macleods issued from the cool, bare Hebrides, where the first of three Norman Macleods met Dr. Johnson at Dunvegan Castle. This Norman Macleod's grandson, the Norman, grew up in Campbeltown, a free and fearless lad, to whom "the beauty and the mystery, the ships and the magic of the sea," were a daily joy. At Glasgow Old College he was known as "the sailor." He assiduously neglected his studies in favour of mimicry and an ebullient sense of fun. Then the voice of Chalmers reached him; and the death of a brother sobered him; and a visit to Weimar broadened him; and he came back to Glasgow a serious student. But never did a certain reckless humour cease to startle and educate his brethren.

The sober story of Macleod's maturer life and his ministry, kindles into interest at several points. There was his intimate connexion with Her Majesty the Queen, both before and after the death of the Prince Consort. He first preached before the Queen in 1854 at Balmoral, and it is amusing to find the Queen describing his sermon in her diary as "extempore"; Macleod had preached it only fifteen times! Five months after the death of the Prince Consort the Queen came to Balmoral and sent for Norman Macleod. It is well-known that his ministry to Her Majesty at this sad period was such as to win her deepest regard. Macleod became a great favourite at the Queen's Scottish court, but we wish Mr. Wellwood did not labour so hard to convince us of it. One incident is mentioned by him as "a crowning instance" of Macleod's intimacy with the Queen. It should have been given on its merits. "The Queen," wrote Macleod, "sat down to spin at a nice Scotch wheel, while I read Robert Burns to her, 'Tam o' Shanter,' and 'A man's a man for a' that,' her favourite." What do our Kailyard precisians think of Macleod writing "Scotch"? Macleod was a Kailyard-writer himself, but we need not pause to discuss his stories: they were honest stuff, and they are forgotten. Mr. Wellwood wants to know why they are forgotten—"when work similar to his, only duller, is boomed over all the earth." Well, it isn't duller, and in those days booms were reserved for Thackeray and Dickens. Besides, Macleod's stories are thirty years old, and thirty years from now they will not be more forgotten than some stories we could name.

Macleod's storm and stress period was connected with the Sunday question. As late as 1834 the General Assembly had gravely entered on its minutes: "Multitudes, forgetful of their immortal interests, are accustomed to wander in the fields." Macleod believed in wandering in the fields, and when the Glasgow presbytery issued a pastoral letter about Sunday trains, basing the sanctity of Sunday on the Decalogue, Macleod read it from his pulpit, and then proceeded to demolish it. "Christians," he said, "had nothing to do with the Sabbath." "The Decalogue had been nailed to the cross of Christ," &c. There was an earth-shaking outcry. Macleod was cut dead by his clerical brethren, and hissed in the streets by one of them. Says Mr. Wellwood:

"With the common folk it was probably the word Decalogue that did all the mischief. What it was they did not exactly know, but it was an awful thing, the Decalogue, like the Equator; and 'Norman Macleod was for daein' awa' wi't,' as, with scared face and bated breath, they told one another in the streets."

But in the same streets an old woman, "blinking in the brilliant weather, was overheard saying to herself"—one day long after this—"Eh, but Providence has been kind to Norman, g'ien him sic a grand day for his funeral." That tells much.

QUEEN AND PRINCESS.

The Mirror of the Sinful Soul. Translated from the French of Margaret of Navarre by the Princess Elizabeth. Edited for the Royal Society of Literature by Percy W. Ames. (Asher.)

THE facsimile which the Royal Society of Literature has given to the world is an interesting memorial of two remarkable women. It is taken from a MS. translation of Le Miroir de l'Âme Pécheresse of Marguerite d'Angoulême, Queen of Navarre, written by the Princess Elizabeth, afterwards Queen of England. Elizabeth was only eleven years old at the time and in disgrace at court, and her task appears to have been performed as a New Year's gift for her stepmother and consistent friend, Queen Katharine Parr. The MS. is written in Elizabeth's own hand, a childish unformed hand, but beautifully clear, and already showing traces of the exquisite calligraphy of her later years. And the elaborately embroidered cover is probably the work of Elizabeth's own needle. It is wrought in gold and silver wire on a ground of blue silk, and the device includes the Queen's initials in the centre and a heartsease or pansy at each corner. Needlework, handwriting, and translation alike testify to the talents and accomplishments which all the chroniclers unite in ascribing to Elizabeth's childhood.

It is curious to find the future champion of the English Reformation already busied with one of the most characteristic products of the early reforming spirit in France. Mr. Ames suggests, plausibly enough, that the copy of the Miroir with which Elizabeth worked may have been a relic of her own mother, the light and ill-starred Anne Boleyn. For Anne Boleyn had gone to France in the train of Mary Tudor, and had then passed into the service of Queen Claude, and, finally, into that of Margaret herself, at that time Duchess of Alençon. Mr. Ames also points out that Margaret might well, on two occasions, have been in a position to exercise a far more important influence on English history. Her hand was sought in marriage by Henry VII. in 1503, and again by Henry VIII., when doubts as to the union with Catherine of Arragon first began to trouble his tender conscience. Well might it have been for England if this large-brained, high-spirited, deep-souled woman, and not Anne Boleyn, had become her queen. For surely the whole pageant of European history during the fifteenth century presents no more sympathetic figure than her whom her royal brother loved to call "the pearl of Valois." "Mysister Margaret," said Francis the First, "is the only woman I ever knew who has every virtue and every grace without one mixture of vice"; and even Henry the Second, not guiltless in his conduct toward his aunt, had no less gracious an eulogy for her virtue: "If it were not for my aunt Margaret, I should doubt the existence of such a thing as genuine goodness on the earth, but never have I been disappointed in her." Brantôme's ribald pen was not above laying scandal—undeserved, we may be sure—to Margaret's name; but Brantôme, in his better moods, was not proof against the influence of so much purity and gaiety of spirit. He says:

"She chose for her emblem the marigold, which by its rays and leaves has a seeming affinity with the sun, and turns wherever he goes. She added the device, 'I seek not things below,' as a sign that she directed all her actions, thoughts, desires, and affections to that great Sun which is God: and hence she was suspected of being attached to the Lutheran religion."

A naive and innocent confession, this last; but it scarcely gives the real measure of Margaret's enlightenment. Her keen spirit overpassed many of the limitations of her age, and found its true home, not with Luther or with Calvin, but with Dante and with Plato. The witty, secular side of Margaret's disposition is well known to many in that sunshiny book which she composed or compiled, The Heptameron; for her real self you must plumb the depths of her spiritual verse, and especially of that wonderful autobiographical poem, lately rescued from oblivion by M. Abel Lefranc, Les Prisons de la Reine de Navarre. Far inferior in interest is the Miroir de l'Âme Pécheresse, which fell into the hands of the child Elizabeth; but, unlike the Prisons, it was published in Margaret's lifetime, and had an eventful history. The Sorbonne condemned it as heretical, and it took the personal intervention of Francis to save it from the flames, while the students of the College of Navarre were inspired to act a comedy wherein the queen was represented as a Fury of Hell. The poem, says Beza,

"was composed in a strain very unusual in the Church of Rome, there being no mention made in it either of male or female saints, or of merits, or of any other purgatory than the blood of Jesus Christ."

Mr. Ames deserves great credit for the careful introduction which he has written for this volume, for the excellence of the facsimile, and for the charming portrait of Elizabeth as a girl which serves as frontispiece. It is taken from a picture in the collection at Windsor Castle, and is attributed in the official catalogue to Holbein. By Holbein, however, it cannot be, for that artist died in 1543, when Elizabeth was ten years of age, and the picture represents her at about thirteen or fourteen. It is certainly more attractive with its demure, gentle, serious expression than any of the later portraits.

A DIPLOMATIST'S WIFE.

Gabriele von Bülow, Daughter of Wilhelm von Humboldt: a Memoir. Translated by Clara Nordlinger. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

THE memoir of Gabriele von Bülow, which has just been translated into English, is, unhappily, an example of the unsuccessful class of biography. It is extremely long; much of the matter which it contains is of a kind to interest none save the personal friends of its subject; the great majority of the letters which are reprinted in it, some of them dating back fifty, sixty, seventy years, deal with purely family matters which are totally devoid of significance at this distance of time, while those which touch on public events are, for the most part, too slight and sketchy to have any historical value. Indeed, it does not seem as if the compiler of the memoir intended to rely on these for the interest of the book. The idea was rather to attempt to give to the world, by means of extracts from letters with just enough of explanatory matter to make a coherent story, a picture of a beautiful and amiable woman, whom the accidents of her position threw into contact with the Great World of her time. Such a memoir could only have been interesting in so far as it gave a series of clear and vivid pictures of that World and its inhabitants. The opportunity was there if Frau von Bülow and her husband had been the kind of people whose letters contained brilliant sketches of the various interesting people whom they met, but unhappily they were not.

During his career as Prussian Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of St. James's from 1827 to 1841, Heinrich von Bülow was in a position to meet, and did meet, an enormous number of men and women of note. With his sovereign, Frederick William of Prussia, he was on terms of affectionate intimacy. During his career in London he came in contact with three English monarchs, George IV., William IV., and Queen Victoria. With William IV. and Queen Adelaide, both as Duke and Duchess of Clarence and afterwards, he and his wife were evidently on exceptionally friendly terms. Of famous Englishmen, you meet in his book such names as the Duke of Wellington, Lord Palmerston, Lord Melbourne, Lord and Lady Holland; but you do not find any illuminating sentence, any vital criticism, any vivid piece of description or analysis. You do not even find any anecdote or story worth remembering. In fact, the author does not seem to have intended that you should. Instead, you have a vast number of letters dealing with the ordinary incidents of family life, the births of children, the deaths of relatives, with servants, parties, visits. And even these are for the most part touched upon too cursorily to be of any value as documents. One looks in vain for the kind of detail, the completeness, which is the essential glory of Boswell. The memoir, in fact, should have been privately printed if it was desirable to print it at all: a remark which applies, indeed, to a number of the biographical volumes that appear every year. The public ought not to be called upon to buy works of this nature, which deal either with the lives of unimportant persons or are indistinct and diffuse. Men and women, there is no doubt, enter too lightly upon the task of biography. On the other hand, if published purely for private circulation among friends and acquaintances, there is little to be said against a book which sins against every sound biographical law.

The weakness of the book before us is particularly unfortunate, because it stretches over a long period of history, and one full of exciting incidents and great events. Beginning with the marriage of Wilhelm von Humboldt, Gabriele's father, in 1791, it covers the period of the great events of the Napoleonic Wars, while Gabriele herself, who lived from 1802 to 1887, must have had cognisance of all that was going on in Europe during a considerable portion of the present century. But any one who expects to find any new lights thrown upon this long period of history in this book will be greatly disappointed. Excepting the settlement of the Hollando-Belgian question, after years of wrangling, in 1839, in which Bülow had a considerable share, no events of public importance receive more than a passing mention. In place of these we have extracts from letters dealing with household matters of furnishing and upholstery, snatches of travel to this place and that, a smattering of art and artists. Frau von Bülow, in fact, was not sufficiently a public character to make her historically interesting, while her qualities were too negative, too much like the ordinary run of ordinary good women in a certain position in society, to provide an engrossing psychological study. Occasionally you get in the letters a good piece of description. Here is one of Ischia:

"A divine stillness reigns over the island; only a few lights here and there betoken the presence of man; from afar comes the sound of the sea beating in rhythmic measure upon the crags below; high above the mountains stands the clear pale moon, shedding its silvery light upon the white houses, while Vesuvius opposite emits a steady column of flame."

But these are few and far between, and the book as a whole deals with matters which will not greatly interest the general reader.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

"COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND."—Moray and Nairn. By Charles Rampini, LL.D. (Blackwood & Sons.)

SHERIFF RAMPINI tells a plain tale with no embellishments. His style is not always perfect, and sometimes the wilderness of detail becomes confused, but he has a fairly intelligible general plan, and he has the primary advantage of intimate acquaintance with his subject. Not only is he well read in the history of the place, but his knowledge of local customs and old tales is that of the loving enthusiast. Out of it all he has made an admirable book of reference, and a piece of history of some general interest.

Few countries in proportion to their size possess such a wealth of local literature as Scotland. Every village of Threepdaile and parish of Kilmaclavers has its chronicler, and from the Statistical Accounts to this new series of county histories we have a wealth of records. Not the least interesting are those of the northern province of Moray, for the history of the county is the history of Scotland in little. A haunt of ancient wars, it was harried by Northmen under Sigurd, Earl of Orkney; and when alien settlers from the South filled the land, the Celts of the hills kept their swords from rusting. Then came the Church, and the cathedral of Elgin and the beautiful priory of Pluscarden rose among the wilds. But the days of battle were only beginning.

Comyns, Buchans, Dunbars, and Gordons fought their battles in its boundaries. "Morayland, quhair all men taks thair prey," wrote Lochiel, the chief of the Camerons; and, says Mr. Rampini, "it is the testimony of an expert." Few earldoms have such a roll of famous names as this, from Earl Randolph the first to the great Regent and the "Bonnie Earl of Moray," who was slain by Huntly on the Fife shore. It was the land of the Laird of Grant, "that Hieland sant," of the Duffs, Earls of Fife, and the wizard, Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonstoun, who sold his soul to the devil and played havoc with the countryside. Montrose conducted part of his campaign there, and Charles Edward made his last stand in its near neighbourhood. Even so late as 1820 the King's law "came little above the pass of Balmaha," for in an election contest the Grants sent round the fiery cross to summon their men, and the Fife faction came armed to meet them. A strange scene this for days so near to Cobdenism and Reform.

The place has another claim to distinction, for in the early part of the century it was swept by the most terrible flood of modern times. He who would read of the "Moray Floods" will find the tale in Sir Thomas Dick Lauder's pages. But here is one story of Mr. Rampini's worth repeating:

"A man who had been saving the furniture of a poor neighbour fell over a bridge and was carried down by the stream, and then cast on the bank by the mere force of the torrent.

"What did you think of when you were in the water?" demanded a bystander.

"Think of?" replied the other. "I was thinking how I could get out and how I could catch my bonnet."

There, too, old customs and traditions seem to have long lingered. Here is a verse from the "Thiggars' Chant," which young men sang on Hogmanay night before their neighbours' houses:

"If ye hae plenty and winna gie,
Besouthen, Besouthen!
The Deil will get ye when ye dee,
An' awa' by Southron toun.
Our shoon are made o' th' red coo's hide,
Besouthen, Besouthen!
Our feet are cauld, we canna bide,
An' awa' by Southron toun."

There was a strange custom of stopping the clock and shutting up the cat whenever an inmate of a house died, apparently lest the animal should walk over the body. Lastly, Morayland had its Bcoitia, a place called Mavistoun, where a certain fisherman, seeing a cow for the first time, with its horns and cloven hoofs, guessed that he stood before the Accuser of the Brethren, and fled incontinent through the thatch.

The book is a favourable specimen of its industrious and sober class. We recommend it to natives of the countryside, and to others who love a record of old feuds and follies.

The Apocalypse of St. John. By John Gwynn, D.D., &c. (Longmans & Co.)

A work by the Regius Professor of Divinity at Dublin and noticeable as the first Syriac book issued by the University Press. It is in form the reproduction of a unique Syriac MS. belonging to the Earl of Crawford, which, according to Dr. Gwynn, was written towards the end of the twelfth century in a Jacobite monastery of Kurdistan in the district now known as Jebul Tûr. He thinks the text on which it was founded is that made by Polycarp "the chorepiscopus" (choir-master?) for Philoxenus of Mabug in A.D. 508, and is therefore earlier in date than the revision of the same text by Thomas of Harkel which has hitherto been the only form of it known to us. The care with which the MS. has been worked over by the editor is apparent on every page, and neither pains nor expense have been spared in its reproduction. To the Syriac text, beautifully printed by the University Press, Dr. Gwynn has prefixed a dissertation on all the known Syriac versions of the New Testament, an exhaustive discussion on the present MS., and a complete reconstruction of the Greek text from which he supposes its original to have been made. The labour involved in this must have been as extraordinary as the accuracy and lucidity of the result, and the publication makes good Dr. Gwynn's claim to a place in the very first rank of Syriac scholars.

For the general reader the chief interest of the book will doubtless lie in the variations from the Revised Version which it presents. In some of these, as in the omission of the words, "And he opened the pit of the abyss," in Rev. ix. 2, the Crawford has the support of the Sinaitic, the Basilean, and of some other versions. In others it stands alone. Among these last it may be noticed that it is not "God" but "the Lamb" who is here said in vii. 17 to "wipe away every tear"; in xii. 10 the words, "and the authority of his Christ," are omitted from the angelic proclamation, as is the statement that "the harvest of the earth is over-ripe," in xiv. 15. So we find that the voice in x. 4 is said to come "from the seventh heaven," that the beast "which was and is not" (or in other words, Nero) is called the Dragon as well as the Beast, that in xix. 19 he is described as having armies of his own, and in xi. 7 as coming from the sea and not from the abyss, while in xvi. 3 the sea itself is said to become "as a dead man," a figure which reminds Dr. Gwynn of "the very deep did rot" of Coleridge. We wish we had more space to discuss these and other various readings. Some of them certainly make better sense than the Revised Version, and go a long way to support the theory that the Apocalypse was originally written, not in Greek, but in some Aramaean dialect.

The Private Life of the Queen. By One of Her Majesty's Servants. (C. Arthur Pearson, Limited.)

VERILY, it is a fierce light that beats upon a throne. Here it lights up Her Majesty's smallest daily acts; it penetrates into every room of her palaces, into the kitchens, and the Gold-pantry, and the Silver-pantry, and the linen-rooms, and the china-cupboards, and into the cellars in which George IV., privileged to import wine duty free, laid down ports and sherries and Madeiras in such quantities that time has mellowed what it could hardly deplete. No such complete picture of the Queen's daily life, her tastes, habits, pastimes, and "fads and fancies," has yet been given to a loyal reading public. The Queen as Artist, Musician, Dancer, Writer, Hostess, House-keeper, and Worker is portrayed in separate chapters of this interesting book.

We have an account of the Royal Library at Windsor Castle, and here is the Queen's taste in reading in a nutshell:

"Almost first in Her Majesty's favour come the works of Scott, those she likes most being The Antiquary, The Talisman, and Peveril of the Peak. Of his poems she is extremely fond, and she possesses a copy of them with his own emendations of them on the margin, while her love of Scotland has frequently been expressed by her to her friends in apt quotations from The Lady of the Lake, Marmion, and the Lay of the Last Minstrel. The Queen's admiration for Scott's work has induced her to have one room at Balmoral entirely decorated with scenes from his poems and books. Jane Austen's novels have also been very popular with the Queen. A few of Lord Beaconsfield's works are here, and a handsome copy of Lothair, in three volumes and bound in royal blue, contains the inscription: 'For the Queen, from a faithful servant'; Kingsley's Saints' Tragedy and Two Years Ago, Tennyson's Idylls of the King, Trollope's Barchester Towers, a complete set of Thackeray's works, some of the Brontës' and Edna Lyall's books, many of R. L. Stevenson's romances, Rudyard Kipling's stories, Edmund Yates' Reminiscences, and nearly all of Mrs. Oliphant's novels; Rider Haggard's She and Jess; Sponge's Sporting Tour and two full editions of Dickens' books . . . are all conspicuous on these characteristically filled shelves. The Queen also possesses and values greatly an original unpublished MS. of Charles Dickens."

The worth of a book like this depends upon its minute fidelity to fact. We are bound to say that these pages bear the stamp of matter-of-fact truth. They are evidently not from the pen of a trained writer. "A strong decorative note is struck by the organ" is a whimsical sentence, for in these days of mixed metaphors one has to look twice to see whether the note is one of sound or colour.

America and the Americans. From a French Point of View. (W. Heinemann.)

It would not be amiss if there were fewer books written about America and the Americans. One a year should be full allowance, and Mr. Stevens's Land of the Dollar ought to have made another impossible until 1898. Yet it did not, for here is a matter of three hundred pages offering up the Transatlantic people from a French point of view, in spite of the fact that M. Bourget's Outre-mer may be said already to have accomplished that pretty effectually. We should not mind so much if the anonymous author of the work before us had anything new to say, or a peculiarly attractive way of saying what is old; but he has not. He merely ticks off the well-known characteristics of the Eastern states one by one, pads his remarks with statistics, and that is all. M. Bourget's penetrative eyes and delicate sensorium, Max O'Rell's crisp generalities and witty audacities, Mr. Stevens's unemotional interest and cynical amusement—these are all lacking. We have instead the exceedingly matter-of-fact record of the short visit to America of a stolid, conservative Frenchman, whose very conservatism makes him a poor judge of so progressive and young a nation. He offers, it is true, only his own impressions; but impressionists to win us must be very delightful persons. There is no doubt that the author of America and the Americans says many true things, but most of them, if not all, have been said before.

Billy and Hans. By W. J. Stillman. (Bliss, Sands & Co.)

MR. STILLMAN'S last book was, we believe, a dissertation on the nude in art. He is also, we are informed on the title-page of this little volume, the author of works on the Cretan insurrection of 1866 and the late uprising in Herzegovina. His public may therefore admit to being a little unprepared for Billy and Hans, which is the record of two tame squirrels. But no lover of animals who reads the book will be disappointed. Mr. Stillman writes about his pets with a depth of affection and appreciation not usually associated with squirrels, although in this case, we feel assured, not misplaced. He seems to have established closer relations with these timid creatures than we ever remember to have read of before; and no fear of looking ridiculous has deterred him from setting down in plain English his belief in their powers of sympathy and understanding and the grief their death caused him. It is this frank statement of emotions which, rarely felt by those who keep pets, and, when felt, almost never admitted, that gives Mr. Stillman's little book its peculiar value and stamps it as literature. We might add that the kernel of the volume appeared in the form of an article in the Century, and has been reprinted, with additions, for the benefit of a home for poor children requiring surgical treatment. We wish all good to this home, yet we would prefer that another book had been secured to swell its revenue, and Mr. Stillman's little history circulated free of charge by the R.S.P.C.A. It is a most eloquent and touching appeal for wide humanity to wild creatures.

Historic Studies in Vaud, Berne, and Savoy, from Roman Times to Voltaire, Rousseau, and Gibbon. By General Meredith Read. In 2 vols., with Illustrations. (Chatto & Windus.)

It was enthusiasm for the historian of the Decline and Fall that drew General Read to Lausanne, where Gibbon is either forgotten or vaguely apotheosised as a member of the British Royal Family; and there he spent eighteen laborious years in the investigation of a vast number of documents heaped up in one of the rooms of La Grotte, in the tireless search after local legends, and in examining any scrap of paper that he could persuade the families of the neighbourhood to place in his hands. The result is a couple of volumes of a surprising bigness, stuffed with the matter out of which history is made. The author's work was cut short by death; otherwise it would not be easy to forgive the absence of chapter-headings and a table of contents, without which aids it is not easy to read intelligently a book of so miscellaneous a character. Still, such as it is, the work is a treasury of curious and diverse entertainment; it is not lightly to be enterprised for consecutive reading, but to be opened here and there with a confident hope of lighting on a plum.

Ferrets. By Nicholas Everitt. (A. & C. Black.)

WE do not keep ferrets ourselves, and Mr. Everitt's book decides us never to begin. To own such a white ferret as that photographed on p. 58 of this book would, of course, be a distinction, but the care of it when resting and the recovery of it when working seem to promise more anxiety than the ordinary man ought to undertake. Yet for level-headed persons whose time hangs heavily upon their hands, ferrets should offer attractive occupation, and Mr. Everitt's book be invaluable. The author, we might remark, is known also as "H. R. E." and as "Will o' the Wisp," although we are unacquainted with him in these characters. In his own person, as Nicholas Everitt, he is able to write practical English, which, combined with his special knowledge, is his strength. When departing from unadorned facts, as he does in the appendix on a day's rabbiting, he is less admirable.

The Procession of the Flowers. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. (Longmans & Co.)

THE essays by Col. Higginson, which are collected in this little volume, are well known in America, but have not hitherto been published here. They are pleasant, rambling dissertations on flowers and birds and the open air generally, which, to readers that do not know the work of Mr. John Burroughs (who has done the same thing much better), may be interesting. To our mind the author seems to fall between two stools: he has not observed enough or read enough for the naturalist, nor is he fanciful and engaging enough for the essayist.

A Bibliography of the Works of William Morris. By Temple Scott. (George Bell & Sons.)

THIS bibliography will be a great assistance to the professed student of the writings of William Morris and to many who have occasional reason to consult them. The number of entries is astonishing until one perceives the proportion of magazine articles, and letters to newspapers, to books. All are entered and classified under the headings: "Original Poems," "Romances," "Art," "Socialist Writings," &c. Even articles on the late Mr. Morris and his work are noticed. Mr. Scott has brought his catalogue well up to date, as we easily perceive in the fact that the article which we published a few months ago on "The End of the Kelmscott Press" is duly noticed. The book makes a very attractive little octavo, with its Chiswick Press type, its hand-made paper, and its blue canvas covers.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

Father Hilarion. By K. Douglas King.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

I know few modern authors who can handle the greater passions with the dignity and power displayed in this book. Its note throughout is one of intensity, which becomes more and more tragic till the final scene, when the three lovers of Lorraine watch her deathbed, while the nuns chant in the distance. Father Hilarion—wrongly so called, for he is only gatekeeper at the Priory of the Sacred Heart—is himself a striking character. After an unhappy marriage and some years of riotous living, remorse drove him to a life of humiliation:

"The humility of his bearing was thought by some excessive; but with his gentleness they had no fault to find. Deep down in his heart smouldered perpetually the fires of unconquerable pride, bitterness and passion. No one guessed with what agonised efforts and infinite anguish he pursued his steadfast self-control.

No menial work was too hard for this servant of the Sacred Heart, who came to the community with hands white and delicate as a woman's. No den was too foul for him to enter; no sickness too loathsome to receive his ministering care.

Yet his whole being revolted in invincible abhorrence of squalor and disease. Sometimes, while tending some stricken wretch, a passion of hatred and disgust would arise and shake his very soul. The only outward sign he gave would be an increase of tenderness in his ministrations."

In the community it was said that Hilarion "was too lenient towards the fallen." His lenity, however, is not obtruded in the early chapters of the novel. He is appealed to by Lady Janet Charteris, his cousin, to extricate her son, Sir Jamie, from an affection into which he had fallen for the village schoolmistress, Lorraine Keppel. Hilarion, a patrician to his finger tips, dislikes the idea of the plebeian match as much as his cousin does, and throws himself into the conflict. His abstract objections to the girl grow into fierce resentment when he meets her accidentally, and, in the heat of a moment, he offers her an outrageous insult. Here follows a fine study in psychology. Hilarion's dislike grows more and more intense. But, one night, he rescues the girl from the importunities of an unwelcome suitor.

"Hilarion's passionate hatred of this girl had burned so long and steadily that it had become now a living, vital force that dominated his whole person. It was like a great all-embracing presence of fire in whose enfolding he was a prisoner, bound hand and foot, and unable to move or to resist; and with every movement he felt its hold upon him stronger, and he, himself, more powerless to break away from it. But he still called it 'hate,' and with a pang of intolerable humiliation he wondered why the sight of Lorraine, standing trembling, and with averted eyes and pale cheeks, should fill him with such yearning pity on her behalf.

She raised her eyes when he took her hand, and he saw in them a strange new fear and hesitation. He felt her hand tremble as his own clasped over it, and a deep crimson flushed his cheek and brow, leaving them the next moment a deathly white.

A sudden light flooded his mind's obscurity and brought him face to face at last with the unimaginable truth. Realisation, like an arrow to its goal, went straight home to his soul. The poignant terror of that moment was like the terror of hell."

By this time, however, Lorraine had become engaged to Sir Jamie; and presently Hilarion's wife reappears. The tragic situation is developed with a fine sense of effect, and Miss King is artist enough not to spoil her admirable story by an impossible conclusion. The style of the book is distinguished by a curious strenuousness. There are episodes which for brutal realism remind one, not a little, of "Mean Streets." Take this story of the East End:

"She stayed where he had left her, staring straight before her, as though dazed and stupefied, until another fit of coughing overcame her.

She put her hand to her lips, and when she drew it away the fingers were streaming with blood. But she did not look at them. She stared steadily before her into the darkness of the landing.

Another door opened, and a man thrust out a matted head and a pale disordered face, out of which gleamed two wild burning eyes. He was an opium-eater, and he was trying with the drug to kill his body and soul as speedily as possible. But he was terribly poor, and though he stole all he could lay hands upon in order to turn it into money with which to purchase his poison, the work of his destruction was a lengthy process.

'Go and die—in your den!' he exclaimed hoarsely, with an indescribable epithet. His voice was less human than a wolfish snarl.

She paid no heed to him. She did not seem to have heard him. The next minute she began again to cough more violently than before.

He shook his fist at her. Suddenly the woman's body swayed forward, until she was nearly bent double, and with a loud choking noise blood spurted out from her strained convulsive throat.

He sent a savage inarticulate cry down the stairs, and quickly drew back his head again into the room, and slammed the door behind him.

Wild, wolfish cries were common to that house and that street, so no one paid any attention to the opium-eater's call. The woman fell prone upon the landing. . . .

It seemed to her as though she lay there a long, long while, although the time could be counted by minutes. She was quite conscious. She remembered suddenly that she was twenty-six years old, and the curious thought came to her that sixteen years ago she had been called 'Polly,' and had with a haypole made hay in the fields around her country home, and had worn a little short pink frock, a straw hat trimmed with a blue ribbon and a white pinafore.

A sudden agonising pain through her body forced some burning tears out of her eyes. They trickled down her face and mingled with her life's blood. The opium-eater's door opened a chink, and he peered furtively out.

Having satisfied himself she was alone, he crept across the landing and into her room opposite, stepping gingerly over her prostrate body to do so.

He guessed she was dying, and he meant to take something of hers which he could sell or pawn for opium, before her things were confiscated by the other people in the house. One glance around showed him that her room was empty and bare of the smallest thing that he could coin into money.

With a snarl he groped his way out again, and stepping back over her, he gave her a kick in his resentment and disappointment.

He had been a tender-hearted, honourable man until opium had sapped his very soul's vitality. . . .

No one came to her. When an hour or two later came Hilarion, accompanied by two nursing sisters, she was still lying there where she had died with his own prayer to her upon her lips:

'Pray for me, Hilarion!'

* * *

Equality. By Edward Bellamy.
(William Heinemann.)

Men have been "looking backward" a great deal lately, but the last sixty years of actuality have seemed enough for their contemplation and thankfulness. Now comes Mr. Bellamy, leading in Julian West again, and Dr. Leete and Edith, with the year 2000 written all over them. This is not nearly such a good book as Looking Backward. It is, to begin with, a sequel, and a sequel is usually like a equire toiling following his knight, bearing his arms and some of his baggage. That is what this book is to Looking Backward. Mr. Bellamy has had afterthoughts. He has projected himself yet more thoroughly into the world in which Julian West awoke after his long hypnotic sleep, and he has found a great deal more to tell and explain, but chiefly to explain. The city life of 2000 A.D. is not greatly developed before our eyes in these pages. That bright Utopia is not pictured to us much more clearly. Instead, West and Edith and Leete talk interminably about the way the revolution was effected. Here we are really looking

SELECTED NOVELS

CASSELL &amp; COMPANY'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS.

MY LORD DUKE. By E. W. HORNING, Author of "A Bride from the Bush," "The Rogue's March," &c. Second Edition. Now ready, price 6s.

A STORY-TELLER'S PACK. By FRANK STOCKTON, Author of "The Adventures of Captain Horn," "Rudder Grange," &c. Now ready, price 6s.

ILL GOTTEN GOLD: the Story of a Great Wrong and a Great Revenge. By W. G. TARBET. Just published, price 6s.

ROGUES of the FIERY CROSS. By S. WALKEY, Author of "In Quest of Sheba's Treasure," &c. Now ready, price 5s.

R. L. STEVENSON.

Treasure Island. 3s. 6d.

Catriona. 6s.

Kidnapped. 6s.

The Master of Ballantrae. 3s. 6d.

The Black Arrow. 3s. 6d.

The Wrecker. 6s.

Island Nights' Entertainments. 6s.

Q.

Ia: a Love Story. 3s. 6d.

Wandering Heath. 6s.

Dead Man's Rock. 5s.

"I Saw Three Ships." 5s.

Noughts and Crosses. 5s.

The Splendid Spur. 5s.

History of Troy Town. 5s.

The Delectable Duchy. 5s.

The Blue Pavilions. 5s.

Adventures in Criticism. 6s.

J. M. BARRIE

Sentimental Tommy. Forty-third

Thousand. 6s.

The Little Minister. 6s.

STANLEY WEYMAN.

From the Memoirs of a Minister of France. 6s.

The Story of Francis Cludde. 6s.

The Man in Black. 3s. 6d.

ANTHONY HOPE.

Father Stafford. 3s. 6d.

H. RIDER HAGGARD.

King Solomon's Mines. New and Revised Edition. 3s. 6d.

FRANK STOCKTON.

Mrs. Cliff's Yacht. Second Edition.

Adventures of Captain Horn. 6s.

Pomona's Travels. Cheap Edition.

3s. 6d.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., London, Paris, and Melbourne.

FROM MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S LIST.

SIX NOVELS WORTH READING.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.

I. A Rose of Yesterday

SPECTATOR.—"Mr. Marion Crawford is a constant source of wonder and pleasure to us. He seems to write novels almost as fast as we can review them, and though the quality of his work varies, the average level, in interest and workmanship, is quite extraordinarily high."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

II. Taquisara. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SPECTATOR.—"Another of his brilliant and enthralling studies of modern, Italian manners."

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MORRICE BUCKLER."

III. The Phianderers. By A. E. W. MASON.

GLOBE.—"His work is virile; it is individual; it is, in certain fine qualities distinguished."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS."

IV. My Run Home. By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.

ATHENÆUM.—"Rolf Boldrewood's last story is a racy volume. It has many of the best qualities of Whyte Melville, the breezy freshness and vigour of Frank Smedley, with the dash and something of the abandon of Lever.....His last volume is one of his best."

V. The Fall of a Star: a Novel. By Sir WM. MAGNAY, Bart.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Its interest is breathless and cumulative from the first page to the last."

VI. The Secret of Saint Florel. By JOHN BERWICK.

SPEAKER.—"A book to be unreservedly recommended."

MACMILLAN & CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

backward: in Looking Backward we were mostly looking round. There we were shown things, here we only listen. We are afraid that many readers will tire of listening to serious conversations filling 350 pages. It is significant that Mr. Bellamy could flash his vision of a happier world upon us in half as many. Still, there are passages of description and detail that help us to skip long talks on the "Economic Suicide of the Profit System," or "How Inequality of Wealth Destroys Liberty," or "Why the Revolution did not Come Earlier"—talks which are not talks at all, but articles cut into lengths. Here is one of the oases: Julian has noticed the delicate tints and texture of Edith's clothing, and she has explained that she is, so to speak, in paper covers.

"Talking of paper," said Edith, extending a very trim foot by way of attracting attention to its gear, "what do you think of our modern shoes?"

"Do you mean that they also are made of paper?" I exclaimed.

"Of course."

"I noticed the shoes your father gave me were very light as compared with anything I had ever worn before. Really that is a great idea, for lightness in footwear is the first necessity. Scamp shoemakers used to put paper soles in shoes in my day. It is evident that instead of prosecuting them for rascals we should have revered them as unconscious prophets. But, for that matter, how do you prepare soles of paper that will last?"

"There are plenty of solutions which will make paper as hard as iron."

"And do not these shoes leak in winter?"

"We have different kinds for different weathers. All are seamless, and the wet weather sort are coated outside with a lacquer impervious to moisture."

"That means, I suppose, that rubbers, too, as articles of wear have been sent to the museum?"

"We use rubber, but not for wear. Our waterproof paper is much lighter and better every way."

"After all this it is easy to believe that your hats and caps are also paper-made."

"And so they are to a great extent," said Edith; "the heavy headgear that made your men bald, yours would not endure. We want as little as possible on our heads, and that as light as may be."

"Go on!" I exclaimed. "I suppose I am next to be told that the delicious but mysterious articles of food which come by the pneumatic carrier from the restaurant or are served there are likewise made out of paper. Proceed—I am prepared to believe it!"

"Not quite so bad as that," laughed my companion, "but really the next thing to it, for the dishes you eat them from are made of paper. The crash of crockery and glass, which seems to have been a sort of running accompaniment to housekeeping in your day, is no more heard in the land. Our dishes and kettles for eating or cooking, when they need cleaning, are thrown away, or rather, as in the case of all these rejected materials I have spoken of, sent back to the factories to be reduced again to pulp and made over into other forms."

"But you certainly do not use paper kettles? Fire will still burn, I fancy, although you seem to have changed most of the other rules we went by."

"Fire will still burn, indeed, but the electrical heat has been adopted for cooking as well as for all other purposes. We no longer heat our vessels from without but from within, and the consequence is that we do our cooking in paper vessels on wooden stoves."

But Edith's beautiful paper clothes are a bit of a fraud. Edith and her mother have been wearing nineteenth century skirts for Julian's benefit, and one day Edith confesses that they have done it merely to avoid shocking him on his awaking from his great trance. Julian has, indeed, been struck by the fact that all other women around him go skirtless. After her confession Edith runs into the house and reappears in the skirtless costume of 2000. Surely it was unnecessary for Mr. Bellamy to call this chapter "Honi Soit Qui Mal Y Pense."

In 2000 A.D. fashions have ceased, or have come under the domain of reason and common sense. Jewellery has clean disappeared, but it is appalling to find Dr. Leete launching out on the reasons for this, which, it appears, "go rather deeply into the direct and indirect consequences of our present economic system." Decidedly Mr. Bellamy has put a strain on his story greater than it can bear. The names of Julian and Dr. Leete and Edith are here; but they only flash behind thickets of arguments; they do not make a tale. The jam is spread too thin on bread that, to say the truth, is often very dry; and this absence of drama and succulence does not make you any readier to accept, as a nineteenth century reader, the eternal condescension and lecturing which every character in this book metes out to your own age. You are inclined to detest Julian for his meekness and his readiness to be converted to every new idea after ten minutes' talk. And there are things which you positively resent. One day even Julian, tired of novelty, asks Edith to show him something that has not changed; and she shows him a building unlike anything else in the city. The explanation is simple.

"I found myself," says Julian, "face to face with a typical nineteenth century tenement house of the worst sort—one of the rookeries, in fact, that used to abound in the North End and other parts of the city. The environment was indeed in strong enough contrast with that of such buildings in my time, shut in as they generally were by a labyrinth of noisome alleys, and dark damp courtyards, which were reeking reservoirs of fetid odours, kept in by lofty, light-excluding walls. . . . These words I read, above the central doorway: 'This habitation of cruelty is preserved as a memento to coming generations of the rule of the rich.'"

"This is one of the ghost buildings," said Edith, "kept to scare the people with, so that they may never risk anything that looks like bringing back the old order of things by allowing any one on any plea to obtain an economic advantage over another. I think they had much better be torn down, for there is no more danger of the world's going back to the old order than there is of the globe reversing its rotation."

A band of children, accompanied by a young woman, came across the square as we stood before the building, and filed into the doorway and up the black and narrow stairway. The faces of the little ones were very serious, and they spoke in whispers.

"They are school children," said Edith. "We are all taken through this building, or some other like it, when we are in the schools, and the teacher explains what manner of things used to be done and endured there."

This is not a good touch. A generation that shall need to discipline its children thus in the year 2000 will not, we think, by any means have achieved the happiness which Mr. Bellamy puts so lavishly to its credit.

* * * *

A Peakland Faggot. By R. Murray Gilchrist.
(Grant Richards.)

Of the eighteen sketches which make up this little volume quite a dozen are good and were worth reprinting; the other six might have been omitted to the advantage of the remainder. They are all interesting, but the similarity of endings makes the general effect monotonous. After reading the first I amused myself by forecasting the conclusion of each story when I had reached the second page, and I was always right. However, having said so much, I have nothing left but praise. These glimpses of a simple people are true and vivid. My knowledge of the Peak-country is of the smallest; but Mr. Gilchrist's stories give just that prick to memory which is so pleasant and profitable. The humour is unforced and happy, and there are passages of genuine pathos. In the first story, "A Strolling Player," we have a poor farmer who is driving across the moors at nightfall, on a frosty road, with the coffin for his dead daughter—a daughter who had wandered away and returned with her child to die. He meets a weary and dishevelled actress who is toiling to the nearest town on the chance of an engagement. He gives her a lift, and she keeps the coffin from being scratched by the joltings of the cart. The player, of course, finally remains with the old people. But first she is taken by the wife to see the dead girl.

"Johanna peered into Violetty's hollow eyes before drawing down the counterpane and showing her the baby lying in its embroidered gown, like a doll, with its head resting between the mother's left breast and arm.

Violetty's face worked; she turned aside.

"Eena hoo a pretty yen?" Johanna said. "Twenty-one year, but et's just as ef hoo were ten or 'leven, and hoo'd gone to sleep wi' her moppet."

The history of "Lady Golightly," a curate's dancing monkey which scandalised the parish on the occasion of a fancy fair, is very funny. Lady Golightly steps upon the stage:

"By jowks, but hoo took on! They clapped an' clapped till et seemed as ef th' ramshackle pasteboard haases'ed all tum'le daan. When et were a bit quieter, hoo lifted her paader-box an' did her face over, an' fanned hersen, an' stood a-caantin th' music notes, so as to know when to step in.

"Then et looked as ef hoo'd forgot th' daunce, for hoo scratted her yead an' pondered. An' i' another moment hoo ups wi' her petticoat an' began a jig, the like o' which had ne'er been seen i' th' Peak afore. I wunna tell yo' haa hoo carried on, but I heerd after as et were a can-can, such as they perform i' Fraunce!

"Parson's wife hoo screeted an' went off i' a sway, an' all th' gentry i' front got up an' went aat, but th' common sort i' th' sixpenny seats fairly bent double wi' laughin'. Th' best o' et were as th' curate 'peared so put aat as he hedna nerve to stop her.'"

One word as to the binding of the volume. It is most unpleasant to handle, the heavy brown of the lower part of the cover being as sticky and irritating as new paint. I would earnestly ask Mr. Grant Richards to clothe his "Sylvan Series" in a less objectionable dress.

* * * *

Mallerton. By A. B. Louis.
(Bliss, Sands, & Co.)

Mallerton is distinctly a tantalising novel. I have read it through twice in search of its raison d'être, and have thereby, I feel sure, placed myself in an unique position among the readers of books. But at the end of the second perusal I had to acknowledge myself baffled. If Mallerton has any reason for existence at all it must be hidden far away in the dark recesses of its author's brain, which it is not given to the reviewer to fathom.

Mallerton is a town situate in an indefinite region and inhabited by very indefinite people. Mrs. or Miss A. B. Louis has endeavoured to portray the commonplace life of a commonplace town, and as a picture of every-day vulgarity, I have only one fault to find with it—it is not interesting. Take, for instance, the following bit of conversation culled at random from the book:

"When they reached Mrs. Estcourt's rooms they found her ready, and waiting with some impatience. 'My dear girls, what a time you have been dressing!' she exclaimed, 'at least Judith has, for Isabel was dressed already. What have you been about?'

'I found George there, Auntie, and we got talking, and it was not Judith's fault. We were to start at half-past one o'clock, and it has not struck the half-hour yet.'

'I hear it at this moment,' said Mrs. Estcourt, 'and unless we start at once we shall be too late. I don't see now how we can get back in time for lunch.'"

Now all this is mere waste of good paper and ink, it explains nothing and leads nowhere; it is utterly irrelevant and useless. Of course it is phonographically accurate enough, but then the phonograph is not a literary machine.

With the possible exception of M. Lacroix, a noisy but well-meaning Frenchman, the characters are but very dimly realised. The tragedy, which is, I suppose, the pièce de résistance of the novel, is managed in a very primitive way, and it passes understanding to know why the Salvation Army is dragged in to solve a mystery which needs no solution.

* * * *

The Gift of Life. By James Cassidy.
(Chapman & Hall.)

This book may have been suggested by a paragraph which appeared in the papers some months ago about an American doctor who had discovered what he called the "microbe of death." The Herr Schneider of Mr. Cassidy's imagination had invented a "Lymph of Life," and the book is a study of the effects of his elixir on patients of various sorts and conditions. Naturally, the world at large was much agitated by the news:

"The life assurance companies proclaimed their disinterestedness by setting forth the hardships such a discovery must mean to would-be widows. Multitudes of poor relations sent in a petition to Parliament, requesting that under the new order of things estates and property generally might be redistributed every twenty-five years.

"The School of Advanced Thought sent forth a circular absolving the young from honour to parents, contending that inasmuch as 'length of days' was now independent of that practice it was superfluous. . . .

"The geologists alone appeared charmed with the discovery, because they realised that whole millenniums were before them for observational work; but in spite of their satisfaction as a class, they decided at a monster meeting, held in the Goldsmiths' Hall, that there were certain drawbacks to the discovery, as its application might lead to a failure in the supply of fossils.

"The Pope in Council decreed that wax candles should henceforth be burned at a birth instead of a death. The Worshipful Company of Wax Candle Makers gave in their allegiance in a body, presenting his Holiness with several tons for use in the Vatican."

Unfortunately, Herr Schneider omits to inoculate himself, and in the end commits suicide. The excellent aim of the author is to enforce the old lesson that death is a blessing and not a curse. He drives it home in one of the closing chapters in a somewhat prosy sermon by "the Bishop of St. Adam's." The Gift of Life is a curiously unequal book.

* * * *

Sketches in Lavender, Blue, and Green. By Jerome K. Jerome.
(Longmans & Co.)

Mr. Jerome made his reputation as a practitioner of that humour which set out to be up-to-date, and only succeeded in being middle-class, and the ghost of Three Men in a Boat lies in wait to handicap him even in his most serious moods. For his set grin I have no grin in response: his farcical types—"The Man who would Manage," "The Absent-Minded Man," "The Man who went Wrong," and the like—awake but the faintest echo of a cachinnation. On the stage, in a thoroughly artificial atmosphere, they might be amusing, but surely not in the broad daylight of print.

"It has been told me by those in a position to know—and I can believe it—that at nineteen months of age he wept because his grandmother would not allow him to feed her with a spoon; and that at three and a half he was fished, in an exhausted condition, out of the water-butt, whither he had climbed for the purpose of teaching a frog to swim.

Two years later he permanently injured his left eye, showing the cat how to carry kittens without hurting them; and about the same period was dangerously stung by a bee while conveying it from a flower where, as it seemed to him, it was only wasting its time, to one more rich in honey-making properties.

His desire was always to help others. He would spend whole mornings explaining to elderly hens how to hatch eggs, and would give up an afternoon's blackberrying to sit at home and crack nuts for his pet squirrel. Before he was seven he would argue with his mother upon the management of children, and reprove his father for the way he was bringing him up."

Mr. Jerome, like a Theophrastus of the comic press, pursues his hero remorselessly through his whole career.

"So far as intention went he was the kindest man alive. He never visited poor sick persons without taking with him in his pocket some little delicacy calculated to disagree with them and make them worse. He arranged yachting excursions for bad sailors, entirely at his own expense, and seemed to regard their subsequent agonies as ingratitude."

It is a damnable iteration. The worst of it is that Mr. Jerome knows very well how to write, and, when he chooses to lay aside the cap and bells, can give one a very good story. "Dick Dunkerman's Cat" contains an excellent touch of diablerie, as well as a distinct human interest.

* * * *

Cousin Jem. A Sepia Sketch. By L. Higgin.
(Hurst & Blackett.)

What the author means by calling this book a "Sepia Sketch" I have not the faintest notion. But it will not deter one reviewer, at any rate, from remarking that "Cousin Jem" is a very poor story, as uninteresting as it is colourless. There is evidence in it that the author might do better with a fuller palette. But it is only the rankest amateur who imagines that he can sketch before he can paint. Mr. or Miss Higgin must work harder at fiction before he or she should have the audacity to attempt what a master like Mr. Thomas Hardy has only tried, in his "Well-Beloved," in the autumn of a long and brilliant career. The author has added to the impertinence of the sub-title by quoting as the motto to the story, "There is [sic] no art to find the mind's construction in the face." But the plain intention to depict in Miss Beryl Fane a sort of understudy to a certain Miss Becky Sharp is not to be reinforced by a misquotation from Macbeth. This is one of the novels which are a puzzle to both readers and critics. The wonder is how they ever get published.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 1.

The teeth are not cleaned healthfully and properly by attending merely to the part that you can see. Almost anything will keep that right—even plain water. It is the spaces between the teeth that gather stray pieces of food, which decompose and inevitably lead to tooth-ache and destruction of the teeth by decay.

Only one thing in the world properly cleanses the spaces between the teeth, and that is SOZODONT, the fragrant liquid dentifrice.

It is so important to health to have, and keep, sound teeth, and so great a personal attraction to have a sweet, clean breath, that it seems a small matter to be punctual in the use of SOZODONT, which is sold everywhere (in neat Toilet Case) at 2/6. No one who, having a sound set of teeth, uses SOZODONT regularly has ever had the tooth-ache or lost a tooth by decay.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

SATURDAY, JULY 10, 1897.

No. 1314, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

NEW books still hang fire. The volumes on our table are chiefly new editions, and new volumes of works already undertaken. But two works of interest call for notice. The first is Sir Harry H. Johnston's British Central Africa. This work is "an attempt to give some account of a portion of the territories under British influence north of the Zambesi." Even at a first glance the book astonishes by its thoroughness. It is fitted with Maps, Tables, Appendices, and Photographs. British Central Africa centres round Lakes Tanganyika and Nyasa, and the book deals mainly with this area. Sir Harry Johnston writes:

"Although for seven years I have been connected with these countries, and have been gathering notes all that time, it is not to be supposed for a moment that the results of my work which I now publish deal more than partially with the many aspects and problems of this small section of Central Africa. The careful reader will be conscious of gaps in my knowledge; but I think he will not find his time wasted by vague generalisations. Such information as I have to give is definite and practical."

The book is well-turned out by Messrs. Methuen, the covers being tropical in their blaze of yellow.

Gunpowder Plot is not in such danger of being forgotten as the popular ditty would suggest. Its celebration by squib and rocket may have declined in many districts; but here is Prof. Gardiner with a book on it. Prof. Gardiner would not have written his book if Father John Gerard had not written one first. It will be remembered that in his What was the Gunpowder Plot? Father Gerard recently sought to prove that no reliance can be placed on the generally accepted story of the Plot, and that whatever was plotted was well known to the Government, and that the Government falsified the story to the grave prejudice of Roman Catholics. Prof. Gardiner refuses to accept these conclusions, and replies to them in a book of 200 octavo pages. The work gains in interest by the fact that Prof. Gardiner does not despise his opponent. On the contrary, he admits that Father Gerard "gives us hard nuts to crack," and that his conclusions "at least call for patient inquiry."

Mr. H. D. Traill is to be heartily congratulated on the completion of the great work on Social England, which he has been editing for so long. The final volume, which is before us, extends from 1815 to 1885. A noteworthy feature of this monumental work is the generous lists of authorities which Mr. Traill gives the reader. The work is not only a host in itself, but it is a great collection of clues to knowledge.

"Doom to Dziggetai" is the scope of the latest issued part of Dr. Murray's New English Dictionary. We know something about doom; but what is a dziggetai? It sounds to us like a weapon, a lance for preference, hurled from a savage hand. But it is not that. A dziggetai is a kind of mule that "lives in troops, in the sandy deserts of Central Asia." We hope to air this information at an early opportunity. Mr. Murray is quite reasonably proud of his great work, and his satisfaction finds vent in the following table, in which the New Dictionary is compared with some of its predecessors:

	Johnson.	Cassell's Encyclopedia.	"Century" Dict.	Funk's "Standard."	The New English Dictionary.
Words recorded	448	2335	2302	2477	4535
Words illustrated by quotations	384	1021	946	267	3312
Number of illustrative quotations	1421	2050	2088	388	17,460

Our readers are doubtless aware that many of the illustrative quotations in the New English Dictionary are of very recent extraction. A glance at these pages shows quotations from the books of Rolf Boldrewood, Mr. Seaton Merriman, and many others.

The "Famous Scots Series" makes strong headway. This week we review Norman Macleod, and we are now in receipt of Sir Walter Scott, which Prof. George Saintsbury has written.

A book that looks useful is A Key to English Antiquities, by Ella S. Armitage.

Guide-books multiply. Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co. send us shilling guides to North Wales and to the favourite Derbyshire resorts. Each is profusely illustrated with maps and photographs, and how they can be sold at the price we scarcely understand.

NEW EDITIONS.

Dombey & Son, in two volumes, is added to Messrs. Chapman & Hall's "Gadshill Dickens." In a facile introduction Mr. Andrew Lang relates the circumstances under which Dickens wrote the story at Lausanne. This novel cost him more than usual effort, but it was also more than usually successful; the sales of the first part exceeded Chuzzlewit by 12,000.

"Among the characters," says Mr. Lang, "Mr. Toots is probably the greatest favourite. Mr. Toots, 'perfectly sore with loving her,' puts with direct and simple force a very usual sensation, seldom as directly expressed. Mr. Toots's flashes of style may hardly be in character, but how good they are! He proposes to Florence, repents, and describes his conduct as 'more like a parricide than a person of property.' 'Chicken, your expressions are coarse, and your meaning is obscure.' He could scarcely have said that, but we are delighted that he did."

Mr. Lang reckons Dombey in the second rank of Dickens's works, but "few English people can sleep at the excellent Hôtel de la Cloche, at Dijon, without blending their memories of Burgundian greatness with those of Edith and the disappointment of Mr. Carker."

The fourth volume is published in Mr. Nimmo's new edition of Mr. Baring Gould's Lives of the Saints. No saints of the very first importance fall within this volume, which, however, contains the Lives of St. Leo the Great and St. Anselm.

The interest excited in the writings of Colonel John Hay by his recent appointment in London has led Mr. John Lane to issue a charming new edition of Castilian Days. Colonel Hay went to Madrid in 1869 as Secretary of Legation, and this book was a record of his impressions of Spain at that period. We observe that Mr. Lane promises an edition of Colonel Hay's poems, uniform with this volume.

The "Temple Classics" are always with us, and they do not pall. With the third, and final, volume of Carlyle's French Revolution comes the first volume of Boswell's Life of Johnson. This work, like the Montaigne, will run to six volumes.

Mr. Marion Crawford's Takisara arrives in a new one-volume edition.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGY.

THE OXFORD DEBATE ON THE TEXTUAL CRITICISM OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. George Bell & Sons.

HEAR OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH: THE ECUMENICAL COUNCILS. By William P. du Boe, S.T.D. Second edition. T. & T. Clark. 6s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

SOCIAL ENGLAND. Vol. VI. Edited by H. D. Traill. Cassell & Co. 18s.

VICTORIA THE GOOD, QUEEN AND EMPRESS. Anon. Gardiner, Darton & Co.

HISTORY OF PEMBROKE COLLEGE, OXFORD. By Douglas Macleod. Oxford Historical Society.

THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS. New edition. Vol. IV. By the Rev. S. Baring-Gould, M.A. John C. Nimmo. 6s.

THE TEMPLE CLASSICS: THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. By Thomas Carlyle. Vol. III. Boswell's Life of Johnson. Vol. J. M. Dent & Co. 1s. 6d. each.

FAMOUS SCOTS' SERIES: SIR WALTER SCOTT. By George Saintsbury. Oliphant, Anderson, and Ferrier. 1s. 6d.
 DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY. Vol. II. Edited by Sidney Lee. Smith, Elder & Co. 15s.
 WHEAT GUNPOWDER PLOT WAR. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner. Longmans, Green & Co.
 THE ANCIENT STONE IMPLEMENTS, WEAPONS, AND ORNAMENTS OF GREAT BRITAIN. By Sir John Evans. Second edition. Longmans, Green & Co. 28s.

POETRY, BELLES LETTRES, ETC.

VICTORIA: REGINA ET IMPERATRIX, AND OTHER POEMS. By George Wymtville. Cornish Bros. (Birmingham).
 THE ATTITUDE OF THE GREEK TRAGEDIANS TOWARD NATURE. By H. Rushton Fairclough. Rowse & Hutchinson. (Toronto.)

FICTION.

THE QUEST OF THE GILT-EDGED GIRL. By Richard de Lyrienne. John Lane. 1s.
 THE STORY OF MOLLIE. By Marian Bower. Wm. Andrews & Co.
 THE QUEER FOLK OF LIFE: TALES FROM THE KINGDOM. By David Pryde, M.A. Morison Bros. (Glasgow).
 ETHICS OF THE SURFACE SERIES: THE RUDENESS OF THE HONOURABLE MR. LEATHERHEAD (new edition), and A HOMBURG STORY. Both by Gordon Seymour. Grant Richards. 2s. each.
 CAMERA LUCIDA. By Bertha Thames. Sampson Low & Co.
 A MAN'S UNDOING. By Mrs. Lovett Cameron. F. V. White & Co.
 THE STEPMOTHER. By Gregory Xenopoulos. John Lane.
 CROOKED PATHS. By Francis Allingham. Longmans & Co.
 DOWNEY & SON. New edition. 2 vols. Chapman & Hall. 12s.
 TAQUISARA. By F. Marion Crawford. New edition. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

GEOGRAPHY, TRAVEL, ETC.

BRITISH CENTRAL AFRICA. By Sir Harry H. Johnston. K.C.B. Methuen & Co. 30s.
 BRITISH NEW GUINEA'S COUNTRY AND PEOPLE. By Sir William Macgregor, K.C.M.G. John Murray. 4s.
 GUIDE TO NORTH WALES. Pictorial and Descriptive.
 GUIDE TO MALLOW, DERRY AND NEIGHBOURHOOD. Ward, Lock & Co. 1s. each.
 WAR AND A WHEEL: THE GREECO-TURKISH WAR AS SEEN FROM A BICYCLE. By Wilfrid Pollock. Chatto & Windus.
 WITH THE TURKISH ARMY IN THESALY. By Clive Bigham. Macmillan & Co. 6s. 6d.
 CASTILIAN DAYS. By John Hay. New edition. John Lane. 4s. 6d.
 CHAMONIX AND THE RANGE OF MONT BLANC: A GUIDE. By Edward Whympers. Second edition. John Murray. 8s.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE LETTERS OF CICERO TO ATTICUS. Book I. Edited by Alfred Pretor, M.A. George Bell & Sons.
 ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM FOR BEGINNERS. Macmillan & Co.
 ANCIENT CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS (Cheap re-issue):
 CICERO. By Rev. W. Lucas Collins, M.A. SOPHOCLES. By Clifton W. Collins, M.A. Wm. Blackwood & Sons. 1s. each.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WORDS OF COUNSEL. Compiled by J. B. Pearson, D.D. Elliot Stock.
 THE SPAS OF WALES. By T. R. Roberts. John Hogg. 1s.
 GOLD AND SILVER: AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON BI-METALLISM. By James Henry Hallard. Rivington, Percival & Co. 2s. 6d.
 SPEECH OF JOHN HAY AT THE UNVEILING OF THE BUST OF SIR WALTER SCOTT IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY, MARCH 21, 1897. John Lane. 1s.
 NATIONAL DEFENCES. By Major-General Maurice, C.B. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.
 THE JĀTAKA: OR, STORIES OF THE BUDDHA'S FORMER BIRTHS. Vol. III. Translated from the Pāli by Various Hands. Edited by Prof. E. B. Cowell. Cambridge University Press.
 THE VICTORIAN ERA IN SOUTH AFRICA. By H. A. Bryden. The African Critic Office.
 POT-POURRI FROM A SURREY GARDEN. By Mrs. C. W. Earle. Smith, Elder & Co. 7s. 6d.
 A KEY TO ENGLISH ANTIQUITIES, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE SHEFFIELD AND ROTTERHAM DISTRICT. By Ella S. Armitage. William Townsend (Sheffield). 7s.
 THE VICTORIA PAINTING BOOK FOR LITTLE FOLKS. Cassell & Co. 1s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MARK TWAIN, it seems, has refused, on behalf of himself and his family, to accept any monetary help: a fulfilment of the prediction of an American journalist that the New York Herald's fund would make the humorist "tired." Mark Twain, we have no doubt, has done the right thing; although, as a writer in the Morning Post points out, the proceeds of the author's books may well be held by his admirers not fully to recompense him, especially if the case of actors and musicians who gladly accept benefits be taken as analogous.

MEANWHILE Mark Twain has left London on a visit to the Continent.

THE scheme of the Women's Jubilee Dinner on July 14, which is to be followed by a reception in the Grafton Galleries, has now crystallised. Every branch of woman's work is to be represented fairly, which is the amended form of the original "distinguished women" idea. "The committee," we are told, "deprecates all suspicion of anything beyond the mere representation of these various branches"; it considers the representative women idea as "grotesque, for once you begin classification you must work scientifically, and that is impossible." The entertainment has no ulterior meaning. "It is no manifesto of woman's rights, except the right to prove her appreciation of the work men have done, to return their hospitalities in kind, and to show her loyalty to the Queen." Any woman who belongs to any profession can, at the recommendation of any member of the committee, join as a hostess. This gives her the right to take a male guest.

ON the death of Prof. Wallace last February, his MSS. were handed over to the care of the Master of Balliol and Mr. Bernard Bosanquet, his great friends. As a result of their examination of the papers, there is every cause to believe that no publication will be made, as these remains consist mainly of scattered notes. The output of these three friends has not been large, measured in quantity, and one is constantly hoping for further volumes from Dr. Caird, whose work at Balliol prevents him from completing for book form his sets of lectures. This only increases our regret at the fact that one valuable book which Prof. Wallace had thought out, and was mentally preparing for its final state, should now be lost to the world, since no written record survives beyond a few hints. Dealing with the English poets of the early part of this century, it is very probable that the book would have proved the most popular of the Professor's works, if such studies may ever be described as "popular."

MRS. MEYNELL has accepted the presidency of the Society of Women Journalists for the ensuing year. Her predecessors in this office include Mrs. Craigie and Mrs. Henniker; and the Duchess of Sutherland we understand, has promised to occupy the post next year. Among the lectures, which are a feature of the society's programme, one is likely to be delivered this winter by a distinguished poet who has never before appeared upon a platform.

THE Civil List pensions distributed during the year just closed include, as usual, several that have literary association, and, it is cheering to notice, none corresponding to the grant to Mr. Brooks. Mr. Balfour seems to have exercised sound judgment.

THE American Bookman has a sprightliness to which its English representative cannot attain. In the current number the correspondence page contains the following question from a Brooklyn gentleman: "I note in your columns adequate mention of most of the new writers, English and American, but I have seen nothing as yet about Mr. Silas K. Hocking. What do you think of Mr. Hocking?" The answer of the Bookman is cruel but amusing: "Mr. Silas K. Hocking," it says, "is not provocative of thought."

IN the same number is the following outspoken criticism, which, of course, goes too far, but is refreshing after the monotony of the average literary news-sheet:

"We should like to ask why Cosmopolis, which professes to be an international magazine in the widest sense of the word, has never yet published a line by an American writer, and does not mention the name of any such in its announcements for the future? It should get a new title more truly descriptive of its editorial attitude. How would The Parish do?"

THE success of The Prisoner of Zenda on the stage has led to the dramatisation of Phroso, which Mr. Rose, the adapter of the earlier romance, is undertaking in collaboration with Mr. H. V. Esmond.

MR. H. G. WELLS prides himself that while some of his fantastic creations may appear improbable none of them are impossible. He should therefore be glad to know that in two of the short stories in his latest book he anticipated actual events in almost every particular. One of the stories—In the Abyss—relates the experiences of a naval officer who designed a hollow steel ball, which would take him to the bottom of the sea, and in which he could live for a few hours, before returning to the surface. By a remarkable coincidence, a submarine balloon of precisely the same character as that which Mr. Wells's insight enabled him to describe has just been completed by a naval constructor at Vitry-sur-Seine, and will shortly be used for bringing up ships and cargoes lying at depths too great for ordinary diving work. The globe is about eleven feet in diameter, and will accommodate three persons. It will be let down from a ship, and grappling irons manipulated from the inside will be used for making connexions with things to be hauled to the surface. Count Piatti dal Pozzo, the inventor of this submarine workman, has already descended to a depth of ninety fathoms in it, and he proposes to go as deep as three hundred fathoms.

ANOTHER instance of Mr. Wells's prophetic power is afforded by the regrettable accident to Dr. Wölfert and a companion while testing a navigable balloon at Tempelhof a few days ago. Mr. Wells described a very similar machine in his Argonauts of the Air; he manned it with two persons; he propelled it, like Wölfert, with a benzine motor, and he brought it to just the same kind of end. The incidents of the Tempelhof catastrophe are, indeed, almost identical with those given in the story.

THE parody of Mr. Le Gallienne's Quest of the Golden Girl, which Mr. Lane has just issued under the title The Quest of the Gilt-Edged Girl, demands from its readers a closer knowledge of the career of Mr. Le Gallienne and the inner life of current literature than most persons possess. To the initiated it will be very amusing, though not, we fancy, amusing enough. That is its fault; it is clever, agile, full of acrobatic, but it ought to have more sheer fun. The following verses, apropos of nothing in particular, are neat. They occur in a piece called The Complaisant Angler:

"And though he be of manners mild,
The trait in him is odd;
He certainly won't spare the child
Who may have spoiled the rod.
His sense of etiquette is fine—
Politeness is his whim—
He always drops the fish a line,
To come and dine with him."

IN a review of The Treasure of the Humble Mr. W. B. Yeats makes a sound suggestion to publishers. Often they find it necessary from the business point of view to preface a book with an introduction which, written in popular terms, shall draw the attention of the public to a work that, if it went without any such patronage, might be overlooked. To the reader who already knows the author these introductions are very naturally an annoyance, and Mr. Yeats's suggestion is that it would be well to perforate the pages on which they are printed in order that they may be torn out or retained at pleasure. Merely to slip the introductions in like circulars, he adds rather maliciously, would be to go too far, for numbers will always prefer them to the books themselves!

THE edition of Sheridan which Mr. Fraser Rae is editing is likely to be a great surprise to playgoers. There is an old story of a man who set out to follow a performance of Ici on parle Français with the book of words in his hand, but succeeded in tracing no likeness whatever to Mr. Toole's remarks on the stage and the author's on the page. It seems that The School for Scandal as it was originally written and a modern acting version, or even literary version, contain similar disparities. We have, in fact, nothing quite as Sheridan wrote it, not even the songs in The Duenna. Mr. Fraser Rae has had special facilities for setting this tangle right, and his edition of Sheridan's plays will be of very great interest.

SIR WALTER BESANT has used his knowledge of the history of the century to some purpose in connexion with the late Jubilee. He wrote the articles for the Illustrated London News and for the Queen, and also for a Chicago firm a short volume on the Sixty Years' Reign.

EVERY assistant at a circulating or public library has a collection of humorous misquotations of titles on the part of customers. But sometimes it is the assistant who is at fault. A customer recently asked for The Lady of the Aroostook. After consultation with another employee, the assistant returned with the reply: "Will you have The Lady or the Tiger instead? The Lady or the Rooster is not in."

APROPOS to Mr. Howells, it is stated that he was asked recently for his autograph, and thought to confound the applicant by replying with the question, "Have you bought my last book?" The answer came with admirable promptness: "I have not. I want to sell your autograph in order to get enough money to buy it."

Two interesting volumes by Mr. Demetrius C. Boulger are in preparation. An account of the rise of our Empire in India will be closely followed by the life, now first written, of Sir Stamford Raffles, Governor of Java, and founder of Singapore. The account of our struggle for supremacy with the Dutch in the Eastern Archipelago will be particularly appropriate at this time; while all those to whom British commercial enterprise is an interest will welcome this complete record of a remarkable man, who did a marvellous work in the early part of the century.

MAXWELL GRAY, who is known in private life as Miss Tuttielt, has finished a new novel, which, says Mr. Arthur Waugh, according to those who have had an opportunity of judging, is likely to be a serious rival in popularity of The Silence of Dean Maitland. The new book will appear in the autumn. The Silence of Dean Maitland still has a steady sale of some thousand copies a year.

TOLSTOI is said to be at work on a new novel, of which the Russian correspondent of the Daily Mail, gives the following account:

"The scene opens in a Russian law-court, where a young woman is tried for theft, and found guilty. During the trial one of the jury recognises her as one whom he had known some years before, and whom he had betrayed and then deserted. As the judge pronounces a sentence of imprisonment on the unfortunate woman, the juryman feels that he is really the guilty person, and determines to make what amends he can. He visits the prisoner's cell and tells her of his intention, but she repulses him, saying her love has turned to hatred. Notwithstanding this, he accompanies her into exile in Siberia, sharing her hardships, and thus doing penance for his own sin."

ANATOLE FRANCE.

IN the choice, last autumn, of M. Anatole France for Academic glory, the immortality bestowed so rashly upon a living man by thirty-nine confrères is not futile. M. France bids fair to remain a classic, and it is fitting that a writer of so pure and limpid a style, of an erudition as exhaustive as it is quaint and rare, should find his career crowned with an honour that, in this case, is appropriate, while in so many others it is without significance or distinction. How many of all the Immortals introduced to their generation with pompous praise remain even for the next a memory, after the conventional eulogy pronounced by their successor before all Paris in its brightest array?

M. France is no mere modern man of letters (examples of which are so abundant), who writes polished prose and furnishes evidences of learning. However excellent and original his critical work may be considered, apart from taste and prejudice, it is not as a critic, or even as a charming writer, that he will appeal to the judgment of the future. For he is something considerably more. The exquisite fragrance and subtle simplicity of his prose reveal a quality more essential yet than charm for such permanence as he may claim. He has written, with a grace so artful as triumphantly to simulate unconsciousness and guilelessness, words as profound, as witty, and as wise as any the best classics of any land can offer. It is precisely this refinement of an incomparable art, the old-fashioned flavour of thought and delicate appreciation, the extreme subtlety of irony that recalls the bland false mediæval smile, and a captivating urbanity of wit and manner flowing through serene and temperate pages in modern language, that so completely fascinate us. There is the note of Sterne, —not affected, not imitated, not even reminiscent. It is the echo of a perfect affinity, whether unconscious or cultivated. Modern times, which M. France so clearly and caustically portrays, gather all the witchery of remote ages through the lucid and classical measure of his most perfect prose. There is no every-day picturesqueness, no vulgar brilliance, no cheap melodism to disturb us in our placid sensation of enchantment. His very obscenity is Pagan, and therefore, in some degree, endurable. His wit does not evoke laughter, but a smile, has more perfume than sparkle, yields a pervasive glow rather than hilarity.

M. France was born in 1844, and his first view of the world—Paris along the Seine—has been charmingly described in that innocent and attractive book—Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard. His childhood is delightfully evoked in the sweetest of child's books—Le Livre de mon ami. Is it perversity or sincerity that forces from him the assertion that the writing of these pleasant pages bored him? For never was a heavy task more lightly done; never were the panoramic impressions of a little Parisian lad more delicately and faithfully reproduced by the pen of cynical man. Not even Stevenson in his Child's Garden has achieved more vivid and quainter veracity in returning to the dim and evanescent phases of childish thought and sentiment.

M. France was educated at the old Stanilaus, in Thackeray's street of Our Lady of the Little Fields, kept by priests. He maintains that the old system of education was greatly superior to the modern lycées. There were greater chances of erudition; boys were taught less, but taught better; foreign languages and the varied accomplishments of our time were not cultivated, but classical lore was the basis of instruction, with less superficial and richer results. The method was more individual, less administrative; and, instead of leaving school machines overfilled with ill-digested knowledge, boys fronted life with a narrow, sound, and serviceable education. Are we to thank this system for the graceful, personal, and penetrative flavour of scholarship in the work of M. France, which, even in his most pedantic mood, never sinks into triviality or display? True, he can be pedantic enough, and in that drollest of eighteenth-century revivals, La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque, pedantry and erudition often combine to stay the smile on his reader's lips: it is one of his own favourites, and he likes to recall the amusement the writing of it afforded him.

Of course he has his campaign to remember, like every other Frenchman of our days. His soldiering may not have greatly served poor France's cause or done much damage to the German army; but, if it did not help to arrest the Prussian advance, it at least enabled M. France to lie upon the ramparts in a noble attitude and recite for the benefit of a stupefied comrade the lamentable story of Dido. M. France is naturally very proud of this picturesque fact. Anyone may shoot an enemy down, but few, while bomb and shell are bursting in their ears, and the enemy's bayonets are pointed in their direction, would have mind left for the woes of Dido. Leaving these martial altitudes, it is less dizzy to follow M. France's modest literary career at this period. We find him more tranquilly, if less gloriously, helping to edit the Dictionnaire d'Antiquité, and blossoming into verse in a volume of Poésies dorées. Under Darwin's influence his chief article of faith, revealed in these gilded verses, is his belief in the survival of the fittest. There were, of course, other influences, notably that of Greek and Roman, to whom he owes chiselled phrase and clarity of idea. His devotion to these imperishable masters is the keynote of his intellectual individuality. Nearer home, first comes Racine, above all Phèdre. It delights him still to recite scenes from Phèdre, which he does well. Of foreign gods, Shakespeare is supreme. He greets him barbarian, as befits a polished Latin, but in the next breath devoutly murmurs that he is the only one. Shakespeare can hardly have influenced so French and unimaginative a nature, but such universal genius he qualifies as the greatest of all, then makes lighter mention of Rabelais, Cervantes, and Goethe in his intellectual training.

The solitude and silence of the Bibliothèque du Sénat, where unpretentious and impersonal labour supplied him with daily bread, were a congenial atmosphere to a writer of learned bent, and until thirty he was content to mature without serious thought of production. It was then he wrote his first book, Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard, like M. Ludovic Halévy's Abbé Constantin, the delight of the French young person, habitually condemned to overseas fiction for propriety's sake. At forty he began to take himself gravely as the slave of ink, with the austere duty of producing a volume each year. This period he opened with that charming little book, Le Livre de mon Ami, precious because of its individual note and delicate humour. His four volumes of Critiques Littéraires are gathered articles contributed to the press, and reveal his gifts and qualities as a versatile journalist. Against the persistent personality of his criticism M. Brunetière has waged a ruthless war with his customary despotism of decision. But there is much to be said in favour of a "moi" so ironical and humorous as that of M. France. It may be the mission of the austere critic to lift a weightier official voice in judgment, but charm and grace dwell with M. France, who, for that matter, denies all value whatever to literary criticism. He regards it as purely a question of convention and prejudice. He leaves the rostrum to the ponderous editor of the Revue des Deux Mondes, and contents himself with chatting pleasantly to a public he does not take seriously, about books he takes less seriously, with no desire whatever to be taken too seriously himself.

Yet, strange to say of a writer who professes contempt of criticism, his own created work is to some extent marred by an excessive application of the critical method. He seems to count his words too rigidly, to watch too minutely the effect of each sentence, to exercise too ruthlessly the privilege of studied choice, with the result of a total lack of spontaneity. He is too careful, too measured a craftsman ever to carry away a single reader, too unimaginative ever to be carried away himself. Whatever he writes, he remains smilingly cold and unconvinced. The faintest touch of effervescence, a hint of impetuosity in restraint, would prove a bright relief against his mild, but implacable art. It would break refreshingly the temperate urbanity of his false and inscrutable smile. For he has too much the air of laughing at us artistically. His subtlety is too acquired, his humour too exquisitely literary to be sincere, too inhuman even despite its witchery and penetrative truth. And still the fascination of his irony remains irresistible. Instead of modern satire, he revives the vanished grace of mockery, the delicious frankness of mediæval perfidy, and envelopes sensualism in a decorative and suggestive quaintness. He can be offensive, as the love-scenes of that abominable masterpiece Le Lys Rouge prove. By such concessions to latter-day pornographic tastes he has marred what would otherwise have been a remarkable evocation of the old Florentine atmosphere of art and beauty, in splendid pages that have all the blinding brilliance and flash of jewels. Too learned, too artificial, but as fine and finished and radiant as the best Florence in her glory has produced.

M. France's gifts are salient enough, though his supreme quality lies beyond casual survey. His charm is like the flavour of old wine, not meant for hurried appreciation nor to tempt the palate of the ordinary reader. His glamour is subdued, like the gentle fulgence of a late sunset, neither glowing nor glittering. If he lack conviction and sincerity, he is the least hypocritical of writers. Faithless he may be, but he smiles so winningly that we make light of his je m'en fiche air.

HANNAH LYNCH.

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXV.—DOUGLAS JERROLD.

IF Douglas Jerrold's books are no longer read, his witticisms are still the salt of many books. This is his misfortune. Many of Jerrold's "best things" seem trivial or cruel. The trivial ones lie at the door of those who have reported them; yet enough is left to prove Jerrold a great wit. As for the charges of acridity and cruelty hurled at Jerrold, they cannot be made with any safety. There are men who can and do say the sharpest things without wounding. The look, the manner, the twinkle in the eye, the known character of the man—these turn bitterness to merry banter in the very utterance. It is told of Sir Richard Burton that he was once found making the most hideous grimaces (wherein he was a past master) to a bright lad of four or five years. The boy was fascinated, but unafraid; he saw, what Burton himself could not disguise, the true man behind the simulated demon. And it is always the individual that makes a jest cruel or harmless. Therefore, when we read of Jerrold's reply to the man who said that a certain air had completely carried him away, "Can nobody whistle it?" we are not entitled to impute to him any rudeness. When another man exclaims at dinner, "Well, sheep's head for ever, say I"—and Jerrold replies, "There's egotism!"—we need not suppose that the egotist's dinner was spoiled for him. These jokes, it is true, were barely worth reporting, but at least let us remember that they have probably been reported badly. Jerrold said many good things which were not of the destructive order. It was he who opined that "if an earthquake were to engulf England to-morrow, the English would manage to meet and dine somewhere, just to celebrate the event." He admired Carlyle, but remarked, very truly, that his teaching contained no definite suggestions: "Here," he said, "is a man who beats a big drum under my windows, and when I come running downstairs has nowhere for me to go." Jerrold may well have prided himself on sayings of this quality; but he was careless of his ordinary reputation as a wit. Like other wits, he was expected to be funny, and jokes were wrung from him that he could rate at their true worth. He was ambitious to be known as something better than a wit or a farceur, and it is to his credit that he wearied of making fun for Punch. It was into The Story of a Feather

DOUGLAS JERROLD

From the Picture by Sir Daniel Macnee in the National Portrait Gallery

(1844), The Chronicles of Clovernook (1846), and A Man Made of Money (1849), and into his best plays, that Jerrold put his heart. He would probably have gladly seen one of these acknowledged as his masterpiece, in place of Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A TALK WITH THE LIBRARIAN OF THE GUILDHALL LIBRARY.

"YOU seem to be considerably upset, Mr. Welch?"

"Yes; the ball on Monday night! You see, the Library is liable to be annexed on these occasions. I don't pretend I like it, but I have no legal ground of complaint. The Corporation spent an enormous sum on this Library building, and they resolved that on festive occasions it should contribute to the festivity."

"Well, but don't all these hoardings and boardings injure the furniture and fittings?"

"I'm afraid they do, but that can't be helped. Come into this little room, will you; we can talk quietly there. What can I tell you about the Library?"

"A great many things, if you will. For instance, how do you keep it up?"

"Well, I can tell you that. The Corporation allows us £1,000 a year to purchase new books. Of course, there are certain drains on this sum. We have to buy new volumes of works already begun; to pay for our magazines, and the annual reports of learned societies, and what not. In the end we have, perhaps, £550 a year, exclusive of any special subsidies, to spend on entirely new books."

"And do you buy important new books promptly—for instance, Mr. Traill's sixth and final volume of Social England is just out. Have you bought that?"

"Oh, yes, it is already available to readers. We buy books of first-rate importance at once, generally speaking. But we have to be shrewd. Many a good book, you know, comes into the remainder market."

"It does."

"Well, we anticipate and wait. Memoirs, for instance, are apt to come down, and one can often secure a 32s. book of that class for 6s. a year or two after publication."

"May I ask you from whom you buy your new books—I don't mean who precisely—but do you go to retail booksellers?"

"Oh, yes. The bulk of our books are supplied by two retail City firms. We get the usual discount and a little more off in consideration of the fact that we allow these booksellers to submit books on approval."

"And are you large purchasers from second-hand booksellers?"

"Yes, I think I may say so. For instance, I search all second-hand booksellers' lists for books on London that we do not possess. You know our collection of books on London is unrivalled."

"Unrivalled?"

"Unrivalled."

"Well, has the Ashburnham sale interested you?"

"Oh, yes; we made some interesting purchases. We are trying to collect books printed at early London presses, and we had saved £300 to spend at the Ashburnham sale. We spent it to advantage. Unfortunately, we had no chance of securing any of the Caxtons or Wynkyn de Worde; the prices these fetched were terrible—terrible. At another great sale we recently spent over £200 on Elizabethan books, mostly having some connexion with London."

"Tell me, will you, what class of readers come here?"

"Certainly. Merchants and City men generally come to consult books on commercial subjects. It is one of our main objects to serve the purposes of the commerce of London. Therefore we provide Directories for every part of the world, books on commercial law, and handy reference books of all kinds. Secondly, we have original workers, especially literary men, who are working up London subjects. Thirdly, young men and women who are attending technical classes in the City, the Gresham Lectures, the University Extension Lectures, and the Birkbeck Institute. These come in the luncheon hour or the evenings. Fourthly, professional men, architects, solicitors, engineers, who may be preparing papers for learned societies, or keeping themselves abreast of the culture of the day."

"And you can satisfy the needs of all these people?"

"Yes. Ours is a very well-selected library; it is also of a most respectable size, and we can hand you a book in three minutes."

"Do many people drop in at mid-day to read for sheer recreation?"

"Oh, undoubtedly!"

"And they ask for fiction?"

"Yes, but they only get the best. Of current fiction we can offer them practically nothing. But Thackeray, Dickens, Scott, Kingsley, George Eliot, Lord Lytton, Disraeli, and some dozen others are at their disposal."

"But no living novelists?"

"Hardly any; we have one or two of Kipling's books. We have no Merediths. We have all Stevenson's books."

"Do you analyse the reading done here?"

"Yes, I take one typical day in each month and report on it to the Committee. Here are some of my reports."

"I see that on May 17 your principal entries are: Fiction, 12.52 per cent.; topography, 10.87; biography, 9.69; magazines, 7.32; fine arts, 6.85; useful arts, 4.72; newspaper files, 4.01. It seems an excellent record, Mr. Welch; but I am struck with the fact that your repression of fiction leaves it still at the top."

"Well, we can at least say that we keep only standard novels; and you will see that even in the partial list you have taken down serious reading stands at 40 per cent. as compared with 12 per cent. The great bulk of our reading is serious. Indeed, this is a students' library."

"Your own connexion with the Library has been a very long one, I believe, Mr. Welch?"

"I came to it as a boy, in 1864."

"You must be greatly attached to it."

"I am."

SALE OF THE ASHBURNHAM LIBRARY—(concluded).

THE first portion of this famous sale has realised, in all, £30,151 10s. It will be seen from the totals of each day that the third and sixth days alone brought almost half of this enormous sum: (1) £2,599 18s. 6d., (2) £1,930 6s. 6d., (3) £9,788 1s., (4) £2,779 6s. 6d., (5) £2,205 14s. 6d., (6) £5,259 4s., (7) £4,418 0s. 6d., and (8) £1,150 18s. 6d.

The items which swelled the sixth day's sale were all books printed either by Caxton or Wynkyn de Worde. Caxton's first edition of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" (1478?), wanting fifteen leaves, was acquired by Messrs. Pickering & Chatto for £720. An almost perfect copy brought last year the large sum of £1,880; while the Barlston Hall copy, defective in nineteen leaves, fetched £1,020. Caxton's second edition of Chaucer's "Tales," also defective, was bought by Messrs. Pickering for £300. The other Chaucers sold as follows: Pynson's Edition (1493?), £233 (Pickering); another copy, very defective, £49 (Tregaskis); Wynkyn de Worde's second issue (1498), £1,000 (Pickering); Chaucer's "Troilus and Criseyde" (Pynson, 1528), £26 (Leighton); Chaucer's "Workes" (Godfray, 1532), £45 (Quaritch); (W. Bonham, 1542), £20 (Quaritch); (J. Kyngston, 1561), £31 (Bain); Pickering's edition of Chaucer's "Tales" (1830, on vellum), £34 (Leighton); Pickering's edition of Chaucer's "Romaunt of the Rose," &c. (1846, on vellum), £25 (Leighton); Wynkyn de Worde's edition of Chaucer's "Troilus" (1517), £110 (Quaritch).

Caxton's "Ordre of Chivalry" (1483-5) went to Messrs. Pickering for £345, and the same printer's edition of "The Boke named Cordale" (1479), the same purchaser acquired for £760, imperfect as it was in eight leaves. A fine copy from Wynkyn de Worde's press of "The Foure of the Commandementes of God," commanded £85 (Tregaskis); while the copy of Columna's "Hypnerotomachia," which had belonged to the Emperor Charles V., went to Mr. Quaritch for £151. Other noteworthy items of this day are: Champier's "La Vie . . . des preux Chevalier Bayard" (Jehan Bonfons), £35 (Bain); "The Boke of the Cyte of Ladyes" (Pepwell, 1521), £23 (Bain); the famous "Chronicle of St. Albans" (1483), £180 (Leighton); "The Firste Part of Churchyardes Chippes" (1578), £31 (Bain); "Tullyes Offyces" (De Worde, 1534), £35 (Bain); Cocker's "Arithmetick" (1678), £24 10s. (Townley); Commynes' "Chronique et Histoire," in a Groller binding, £38 (Quaritch); Thomas Danett's translation of the same (1601), £27 (Bain); Conrad von Megenberg's "Das Buch der Natur" (1478), £54 (Quaritch); Alexander Craig's "Poetical Recreations" (1609), a small volume of sixteen leaves, £49 (Townley); the first edition of Orammer's "Catechism" (1548), £36 (Bain); and Cunningham's "Cosmographical Glasse" (1559), £42 (Quaritch).

The remaining two days may be summarised as follows: Daniel's "Works" (1601, first complete edition), £28 (Bain); the first edition known with a date of the whole of Dante's "Divina Comedia" (1472), £142 (Quaritch); De Bry's "Collectiones Peregrinationum" (1598-1619), £40 (Quaritch); Decker's "Villanies Discovered" (1620), £24 (Bain); Defoe's "Moll Flanders" (1721), £22 10s. (Ellis); Gilles Dewes' "Introduction for to Lerne to Rede" (Nic. Bousman), £30 10s. (Hazlitt); Caxton's "Dictes or Sayings of the Philosophers" (1477), £1,320 (Quaritch); Diodorus Siculus' "Les Trois premiers Livres de l'Histoire" (1535), £151 (Quaritch); Caxton's "Doctrinal of Sypence" (1489), £660 (Quaritch); Gawin Douglas's "Palis of Honour" (1553), £81 (Ellis); Drayton's "Poems" and "Polyolbion" (1619-22), £27 (Hazlitt); Durandus' "Rationale Divinorum Officiorum" (1460, on vellum), £320 (Quaritch); Du Saix' "Lesperon de Discipline" (1532), £190 (Granville); Erasmus' "Exposition of the Crede" (1533), £24 10s. (Bain); Fletcher's "Purple Island" (1633), £20 10s. (Cotton); Florio's "Firste and second Fruites" (1578-81), £20 5s. (Quaritch); first edition of Foxe's "Book of Martyrs" (1562-3), £150 (Quaritch); Froissart's "Chroniques" (illuminated), £190 (Leighton); Froissart's "Cronycles" (first edition of Berners' translation, 1523-5), £30 (Quaritch). The Foxe's "Book of Martyrs" was sold as complete, which means that this copy is, perhaps, the only copy known which may be so described.

Space forbids us entering into further details, but very many most interesting items brought over £10 each. Without a doubt this has been the most sensational book sale within recent years.

DRAMA.

WITH the two leading actresses of the French stage playing side by side, and in the case of "Frou-Frou" in direct contrast with each other, it was impossible that they could avoid some appearance of rivalry. Nor need it be supposed that they were anxious to do so. It is no secret that of late years the fickle public of the Boulevard have shown some inclination to depose the illustrious Sarah Bernhardt from her throne and to elect Mme. Réjane in her stead. That Mme. Sarah has been a good many years on the boards is true, and as the French proverb has it, "One cannot always be and have been." But she is a woman of remarkable vitality, as well as a wonderful actress, and though the curious profess to detect some falling off in her powers, it is probable that the waning of her popularity in Paris is mainly due to the occurrence of her long absences on tour, since she has made it pretty clear that l'art pour l'art is no longer, if, indeed, it ever was, the guiding principle of her life. On the other hand, Mme. Réjane has been faithful for many years to her Parisian public, and the latter extend to her a corresponding measure of patronage and goodwill. To compare the two actresses more closely than this with a view to determining which is the greater would be a vain task. Each has a style of her own, and each at her best is unapproachable. I imagine, however, that when all accounts are cast up the palm of excellence will be accorded to Mme. Sarah, who, on the score alike of force, versatility, and what, commercially speaking, may be called output, has no small claim to be regarded as the greatest actress of the century, perhaps the greatest actress that the world has ever known.

MME. RÉJANE works upon a smaller scale than her rival. Within the range of her powers her artistic achievement may be of a higher order than that which Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has been accustomed for many years to give to the world. But the latter sweeps the whole gamut of comedy and tragedy with sovereign ease, while the personality of the former adapts itself best to the portrayal of comedy characters having a basis of Bohemianism or vulgarity.

Hence the success of Mme. Réjane in "La Douleuse" and "Mme. Sans-Gêne," and her comparative failure in "Frou-Frou," where, greatly daring, she has directly measured herself against Mme. Sarah. What manner of woman is Gilberte de Sartorys, otherwise Frou-Frou? Mme. Sarah Bernhardt depicts her as a victim to nerves and hysteria, acting upon impulse, giddy, frivolous, irresponsible, but not at heart vicious, and never more appreciative of her husband's goodness or more sensible of her love for him, her child or her sister, than after her downfall. In Mme. Réjane's hands the heroine of Meilhac and Halévy's famous play develops upon wholly different lines. She is more deliberate in her wrongdoing, more inherently corrupt, the victim of an evil heredity, or so it would seem; and for the first time one feels there is a certain fitness in her being provided with a prodigal and profligate parent like Brigard. Doubtless, the second conception is not less true in its way than the first. It may even appeal to the student of character as the more likely. But as to the relative value of the two Frou-Frous in a dramatic sense there can be no question. Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's is infinitely the more touching, the more poetic, the more beautiful, and it is inconceivable that the torrents of tears that have been shed over "pauvre Frou-Frou" at her instance could ever be evoked by such a minx as Mme. Réjane portrays.

In these different interpretations we see the effect of personality, which, after all, remains the greatest factor in the actor's art. However cleverly the actor may disguise himself, he is at his best when he suits his part, or the conception which the public, for some reason or other, may have formed of his part. I willingly grant that the Frou-Frou of Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, all nerve and goodness, is not a very real character, or that it is less real than the other, who is clearly her father's daughter. Still, to the minds of the present generation, no other Frou-Frou is so acceptable as the one she has moulded. It is always dangerous to attempt to recast the public conception of a character. Nothing but commanding genius can do it with impunity, and if Mme. Réjane smarts a little under her defeat, she is merely paying the natural penalty of her rashness. On her own ground, as in "Mme. Sans-Gêne," this fine actress has no rivalry to fear. There her personality aids her, as much as in "Frou-Frou" it militates against her.

THE explosive, hysterical style of which Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is so consummate a mistress finds further illustration in "Spiritisme," the latest and, in some respects, the least satisfactory work that has come from the prolific pen of M. Sardou. "Spiritisme" hardly contains material enough for a play. It consists of one great scene, the setting of which would be better suited to a Christmas story—a fact which explains the small degree of favour with which this latest specimen of M. Sardou's handiwork has been received. On the pretence of going on some innocent railway journey a married woman elopes with an admirer. The train by which she is supposed to travel is wrecked in a collision and partly destroyed by fire, so that the bodies of the victims are in many cases unrecognisable. She is believed to be among the dead. Safe in her lover's retreat, she is free to begin life under new conditions; but she is painfully disillusioned when her lover shirks his responsibilities, and the outpouring of her contempt on this despicable person's head is checked only by her remorse as from her window she sees her husband bent with grief taking part in the obsequies of the victims of the railway disaster. From this combination of emotions is derived the great scene of the piece. But why the title "Spiritisme"? The betrayed husband is a spiritualist, as we gather from a table-rapping scene in the first act, and it is in the guise of a spirit that the repentant wife in the third act opens negotiations for a reconciliation. M. Sardou allows his characters to discuss the pros and cons of spiritualism in a manner which suggests that he has some personal sympathy with the doctrine, but in the end he employs it only as a device for bringing about an ineffective dénouement. He is a dramatist first and a spiritualist afterwards. For the sake of the one scene in which the actress rises to her full height in the manifestation of scorn and grief, it is a pity that the dramatist's hand should here, to some extent, have lost its cunning.

As another exemplification of the force of personality, I may mention the poor effect produced by the charming young Austrian actress, Mme. Odilon, in attempting what is technically known as a "breeches" part. She is much too feminine in style, physically as well as morally, to make a good stage boy. The experiment was an unfortunate one, and shows how readily the actress might have marred her London season had she chosen this character for her début. In fact, she has not succeeded in extending or deepening the highly favourable impression she created in "Untreu." The repertory of the "Volks-theater," so far as it has been exhibited at Daly's Theatre, is open to the reproach of being shallow and trivial. The pieces are pleasant drawing-room sketches that create no lasting impression. They are the entertainment theory of the drama pushed to an extreme. Better the problem play or musical farce than this dulcet monotony!

As a theatrical record, Mr. William Archer's compilation of his weekly dramatic criticisms for the past year (The Theatrical World of 1896: Walter Scott) will be welcomed; but he is too much out of sympathy with the theatrical tastes of the day to be an ideal chronicler, and it may be that the most valuable part of this volume will be the synopsis of play-bills given in the appendix. Mr. Archer lives in a little theatrical world of his own, and has no hesitation in banning everything which does not fit into it. The special object of his aversion appears to be the popular drama, governed by what he calls "the law of the hundred thousand." Accordingly, he pleads in an introduction for the endowment of a "non-commercial play-house"—i.e., a theatre where only such plays as afford Mr. Archer pleasure should see the light. This is a right royal attitude for a dramatic critic to take up, and while he was about it Mr. Archer might also have put in a plea for the endowment of unpopular or unreadable criticism, especially as he could not, in that respect at least, be suspected of selfish motives. Mr. Archer's defects as a critic are the defects of his qualities. But why does he devote so much time and trouble to the worthless drama now in vogue. Can it be that he has the same secret regard for it as a husband is understood to entertain for the wife whom he is in the habit of beating once a week?

J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

THE paper recently read by Dr. Russell before the Royal Society opens up some very perplexing problems as to the nature of the rays which appear to emanate from many familiar substances—rays capable, like those discovered by Lenard and Röntgen, of affecting a sensitive photographic plate. That an active source of energy such as a Crookes tube should give rise to these rays is not in itself surprising. We get to a more difficult stage of the phenomenon in Becquerel's experiments, which showed that various uranium compounds possess the power of leaving an image upon a sensitive plate if locked up with it in the dark. Even uranium, however, has marked fluorescent properties which might be responsible for this effect. In many of Dr. Russell's experiments one can trace no such evident reason for the action. Mercury, zinc, magnesium, cadmium, aluminium, nickel, pewter, bismuth, lead, tin, cobalt, antimony, among the metals, all appear to give out radiations capable of affecting a sensitive plate, and will leave images of themselves after standing upon one in the dark for about a week. Gold, platinum and iron, on the other hand, exhibit little or no power of the kind.

THAT the images are not due to mere contact appears from the fact that a figure scratched upon the polished face of a sheet of zinc reproduced itself. The interposition of a coat of varnish between the metal and the plate serves only to increase the effect. Glass, on the contrary, stops it in the case of Dr. Russell's experiments, whereas with uranium it does not. A further curious point is that many substances other than metals—e.g., straw, wood, charcoal and printer's ink—possess the same property. A section of young larch was shown to print its formation clearly on a plate, so that the rings and bark could be made out. Charcoal would lose its power after heating in a crucible. An interesting point about the inks was that all were not equally active. Some newspapers would leave an impress of their characters, others would not. In many cases the activity was increased by heating the body, and diminished by cooling it. Such are the main facts announced by Dr. Russell, who has opened up a new field in this most fruitful branch of research. What the ultimate explanation of his discoveries may be we have yet to learn.

THE spirit of Layard might admire the completeness with which Mr. Haynes, in command of the American excavations at Niffer, in Southern Babylonia, has revealed the history of that great temple and fortress. The work itself is of an arduous character, not unattended with personal risk, but Mr. Haynes has continued at his post uninterruptedly since about 1890, and besides mapping the ruins of various dates which underlie each other on the site, has furnished Dr. Hilprecht at home with masses of inscriptions for decipherment. The upper temple and tower of Niffer, girt with a wall fifty feet in thickness, was built by Ur-gur about 2600 years B.C. Below this was another founded by Sargon I. and his son, whose names were stamped upon the bricks. Further down were still other temples of unknown antiquity. Judging by the height of the débris which covered them, Mr. Haynes conjectures that 6000 B.C. is about the date of these ruins. From the inscriptions Mr. Haynes has shown that Niffer was one of a number of important and flourishing cities between the years 4000 and 2500 B.C., and he has acquired a large amount of valuable information relating to the customs and religion of the Babylonians in those remote ages. A preliminary account of the work has already appeared in the Transactions of the American Philosophical Society, and has recently been reprinted by the University of Pennsylvania, which organised the excavations.

DR. FRANK H. CUSHING, in Science, relates a remarkable case of primitive surgery among the Zuñi Indians, of which he was a witness. The case was one of inflammation arising from a bruise on the foot, and spreading until the whole leg appeared to have mortified up to the point of blood poisoning. The operation, which was conducted with great skill so far as relates to avoidance of vein, artery and tendon, consisted in opening up the central wound with lancets made of glass and obsidian, clearing away all traces of disease from the bone, removing diseased tissue, and washing very thoroughly with an antiseptic fluid decocted from willow roots. Nothing could have been neater or more scientific than the whole proceeding, which ended in complete recovery; yet the theory which underlay it was of the most primitive possible kind. The belief was that bad blood must be removed and good blood infused, to form new flesh; that as blood is the source of new flesh, so water is the source of blood, or even of life; and as the willow grows in water, its roots must contain the source of life. The fact that an infusion of willow root is red strengthens this belief. Festering was attributed to the action of worms, and the careful removal of diseased tissue was intended to extirpate not only the worms, but the seed of them. Finally, at a critical point of the operation, a fetish was laid on the wound, and was supposed to dispel the last traces of malignance. Dr. Cushing's account of the proceedings forms a curious contribution to the history of medicine among primitive peoples, and should be looked up by those who are interested in the subject.

H. C. M.

MUSIC.

THE "Evangelimann," words and music by Wilhelm Kienzl, was produced at Covent Garden last Friday week. The work came out about two years ago, in Germany, where it has enjoyed considerable popularity. The book has its strong and its weak points. I will tell the story as briefly as possible. Two brothers, Johann and Mathias, are in love with Martha, niece of the Justice and Principal of St. Othmar Monastery: the one is a teacher, the other a clerk. Mathias is the favoured one. Johann tells the Principal of his brother's boldness in aspiring to the hand of his niece. Mathias is dismissed from his post, and Johann, seeing the lovers meet for a last farewell, sets fire to the school-house, close by. Mathias is suspected of the deed, seized, and condemned to twenty years' imprisonment. Between the first and the second act thirty years are supposed to have elapsed. Mathias has suffered his long punishment, has come out of prison, and, after many wanderings and many rebuffs, turns "Evangelimann"—i.e., he goes about singing texts of Scripture and hymns, in order to gain a scanty livelihood. All this he relates to Magdalena, Martha's friend in former days, who recognises him, in spite of his grey hairs and generally changed appearance. The singing of Mathias and of some children whom he gathers round him are heard by a man in a neighbouring house, who is dying. He is soothed by the gentle singing. He sends for Mathias, who recognises his brother Johann. The latter confesses his sin, and craves forgiveness, which is granted. He dies, and as the curtain falls the children are heard singing of those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake.

The book has its strong and its weak points. A certain simplicity and earnestness make for strength, which is intensified by the Christian form in which it is presented. The semi-religious character of the drama might twenty or thirty years ago have proved distasteful. But now, thanks in large measure to Wagner, who breathed into his latest music-drama a Christian spirit of the purest, no such religious objections would be raised by any reasonable person. The story, however, is not developed with sufficient art. The "Evangelimann" is naturally the centre of attraction, yet for all that, if some of the other characters had been less of lay figures, the drama would have proved more powerful. The gentle manner in which Johann is forgiven by his brother offers a fine contrast to the fierce jealousy and fiendish conduct of the unsuccessful lover in the first act. Had Mathias learnt the truth at the time he would undoubtedly have sought immediate revenge; suffering softened his nature. But the composer seems to have fancied that some relief was necessary to the pervading sombreness of his drama. Hence he has introduced into the first act a tavern scene, which certainly shows considerable skill and a true vein of humour, yet it seems to me altogether out of the picture. The tabernæ personæ, once the scene over, are heard of no more.

The music of the "Evangelimann" is very much in the Wagner vein. There are many reminiscences, and throughout the composer indulges in phraseology which sounds very familiar. Up to a certain point the strong influence of a great master does no harm; nay, rather good. Is it thus with Kienzl? At present I feel unable to decide. After the second performance I shall feel better able to express an opinion. I confess that the work interested me. Anyhow, I determined to hear it again.

THE last Philharmonic Concert of the season took place on Thursday evening, July 1, when the programme opened with an Overture entitled "Spring and Youth," from the pen of Mr. Herbert Bunning. There is some good writing in this piece, but little inspiration. The overture may reflect credit on the composer, yet it does not—as is the case with all music likely to live—create a wish to hear it a second time. It is difficult to be fair to Mr. Bunning; the very fact of his Overture being performed by a society of a certain standing led one to expect something much above the common, but this expectation was not fulfilled. There was another novelty on the same evening—a Symphony in E flat (No. 4), by Alexander Glazounow, a Russian composer, of whom a later Symphony was recently played at one of Mr. Wood's concerts. At the Philharmonic he himself conducted his work. As in the Fifth Symphony, so here there are many signs of careful thought and skilful workmanship. I cannot say that the music made any deep impression. The composer is not a born conductor, and certainly did not present his work in the best light. Then, again, one cannot help comparing symphonies by Russian musicians with those of Tchaikowsky; and that is a hard comparison. Once more, Tchaikowsky is dead, and that alone makes one judge him more favourably: the grave is the true vestibule to fame. Of the three movements of the Glazounow Symphony I much prefer the middle one. M. Alexander Siloti played Beethoven's piano-forte Concerto in E flat. He is an exceedingly clever pianist, but his reading of the work lacked nobility—at times, indeed, in the last movement, it was coarse. Sir A. C. Mackenzie was apparently not pleased with the rendering; at any rate, he did not look after the orchestral parts with the care which they deserve.

J. S. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

London: June 23.

In the otherwise fair and accurate account which your reviewer has given of my book on the History of Intellectual Development in the ACADEMY there are one or two inaccuracies of such vital importance that were they left uncorrected they would give quite a false impression of the drift of the book as a whole. I trust, therefore, that you will give me space to set the matter right. The first is where your reviewer, in commenting on my appendix on Plato, says that the views of Plato "are set forth in such a way as to leave the reader in doubt whether Dr. Crozier himself still believes in the objective existence of the Platonic essences, archetypes, affinities, hierarchies, bodiless but still spherical deities, transmigration of souls, and the rest of it," which are connected with that system. Of course, this is absurd. The system of Plato, both as a whole and in its parts, is for modern minds as dead as the Dodo, and would be as impossible to revive. It is one thing to believe in the superiority of Platonism over all other systems of ancient philosophy, and quite another to imagine that we could return to it to-day. I thought I had made that abundantly clear.

A second misconception of your reviewer is where, in commenting on the attempt which I make in the book to show from actual history that given the germs of a new religion or philosophy, it is possible to lay down the successive stages of its evolution beforehand; he asks in effect if I imagine that the discoveries of a Newton, a Darwin, or a Spencer could be so anticipated? But in my introductory chapter I expressly show that neither the discoveries of science, nor the evolution of any religion or philosophy which is liable to be affected by new scientific discoveries, can be foreseen by the human mind.

JOHN BEATTIE CROZIER.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Mr. Francis Thompson's "New Poems" (Constable.) Of the less laudatory notices, that which appeared in the Saturday is the most severe. The poet is charged with "disorder": "These odes begin in one key, are shifted to another, take up a fresh subject, drop it, and at length, as if merely wearied of their aimless flight, drop suddenly or cease in the air." "The Mistress of Vision" (of which, in the Speaker, Mr. Quiller-Couch says that it is "the finest thing in this new volume," having "the full mystery of romantic beauty with little of that obscurity" which annoys him in some other ambitious poems) is taken as an example of obscurity. These, says the critic, after quoting the passage beginning "Her song said that no springing," "... are mere nonsense-verses, very melodious, and in a vague way distinguished; but the impression they leave behind them is purely sensuous, as of winds of words upon an Æolian harp." Having given instances of verbal innovations, and excused himself by considerations of space from commenting on the "confusion of syntax, the positive grammatical solecisms, the execrable rhymes," the writer concludes: "We hasten to admit that Mr. Thompson is a poet. He has elevation of fancy, richness of diction, and a touch of genuine sublimity. ... The output of his irregular and ill-trained talent should have been subjected to the severest tests." The following from Mr. Quiller-Couch's causerie in the following week's Speaker reads like a comment: "Undoubtedly Mr. Thompson's poetry has exasperating tricks which most of us believe to be blemishes. Undoubtedly the eulogies of his friends have been at once so precipitate and so defiant as to lead us to suspect that he is being shielded from frank criticism. ... On the other hand, to be stung into denying that he is a poet, and an extraordinarily fine poet, is to lose one's head just as wildly and less pardonably." The Athenæum allows that he "has the ecstasy; but unfortunately he has not realised that ecstasy, if it is to be communicated from soul to soul and not merely from mouth to ear, must be whispered, not shouted." "He is a verbal intelligence. He thinks in words, he receives his emotions from words, and the rapture which he certainly attains is the rapture of the disembodied word." "He has a singular mastery of verse. ... No one can cause a more vague, ardent feeling in the sympathetic reader. ... There are times when the fire in him burns clear through its enveloping veils of smoke, and he writes passages of real splendour."

"The first thing to be done," writes the Chronicle, "and by far the most important, is to recognise and declare that we are here face to face with a poet of the first order, a man of imagination all compact, a seer and singer of rare genius. ... The intellectual note of Mr. Thompson's writings is, as we know, an ardent mysticism, passing over every now and then into devotional fervour." His "master-quality resides, no doubt, in the inexhaustible wealth and splendour of the imagery in which he expresses elemental and mystical facts. ... He, reveals indeed, in orgiastic imageries (the epithet be on his head, not on ours), and revelry implies excess. But when the excess is an excess of strength, the debauch a debauch of beauty, who can condemn or even regret it?" In reference to his verbal licences, "one's impulse is rather to say, 'Go on and prosper—play what pranks you please with the English language; Latinise, neologise, solecise as you will; make past participles from nouns and verbs transitive from adjectives; devise gins and springes for the tongue out of cunningly knotted sibilants and dental consonants; pause not to distinguish between grotesque conceits and noble images; only continue to write such lines ... and everything, everything shall be forgiven you.'" In a similar tone the Daily News writes: "It is not of the slightest use to whip the offender. He does not mind; he has had so much of it. And besides, his faults lie so completely on the surface that there is a sort of poverty of spirit in taking too much notice of them. On the contrary, you are tempted rather to make them a new ground of reverence. They are so obvious, they could be so easily avoided, that they suggest a sort of inevitableness of poetic possession."

"This book," says the Pall Mall, which writes itself down a "chastened admirer," "has a considerable variety of fare, and in certain poems Mr. Thompson is at his very best. But there is much tedious, some ill-considered, and not a little thoroughly inartistic work—Banjo-Browning, and, what is still worse, Crashaw-Kipling. ... The first poem ["The Mistress of Vision"] is quite superb in its solemn mysticism. It matters little what it means, but it is the very demon of poetry. ... There is a terrible poem called an 'Anthem of Earth' ["perhaps the noblest poem in the book."—Chronicle], without form and void, rhymeless, and like the work of a mediæval and pedantic Walt Whitman. The sonnets are crabbed and like a voice from the tomb. In the poem 'Assumpta Maria,' which we have already had occasion to mention, Mr. Thompson is at his lowest level."

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LTD.

The BLIGHT of RESPECTABILITY:

An Anatomy of the Disease and a Theory of Curative Treatment.

By GEOFFREY MORTIMER.

1. WHAT is RESPECTABILITY?
2. THE PATHOLOGY of the DISEASE.
3. "LADIES" and "GENTLEMEN."
4. SPECIFIC SYMPTOMS of the MALADY in WOMEN.
5. RESPECTABILITY and MORALS.
6. CULTURED GENTILITY.
7. PLUTOCRACY.
8. VILLADOM.
9. THE TYRANNY of RESPECTABILITY.
10. RESPECTABLE CIVILISATION and AFTER.

THE UNIVERSITY MAGAZINE AND FREE REVIEW:

A MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

Edited by "DEMOCRITUS."

ONE SHILLING net.

Contents of the JULY Number.

WILLIAM the CAD. By VON SACKENRODFF.
ON ATHEISM. By HUGH MORTIMER OCHIL.
INTERNATIONAL ETHICS. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON.
AN EXTRAORDINARY CASE of COLOUR BLINDNESS.
By F. H. TERRY-COOPER.
TRUTH and FALSEHOOD and their VALUES. By JOHN C. KENWORTHY.
BOANERGES as MERRY ANDREW. By THOMAS WAUGH.
SAXON and CELT in the INCUBATOR. By A. W. BARNFIELD.
RELICS of SUN-WORSHIP in JUDAISM and CHRISTIANITY. By E. BRUCE BOSWELL.
ON THE NATURAL and ARTIFICIAL CHARACTERS of WOMEN. By ALLAN LAIDLAW.
MARRIAGE de CONVENANCE. By E. M. FERGUSON.
NEW BOOKS.

THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, LIMITED,
16, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN

Most recent, crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, AND OTHER SERMONS.

"Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the Beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 5s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times.
"Masterly, beautiful, inspiring."—Methodist Recorder.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"The work of a master of pulpit oratory."—Freeman.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and the most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE HOLY of HOLIES: a Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"Every sermon glows with unction, and shows intense power."—Methodist Recorder.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, and the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"For more than a quarter of a century he has held almost an unchallenged position as the prince of pulpit orators. The back pews of Dr. Maclaren's church are in the nooks and corners of the earth."—Methodist Times.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"Open the book wherever we may, the temptation to read on and on is very great. The volume is invaluable."—Sunday School Chronicle.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,
21 AND 23, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS BOOKSELLERS, LITTEARY MEN, BOOK COLLECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CONTINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED, AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS, the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 6s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages,

whilst the price (6s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records. The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

A PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENT

Of unique interest is given with each issue of "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON	November	14
JOHN KEATS	"	21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	"	28
TOM HOOD	December	5
THOMAS GRAY	"	12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON	"	19
SIR WALTER SCOTT	"	26
	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	"	9
LEIGH HUNT	"	16
LORD MACAULAY	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE	February	6
CHARLES LAMB	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS	March	6
EDMUND WALLER	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS	"	20
JOHN MILTON	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS	"	29
JONATHAN SWIFT	June	5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY	"	12
WILLIAM BLAKE	"	19
SIR RICHARD STEELE	"	26
ALEXANDER POPE	July	3

To-day's Issue.

DOUGLAS JERROLD.

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIS EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled Tins.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKELTON.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

"A monument of painstaking and skilful work, which no one probably could have undertaken with so many advantages as Mr. Miall, or have accomplished with greater success."—Literary World.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Furnival Street, E.C.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or treaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1315.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 31 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
" 32, 34 MICHELLEANS. 762, 782 lots.)
" 35 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 112, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

SOTHERAN'S PRICE CURRENT of LITERA-TURE, No. 562, just published, contains a good selection of Books in General Literature, besides Bibliographical Works, Mr.
John Payne Collier's Publications, the Dramatists of the Restoration (in volume), Sir William Frazer's Scottish Genealogical Works, and an appreciation of Charles Dickens.—Post free from H. SOTHERAN & Co., Booksellers, 140, Strand, W.C., and 37, Piccadilly, W.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
38, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

TH. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum).
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
MSB. considered for Publication. (Established 1819.)

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

TYPE-WRITING.—Authors' MSS., Plays, Essays, &c., carefully Copied. 1s. per 1,000 words; duplicate copies, half-price. References from editors and others.—Miss DISNEY, 28, Balham Grove, London, S.W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 48, Chancery Lane, London.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. . per dozen, ruled or plain.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.—NOTICE is HEREBY GIVEN, that the President and Council will proceed to ELECT, on TUESDAY, August 3rd, ONE COUSINS ANNUITANT. Applicants for the Annuity, which is of the value of not more than £50, must be deserving Artists, Painters in Oil and Water Colours, Sculptors, Architects, or Engravers in need of aid through unavoidable failure of professional employment, or other causes. Forms of application can be obtained by letter, addressed to the SECRETARY, Royal Academy of Arts, Piccadilly, W. They must be filled in and returned on or before Saturday, July 31st.
By order,
FRED. A. EATON, Secretary.

LAST WEEKS.

ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIEGFRIED H. HERKOMER, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cookes, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES
LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT
WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent.
The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—
Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs.
Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 22, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

EPSOM COLLEGE.—ANNUAL EXAMINATION
for SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS early in JULY.
New Junior department just opened for 100 boys. Preparation for London Matric. and Prel. Scient. Exams., the Army, Navy, and Universities. Numerous recent successes. NEXT TERM begins
SEPTEMBER 16th.—Apply to the Bursar, 5, The College, Epsom, Surrey.

ASSISTANT MUSIC MASTER (Resident), who could also teach Drawing and Painting in all branches.
WANTED in a Public School in September next. Churchman.
Liberal honorarium to a master of first-rate ability and experience.—
Address "Custos," care of Messrs. Paton, 143, Cannon Street, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the
houses of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of
Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,
ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHURE now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND &amp; CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows Interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MESSRS. LONGMANS &amp; CO.'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS AND STORIES.

NEW NOVEL BY S. LEVETT-YEATS.

THE CHEVALIER D'AURIAC: a Historical Romance.

By S. LEVETT-YEATS, Author of "The Honour of Savelli," &amp;c.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Next week.]

THE PROFESSOR'S CHILDREN: a Story. By Edith H. Fowler.

Author of "The Young Pretenders." With 24 Illustrations by Ethel Kate Burgess. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SKETCHES in LAVENDER: Blue and Green. Short Stories.

By JEROME K. JEROME. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Altogether a very good book wherewith to beguile the time on a railway journey, and thoroughly unæsthetic, which is not its least recommendation. Since 'Stageland' Mr. Jerome has given us nothing better than these stories."—*WorldKALLISTRATUS: an Autobiography. A Story of the Time of the Second Punic War. By A. H. GILKES, M.A., Master of Dulwich College. With Illustrations by Maurice Greiffenhagen. Crown 8vo, 6s.

CROOKED PATHS. By Francis Allingham. Crown 8vo, 6s."To die and discover that death is not the end of all; to find that there is no death, but merely an altered existence; to know that our actual self continues to feel and to think after death; this is the theoretical theme of Mr. Francis Allingham's novel. The idea of the book is well conceived and seriously carried out."—Daily Mail.

NEW BOOK BY MR. ANDREW LANG.

MODERN MYTHOLOGY. By Andrew Lang, M.A., LL.D.,

St. Andrews, Hon. Fellow of Merton College, sometime Gifford Lecturer in the University of St. Andrews. 8vo, 9s.

CROQUET: its History, Rules, and Secrets. By Arthur Lillie, Champion, Grand National Croquet Club, 1872, Winner of the "All Comers' Championship," Maidstone, 1896. With 4 Full-page Illustrations by Lucien Davies, 15 Illustrations in the Text, and 27 Diagrams. Crown 8vo, 6s.

WHAT GUNPOWDER PLOT WAS: a Reply to Father Gerard.

By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, D.C.L. With 8 Illustrations and Plans. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A GIRL'S WANDERINGS in HUNGARY. By H. Ellen

BROWNING. With Map and 19 Illustrations. New and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Something quite unlike a guide-book. The whole book is a series of anecdotes and confessions." Manchester Guardian.

THE SILVER LIBRARY.—NEW VOLUMES.

THE MEMOIRS of BARON DE MARBOT. Translated from the French by ARTHUR JOHN BUTLER. With Portrait. New Edition. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 7s.

JOAN HASTE. By H. Rider Haggard. With 20 Illustrations by

F. S. Wilson. New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

TEACHING and ORGANISATION. With Special Reference to Secondary Schools. A Manual of Practice. Edited by P. A. BARNETT, M.A., late Principal of the Isleworth Training College for Schoolmasters, formerly Professor of English in Firth (University) College, Sheffield. Crown 8vo, 6s. 8d.

*The object of this manual is to collect and co-ordinate for the use of students and teachers the experience of persons of authority in special branches of educational practice, and to cover as nearly as possible the whole field of the work of Secondary Schools of both higher and lower grade.

A COURSE of PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY. By M. M. Pattison

MUIR, M.A., Fellow and Prælector in Chemistry of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge. Part I., ELEMENTARY. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. [Next week.]

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.

No. 381, JULY, 1897. 8vo, price 6s.

1. PROSPERITY and POLITICS in ITALY.
2. MODERN MOUNTAINEERING.
3. TWO RECENT ASTRONOMERS.
4. CAPTAIN MAHAN'S "LIFE OF NELSON."
5. THE COMMONS and COMMON FIELDS of ENGLAND.
6. CHARLES WILLIAM FERDINAND, DUKE of BRUNSWICK.
7. INSTINCT in the ANIMAL and VEGETABLE KINGDOMS.
8. THE NATIVE STATES of INDIA.
9. ORIGINS and INTERPRETATIONS of PRIMITIVE RELIGIONS.
10. PUBLIC OPINION and SOUTH AFRICA.

THE ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW.

No. 47, JULY. Royal 8vo, price 5s.

Edited by S. R. GARDINER, D.C.L., LL.D., and REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.

1. Articles.
  - THE TURKS in the SIXTH CENTURY. By Professor BURY, Litt.D.
  - THE ARCHERS at OREOY. By T. E. MORRIS.
  - YORK in the SIXTEENTH and SEVENTEENTH CENTURIES. By Miss MAUD SELLERS.
  - THE DUKE of NEWCASTLE and the ELECTION of 1734. By BASIL WILLIAMS.
2. Notes and Documents.—3. Reviews of Books.—4. Notices of Periodicals.—5. List of Recent Historical Publications.

LONGMANS, GREEN &amp; CO., London, New York, and Bombay.

CHAPMAN &amp; HALL'S PUBLICATIONS.

THE DOLMENS of IRELAND. Their

Distribution, Structural Characteristics, and Affinities in Foreign Countries; together with the Folklore attaching to them, with Plans and Illustrations, and an Introduction dealing with the Anthropology of the Irish Race. By WILLIAM COPELAND BORLASE, M.A., Vice-President of the Society of Antiquaries of London. With 4 Maps, 800 Illustrations, and 3 Coloured Plates. 3 vols., royal 8vo, 45 s.

The Saturday Review says: "The three volumes form a great contribution to International Science.... Mr. Borlase has reared a mighty tricolour, destined to survive through many generations of scientific work. This splendid work.""A magnificent volume."—The Times.THE NATURALIST in AUSTRALIA.

By W. SAVILLE-KENT, F.L.S., F.Z.S., &amp;c. Past President Royal Society of Queensland. Author of "The Great Barrier Reef of Australia," &amp;c. Illustrated by 50 Full-page Colotypes, 9 Coloured Plates by Keulemans and other artists, and over 100 Illustrations in the Text. Royal 4to, 45 s. net.

The Times says: "It is difficult to speak of the get-up of Mr. Saville-Kent's new book except in words that might seem to savour of extravagance. The paper, the type, and the binding leave nothing to be desired in handsomeness and taste, while the illustrations are perfect specimens of the modern processes employed.... A magnificent volume, the result of many years' intimate acquaintance with the land itself and its surrounding sea."LECTURES on ART. By Sir Edward

J. POYNTER, P.R.A. Fourth Edition, containing New Lectures and a Photogravure Portrait of Author. Large crown 8vo, 5s. [This week.]

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.*LYRICS of LOWLY LIFE. By Paul LAURENCE DUNBAR. With Photogravure Portrait of Author. Small crown 8vo, 5s.The Daily Chronicle says: "They have fluency, facility, a certain initiative grace, and a pleasant enthusiasm for the beauties of nature.... His dialect poems are interesting, and some are really admirable in humour and tenderness.... Sincere, ingenious, charming."THE SONG BOOK of BETHIA HARD-

ACRE. By ELLA FULLER MATTLAND. Author of "Pages from the Day Book of Bethia Hardacre." Large crown 8vo, 6s.

"To read it is like going through an anthology of classic verse.... The book is never without charm."—Sedgemoor.TWO NEW NOVELS.AT ALL NOVELS and BOOKSELLERS.
CAPTAIN KID'S MILLIONS. By ALAN OSCAR. Crown 8vo, 6s."Any properly minded boy could not fail to regard the book as little less than a classic.... A pleasant book and one to be read." Daily Chronicle.THE GIFT of LIFE: a Romance. By JAMES CASSIDY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A somewhat amazing story is this. Its central figure is a scientific doctor who, in a garret, succeeds in wresting from Nature the secret of a lymph inoculation with which he makes mortals immortal." Daily Graphic.

CHAPMAN &amp; HALL, LIMITED, LONDON.

Stevens &amp; Sons' New Law Works.

NOW READY, No. 51 (JULY), price 5s.

Annual Subscription, post free, 12s. 6d.
THE LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW.Edited by Sir FREDERICK POLLOCK, Bart., M.A., LL.
Corpus Professor of Jurisprudence in the University of Oxford.Contents.
NOTES: The Naturalisation of Children—Limit of Guest's Right to Remain at Hotel—Right of Crown to Dismiss Civil Servant—Extraterritorial Recognition of Rights acquired in Foreign Countries—Fraudulent Preference in Bankruptcy—Precautionary Trusts—Damage Caused by Nervous Shock—&c.

COLLISIONS at SEA WHERE BOTH SHIPS are in FAULT: a Reply. By LEAH F. BOOTH.

ON THE STUDY of LAW REPORTS. By SNOWELL ROGERS.

VACUATION on MARRIAGE (TEXT). By F. W. MATTLAND.

LANDOWNERS' LIABILITY to PAY RENTCHARGES in FREE an Argument against the Doctrine of Thomas v. Sylvestre. By T. GRIFFIN WILLIAMS.

HAS SECTION 4 of the SALE of GOODS ACT MADE ANY CHANGE in the LAW? By L. F. CUMMIS (Melbourne).

THE DOCTRINE of LUMLEY v. WAGNER. By ERNEST C. C. FRIER.

ON the CONSIDERATION of the PATENT GRANT, PAST and PRESENT. By E. WYNDHAM HULME.

Now ready, Sixteenth Edition, royal 12mo, cloth, 21s.
ROGERS on REGISTRATION: Parlia- mentary, Municipal, and Local Government; including the Practice in Registration Appeals. With Appendices of Statutes, Orders in Council, and Forms. Sixteenth Edition. By MAURICE POWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"The practitioner will find within these covers everything which he can be expected to know, well arranged and carefully stated." Law Times.Just published, demy 8vo, cloth, 18s.
GORDON'S MONOPOLIES by PATENTS

and the STATUTABLE REMEDIES AVAILABLE to the PUBLIC. By J. W. GORDON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Just published, Second Edition, royal 8vo (1,002 pp.), cloth, 32s.
EDMUNDS on PATENTS. The Law and Practice of Letters Patent for Inventions. By LEWIS EDMUNDS, Esq., Q.C. Second Edition. By T. M. STEVENS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law."The utmost care has evidently been used down to the minutest details to present a full and comprehensive exposition of a very complicated and difficult branch of our jurisprudence."—Law Times.Just published, demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.
BONNER'S LAW of MOTOR CARS. HACKNEY and other CARRIAGES. An Epitome of the Law, Statutes, and Regulations. By G. A. BONNER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.STEVENS & SONS, LIMITED, 119 and 120, Chancery Lane, London.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
A Collection of MSS. ....	43
The History of Comines ....	44
M. Maeterlinck's New Play ....	45
Two War Books ....	46
The Schoolboy Mind ....	47
An Australian Humourist ....	48
Scottish National Sentiment ....	49
THE NATIONAL DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY ....	50
AN OLD PARODY ON WHITMAN ....	50
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ....	51
New Books Received ....	51
NOTES AND NEWS ....	52
ACADEMY PORTRAITS: XXXVI., FRANCIS BACON... ..	53
THE MOTIONS OF THE ILLUSTRIOUS ....	54
PARIS LETTER ....	54
THE BOOK MARKET ....	55
DRAMA ....	56
ART ....	57
OPERA ....	58
SCIENCE ....	58
CORRESPONDENCE ....	59
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ....	33-36

REVIEWS.

A COLLECTION OF MSS.

A Description of the Wordsworth and Coleridge MSS. in the Possession of Mr. T. Norton Longman. With Three Facsimile Reproductions. Edited, with Notes, by W. Hale White. (Longmans & Co.)

AUTHOR and publisher alike must be congratulated on the production of a sumptuous quarto which exhibits them in friendly rivalry, each vying in his efforts—the one worthily to deck forth and enrich with illustrations, the other to augment, condense and verify, the contents. In the get-up of the book liberality is seen hand in hand with good taste; while on its composition has been expended such a measure of patient toil as only a loving interest in the subject could supply. Since the lamented death of Mr. Dykes Campbell it may be doubted whether any other man of letters could have been found in every way so well fitted to carry out Mr. Longman's design as Mr. Hale White; and now that his work is in our hands it may with truth be said to satisfy to the full the expectations of those who understood the special qualifications of the writer.

The documents catalogued by Mr. Hale White are contained in four separately bound parcels. In the first are comprised sixteen—two are missing—of the eighteen sheets on which were written out for the printer (1) the preface, notes, and textual emendations, together with Coleridge's poem of "Love" (intended to replace Wordsworth's "Convict"), of vol. i., and (2) the whole of vol. ii., of the Lyrical Ballads of 1800. (The body of vol. i. is, of course, just a reprint of the original Lyrical Ballads of 1798). The second and third parcels consist of the sheets of this two-volume edition of 1800, with the corrections and additions for the third edition (1802) entered by hand. The fourth parcel contains the MS. "copy" of Wordsworth's "Poems in Two Volumes" of 1807, together with much important matter in verse and prose, including "The Tinker," an entire poem of fifty lines, here printed for the first time. Between the copy and the letterpress of 1807 there are several interesting variations, which are given by the editor. Of these and of the new matter we propose to give some account.

Wordsworth was often taxed by his early critics with the use of imagery which, however striking it might be, lacked, so they alleged, the beauty and dignity befitting verse. "Le style le moins noble a pourtant sa noblesse," they would urge: even in the humblest ballad some standard or principle of selection must be observed. When, for instance, wishing to describe the Highlander's sudden flush of pride at the mention of Rob Roy, Wordsworth wrote that the man's face would "kindle, like a fire new stirred," at the sound of his hero's name; the image of the blaze starting up under the poker was lively enough, no doubt, but, said these judges, sadly wanting in distinction. Again, when, in the summer of 1802, desiring to convey an impression of the solemn hush of evening on Calais beach, he writes—

"The holy time is quiet as a Nun Breathless with adoration!"—

what could be more pregnant, what more noble, than this? But many years before he had recorded a similar impression—the pervading calm of evening twilight in the fields—under a very dissimilar figure indeed: "Calm is all Nature as—a resting wheel!" This is telling, certainly; but, argued the critics aforesaid, hardly congruent with the severe keeping, the uniform level of style and colour, which the very act of metrical composition implies. We who are emancipated from the tyranny of eighteenth century models are less fastidious; indeed, Mr. Hale White somewhere quotes this very line in honorem as a striking instance of Wordsworth's fearless use, in conveying recondite thought, of "the common things that round us lie." Had the text of 1807, however, everywhere strictly followed the MS., the critics of that day would have found far louder call for censure in respect of the imagery employed. In "The Horn of Egremont," for example, Hubert, according to the text, stands "pale and trembling"; in the copy, he stands "pale as ashes." In the (printed) "Solitude of Binnorie" the seven Campbells "run and, with a desperate leap, together plunge into the deep." In the copy, the sisters run "like Mountain Sheep." Again, had Wordsworth in the "Redbreast and Butterfly" stuck throughout to the copy, he would no doubt have escaped a torrent of abuse and derision of which Jeffrey opened the floodgates in the Edinburgh (October, 1807). Here the poet, addressing the Redbreast as "the bird whom, by some name or other, all men who know thee call their brother," observes respecting the Butterfly that "his beautiful wings in crimson are drest, a brother he seems of thine own." Thus the text of 1807. What! exclaims Jeffrey, he hails the robin as the brother of man, the butterfly as the brother of the robin! Quousque tandem, Axiologe, abuteris patientia nostra? (We condense Jeffrey's somewhat diffuse rhetoric.) But what would the homunculus and his train have said had they seen the MS. reading here: "His beautiful wings in crimson are drest, as if he were bone of thy bone"? The stark directness and blunt realism of the language reminds us of the famous lines in the "Descriptive Sketches" (text of 1793):

"Haply the [chamois-hunter's] child in fearful doubt may gaze,
Passing his father's bones in future days;
Start at the reliques of that very thigh [thoi,
Cumbrian]
On which so oft he prattled when a boy."

Not many readers, probably, have noticed the metrical irregularity of the opening stanza of Wordsworth's first address "To the Daisy," and still fewer are aware of the cause:

"In youth from rock to rock I went,
From hill to hill in discontent
Of pleasure high and turbulant,
Most pleased when most uneasy;
But now my own delights I make,
My thirst at every rill can slake,
And gladly Nature's love partake
Of thee, sweet Daisy!"

The sixth line here, we now learn, was an afterthought for the

"To gentle sympathies awake"

of the copy—an afterthought, it will interest the reader to learn, suggested by the second stanza of Drayton's "Nymphidia: The Court of Faerie." There are some folk, says Drayton, who will still be talking of the fairies:

"No tales of them their thirst can slake,
So much delight therein they take,
And some strange thing they fain would make,
Knew they the way to do them."

Wordsworth started writing his verses in the metre of "Nymphidia," but before the first stanza was finished he seems to have changed his mind and forsaken Drayton for Ben Jonson, whose "Eupheme," No. 1, serves as model, in this respect, for the three "Daisy" poems of 1807. The first pendant, or wheel, in Wordsworth's stanza above quoted—"Most pleased," &c.—contains, as the reader will observe, three accents; all the others but two. The wheels in "Nymphidia" (in the stanza of which "The Green Linnet" is written) are all of a length, and contain three accents, those in "Eupheme" but two. William and Dorothy (as we know from her Journal) were studying Ben Jonson during the six weeks, February 11 to March 23, 1802, within, or soon after, which period the "Daisy" poems almost certainly were written. Instances of this stanza are rare. Charles Lamb, who, we may be sure, saw Wordsworth's three poems in MS. on the occasion of his visit to Grasmere in August, 1802, borrowed the measure for the exquisite lines in memory of Hester Savary which he wrote in March 1803; and Landor has used it in "Yes; I write verses now and then," and other pieces. In Wyatt's "Forget not yet" the lines correspond with those of the "Daisy" poems in accent and order, but the stanzas are single ones of four lines, not doublets of eight. Wordsworth is indebted to Drayton for several happy thoughts and phrases. The famous passage describing the rebound of Joanna's laugh from height to height of the Cumberland mountains is borrowed from a passage in the Polyolbion. The Latin motto which appears on the title-page of the "Lyrical Ballads" of 1800—"Quam nihil ad genium, Papiniane, tuum!"—was found in the note prefixed to the Polyolbion by the learned Selden, who furnished the curious illustrations to that work. The pretty lines in "Stray Pleasures"—

"Each leaf, that and this,
Its neighbour will kiss," &c.

—are inspired by ll. 5-8, Nymphal vi., of "The Muses' Elysium":

"The wind had no more strength than this,
That leisurely it blew,
To make one leaf the next to kiss
That closely by it grew."

And—to mention no other instances—the thrilling sonnet, "Vanguard of Liberty! Ye Men of Kent!" was suggested by ll. 323-4, bk. i., of "The Barons' Wars":

"Then those of Kent, unconquered of the rest,
That to this day maintain their ancient right;
For courage no whit second to the best," &c.

"The Affliction of Margaret" (Mary in the copy) was originally prefaced by six decasyllabic couplets, here printed—a sort of preliminary confidence from the poet to the reader, similar to those which precede the "Emigrant Mother" and the "Lover's Lament":

"Oh, move, thou Cottage, from behind that oak!"

Wordsworth was well advised in suppressing this metrical Preface, for, like the forewords referred to, and that intolerable aside which in the editions of 1814 and 1820 of the "Excursion" interrupts the Solitary's description of the atmospheric effects of a storm amidst the mountains, it is egoistic and inartistically effusive. But the opening lines well deserve to be printed, for in them the poet explains the purpose and scope of the poems of 1807:

"This Book, which strives to express in tuneful sound
The joys and sorrows which through life abound,
—Some great, some small, some frequent and some rare,
But all observed or felt, and truly there —"

"Mediation and sympathy," says Mr. Swinburne, "not action and passion, were the two mainstays of Wordsworth's serene and stormless lyre. As the poet of suffering, and of sympathy with suffering, his station is unequalled in its kind."

We must not discount the attractions of this beautiful book by quoting the heretofore unpublished "Tinker." Of small artistic merit, the little poem possesses some importance as illustrating that "reverence for man, that sympathy for him in his primary relations and his essential being, of which," observes Mr. F. W. H. Myers, "Wordsworth's poetry and prose present so many remarkable examples." A word, however, must be added on the photographic reproductions, which include parts of "Ellen Irwin" and "The Brothers" in Dorothy's writing, punctuated by Humphry Davy, an autograph letter to the latter from Wordsworth in the poet's best style of penmanship, the entire poem of "Love" in the author's somewhat boyish hand, and the two opening stanzas of the "Immortality" Ode, copied by Sarah Hutchinson, and revised by Wordsworth. Many interesting questions, into which this is not the place to enter—e.g., how far Coleridge in 1800 concurred with the poetic theories of the Preface—are suggested by these facsimiles. It will be a surprise to many that Wordsworth should have seen fit in a note to the Lyrical Ballads of 1800, which is reprinted by Mr. Hale White, to fall foul of the "Ancient Mariner." Wordsworth's purpose, however, was at least an honest one, whereas that of Southey in his critique of the "Lyrical Ballads" of 1798 was malignant and discreditable. Southey, in the Critical Review of October, 1798, wrote of the "Ancient Mariner" that, viewed as a narrative, it is "absurd or unintelligible. Our readers may exercise their ingenuity in attempting to unriddle what follows." He then quotes ll. 301-322, and proceeds: "We do not sufficiently understand the story to analyse it. It is a Dutch attempt at German sublimity. Genius has here been employed in producing a poem of little merit." What Coleridge felt about Wordsworth's criticism we have no means of knowing; probably he expressed his hearty concurrence with it, for, as Mr. Hale White observes, he was always ready to depreciate his own poetry. But Southey's attack he received with amused scorn, inditing in reply the following lines: "To a critic who extracted a passage from a Poem without adding a word respecting the context, and then derided it as unintelligible":

"Most candid Critic, what if I,
By way of joke, pull out your eye,
And, holding up the fragment, cry
'Ha! Ha! that men such fools should be!
Behold this shapeless Dab!—and he
Who own'd it, fancied it could see!
The joke were mighty analytic,
But—should you like it, candid Critic?"

So absurd was the rumour which represented the three poets—Coleridge, Wordsworth, and Southey—as banded together for the purpose of overthrowing ancient authority, and enforcing a creed and a revelation of their own!

THE HISTORY OF COMINES.

The History of Comines. Englished by Thomas Danett, anno 1596, with an Introduction by Charles Whibley. In 2 vols. "Tudor Translation Series." (David Nutt.)

In 1566 (according to his preface of November 1, 1596) Thomas Danett, a student of Continental history and a past master of the English tongue, rendered into our speech "The Historie of Philip de Commines, Knight, Lord of Argentan," which "rude translation perused anew and enlarged with such notes and pedigrees as seemed necessarie" at the request of Sir Christopher Hatton, was finally, after his death, again examined and corrected and put to the press by certain gentlemen who supposed it "a great dishonour to our nation that so woorthie an historie being extant in all languages almost in Christendom should be suppressed in ours," furnished with a biography and vindication of its author in answer to the accusations "wherewith Jacobus Meyerus, a Flemming, in his Annales of Flanders chargeth verie unjustlie both Commynes' history and his life," and dedicated to the Lord Burleigh.

"Danett's notes and supply of the historie from 1483 to 1493, of all which time Commynes, writes nothing," are as excellent as the pithy, vigorous, and competent style in which he renders the straightforward but classic French of the Lord of Argentan. Mr. Whibley's careful search has not been able to give us more information respecting him than that he put forth in 1593 a "Description of the Low Countries" epitomised from Guicciardini, and in 1600 a "Continuation of the Historie of France from the death of Charles the Eighth, when Comines endeth, till the death of Harry the Second (1559)." We would hope that time and chance may reveal to us more of this industrious and gifted Elizabethan. But at all events his masterpiece is here, well printed and warmly introduced, certainly one of the most useful and delightful of the many noble versions of notable books that the sixteenth century has given us.

As to Commynes himself, it is lawful to dally over him a little. Let us hear his translator first. He esteems him "the wisest and best acquainted with all manners of state of any man in his time," and holds that his life "is to be accounted rightly both honest and virtuous, the discourses wherewith he farceth out his book breathing nothing but virtue and sinceritie, and the book itself confirmed by good testimony and approved by the judgement of the noblest Princes that Europe bred these many hundred yeeres. . . . Wherefore our author's credit standeth upright, as well for good conversations of life as sincere report in historie." He describes him as "a gentleman of a very ancient house, and joined by blood and alliance to the best of that nation. . . . He was of tall stature, faire complexion, and goodly personage. The French toong he spake perfectly and eloquently, the Italian, Duche, and Spanish reasonably well. He had read over verie diligently all histories written in French, especially of the Romaines, and bare them all in memorie. He much acquainted himself with strangers, thereby to increase his knowledge. He had great regard to the spending of his time, and abhorred all idleness. He was of an excellent, yea, an incredible memorie: for he often indited at one time to fower Secretaries, severall letters of waightie affaires appertaining to the state, with as great facilitie and readines, as if he had but one matter in hand. . . . In prosperitie he gave for his posie this sentence: 'He that will not labour let him not eate'; but in adversitie this: 'I sailed into the deepe of the seas, and a sudden tempest overwhelmed me.'"

His monument, set up in the Austin Friars Church at Paris, is now, as is well known, in the government's possession, and gives in fine stern portrayal the images of the knight and his wife.

Philip de Commynes was well justified in undertaking those memoirs on which his fame rests, though it is probable that his practical talents were at least as great as his historical powers. He had experience; he had practised statecraft, as well as written about it; he had known the favour and disfavour of princes and tasted prison fare; he had travelled on his lord's errands, used diplomatic arts, and made his observations at home and abroad. He thought some record of such remembrances as he deemed fit to set down could not be useless to those that were to come after him. He reviewed his life politic as others of his countrymen have reviewed their lives curial or martial. He does not write in vanity, though he is quietly conscious of having assisted at great and pregnant events; and it is his honest pride to have given faithful and efficient help in his degree to the well-devised schemes of so great a master of governance as the French king whose service he had chosen. He attached some importance to the simple theories of life and fate he had gradually and laboriously worked out. But he must not, in spite of his sagacity, be treated as in any way the peer of his mighty contemporary Machiavel, nor, in spite of his downright skill at plain but dignified narrative and his occasional vivid glimpses of reality, can he be compared for skill in telling a story, or, indeed, for interest, to Froissart or Brantôme. He has but little of the Herodotean quality; it is as a Thucydidean he must be judged. Not his the pleasing though childish personality of men like Joinville; nor the zeal or judgment of D'Aubigné or De Thou, albeit he is far more practical than they in his aims and achievement. But in spite of his dryness, his narrowness of view, his obvious reticences, his common-place philosophy, we could ill afford to be without the hard but powerful portrait of his formidable and politic master of which Scott made such good use, or to miss the faithful but abrupt account of many deeds of moment in which the narrator himself took no small part. Commynes is often overpraised, he was not a great historian, he was not a philosopher, he was not a statesman of the first class, as some of his French panegyrists have tried to make out. He is often tiresome for pages, nay, sometimes whole chapters. But how much solid information we should lack concerning both the deeds he beheld and the doers thereof if these memoirs had untimely perished. Above all, we should miss the precious glimpses they give us into the heart and brain of an able Flemish gentleman of the end of the fifteenth century, one familiar with many of the shrewdest spirits of his day. For over Commynes, too, the breath of the Renaissance had passed. He had lost many of the infantile official mediæval beliefs, though he never broke or ever thought of breaking with the Church, or stepped upon the ways in which such as Machiavel boldly walked. He had a distinct idea of constitutional rule; he had a definite view of the importance the true statesman should attach to the raison d'état;

he sought for scientific theories that might interpret the hurly-burly of events and unravel the eternal scheme that lies behind the blind mask of Fate or Fortune. The boyhood of Europe was, indeed, over and its youth begun when to the generation of Valla and Pomponius succeed the generation of Louis IX. and Borgia, of Commynes and Machiavel.

It would be unfair to Danett not to give a few samples of what his happy talent could do in rendering idiomatic French into idiomatic English. Of his chosen hero, King Louis, he writes, following his author:

"Small trust ought meane and poore man to repose in worldly wealth and honours, seeing this mightie King, after so long trouble and travell for the obtaining of them, forsooke them all, and could not prolong his life one hower for all that he could do. I knew him and served him in the flower of his age and in his great prosperitie; yet never saw I him free from toile of bodie and trouble of mind. . . . Sure, in mine opinion, from his childhood till his death he was in continual toile and trouble, so that if all his pleasant and joyfull days were numbred I thinke they should be found but fewe; yea I am fully persuaded that for one pleasant there should be found twentie displeasent."

The motif is old. Henry of Huntingdon and many others had used it, but it is effective and authentic, and by no means least effective in Danett's rendering. The famous character of Duke Charles is thus rendered:

"I had known him in times past a mightie and honorable Prince, as much yea more esteemed and sought to of his neighbours, then any Prince in Christendome. Further, in mine opinion the greatest cause of God's indignation against him, was for that he attributed all his good successe, and all the great victories he obtained in this world, to his owne wisdom and vertue; and not to God, as he ought to have done. And undoubtedly he was endowed with many goodly vertues: for never was Prince more desirous to entertain noblemen, and keepe them in good order than he. His liberalitie seemed not great, because he made all men partakers thereof. Never Prince gave audience more willingly to his servants and subjects than he. While I served him he was not cruell, but grew marvellous cruell towards his end, which was a signe of short life. In his apparell and all other kinde of furniture he was wonderfull pompous, yea somewhat too excessive. He received very honorably all ambassadors and strangers, feasting them sumptuously, and entertaining them with great solemnitie. Covetous he was of glorie, which was the chiefe cause that made him moove so many wars: for he desired to imitate those ancient Princes, whose fame continueth till this present. Lastly, hardy he was and valiant, as any man that lived in his time: but all his great enterprises and attempts ended with himselfe, and turned to his owne losse and dishonor; for the honor goeth ever with the victorie."

So much may suffice, though there are not many lines throughout the two volumes without evident token of Danett's faithfulness and skill. He must, indeed, take rank with the foremost of English translators, for he has fitted himself admirably and exactly to his subject, knowing well that it did not permit or invite amplification by allusion or quaintness of conceit or over-homeliness of idiom, or the pompous opulence of addition that we welcome when used in their appropriate places by Mabbe, North, or Urquhart, his sole worthy compeers.

And so with a thankful feeling toward the devisers and executors of this set of Tudor translations, and with a hope that future volumes may be as well chosen and as well edited as these, we may part for to-day with Danett's Commynes.

F. YORK POWELL.

M. MAETERLINCK'S NEW PLAY.

Aglavaine and Selysette. By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alfred Sutro. With an Introduction by J. W. Mackail. (Grant Richards.)

M. MAETERLINCK's plays are not to be criticised. An attempt may be made to carry his thought a little farther, to expand it, to translate it into not simpler but more easily negotiable terms; but this mystical author is not to be criticised in the ordinary way. He has laws to himself; his philosophy is his own; his methods are his own; and you either believe in them and admire his work or you do not.

One feels that M. Maeterlinck writes nothing that does not give him intense pleasure. His dramas and essays are the expression of his fairest self, they are his most joyous form of play. He seeks recreation by creating another world in which idealised and transfigured human beings may fulfil themselves at his behest. Nothing ugly may happen there. Frustration and sorrow, old age and death, are the lot of all, there as here; but only through frustration and sorrow, M. Maeterlinck holds, can we attain to peace and loveliness of thought and deed, and no way leads so certainly to grief as the way of death. Old age is to him very piteous and plaintive; but he seems to think of it as second childhood, hardly less beautiful than childhood itself; and the old men and women of his plays have caught already some gleam of light from the land they are so soon to enter.

Mr. Mackail, in his luminous preface to this play—quite the wisest words we have read on M. Maeterlinck's genius—compares the Belgian writer with William Morris. Their imaginations certainly are akin; but Mr. Morris, once he had set foot in the fair land of romance where his dreams were laid, became (as, indeed, Mr. Mackail admits) too vivid, too robust, too objective for the analogy to hold. Malory is more akin to the modern mystic. But in seeking for a counterpart to M. Maeterlinck we must go not to literature but to music and art; we must go to Wagner and Sir Edward Burne-Jones. In the last act of "Tristan and Isolde," a shepherd plays a pipe on the ramparts of the castle, where Tristan lies a-dying. Much of M. Maeterlinck, it seems to us, if translated into music, would have just such wistful, melancholy beauty of sound. And were the youth and maiden in the picture "Love among the Ruins" to speak, they would speak as Meleander speaks to Aglavaine and Aglavaine to Meleander. Wagner, Maeterlinck, and Burne-Jones—to all three Beauty and Sorrow come hand in hand.

The surface story of Aglavaine and Selysette is very simple. Meleander and Selysette have been married four years. We find them, when the play opens, living in a castle of the strange Maeterlinck country, when and how we know not. They are happy, but it is not quite the highest happiness. Then comes Aglavaine, whom Meleander has known of old. She is more beautiful than Selysette, and Meleander forgets Selysette in her presence. Neither wishes to wound little Selysette, but what will you when destiny decrees? Aglavaine, pitying Selysette, determines to go away, but Selysette, lifted by grief to heights she knew not of before, is beforehand with her, and dies by her own hand, affirming to the end that she did not intend it, so that the love of Meleander and Aglavaine may blossom unchecked. On the surface, that is the story. But underneath there are lessons for all who can read, and the drama is unfolded with infinite beauty of thought, of word, and of deed, and mastery of dramatic technique. Besides Meleander, Selysette, and Aglavaine, there is Selysette's old grandmother, Meligrane, and Yssaline, Selysette's little sister.

The kernel of the tragedy being Selysette's great decision and the consequent awakening of her soul, let us quote a portion of the scene where Selysette, determined upon leaving the way clear for Meleander and Aglavaine, stands on the ruined tower by the sea with her little sister. She means to throw herself from the top. Yssaline is to prove it was an accident, and Selysette has told Yssaline a story of a wonderful bird that flies round the tower with green wings, "a strange, pale green, inconceivably strange and pale."

SELYSETTE.

Here we are, Yssaline, in the turret of the tower, and now we must know what we have to do. . . . Oh the brightness there is this morning over earth and sea and sky! Why is this day so much more beautiful than other days? . . .

YSSALINE.

Where is the green bird?

SELYSETTE.

He is there, but we cannot see him yet. . . . In a minute or two we will lean over the wall, but let us look around us first. One can see the castle and the courtyard, the woods and the gardens. All the flowers have opened on the water-banks. . . . How green the grass is this morning! . . . I cannot see Aglavaine. . . . Oh, look, there is Meleander. . . . He is waiting for her. . . . Bend down, we must hide; he must not know we are here. . . .

YSSALINE.

Little sister, little sister, look out here. . . . I can see the gardener planting flowers round the house.

SELYSETTE.

You will see them grow and you will see them open, Yssaline, and you will pluck them for me. . . . Come, come, it is more than I can bear. . . . Let us look from here; here there is only the sea, which is far away. . . . [They go to the other side of the tower.] How beautiful the sea is too! In not a single corner is sorrow to be found to-day. . . . The sea is so green, so deep, so beautiful, that one's courage goes. . . .

YSSALINE.

Oh, here are the gulls, little sister; the gulls are coming! Oh, how many there are! . . . how many! There must be two thousand! . . .

SELYSETTE.

They have all flown here together from the far end of the sea. . . . They look as though they were bringing us news.

YSSALINE.

No, no; it is fish they are bringing, little sister. . . . And their young ones are screaming, too, from their holes in the wall. . . . Their beaks are bigger than themselves. . . .

SELYSETTE.

What did I say to grandam, Yssaline?

YSSALINE.

Why are you crying, little sister?

SELYSETTE.

I am not crying, Yssaline—I am thinking, thinking. Did I kiss her before I went away? . . .

YSSALINE.

Yes, you kissed her as you said good-bye.

SELYSETTE.

How often did I kiss her?

YSSALINE.

Once, little sister, we had no time. . . .

SELYSETTE.

I fear I was not gentle enough.

YSSALINE.

We were in a great hurry, little sister.

SELYSETTE.

No, no; it must not be. . . . She will be quite alone, Yssaline, and this will ever linger in her mind. You see, if you have not been gentler than usual when you go away, they believe that you no longer love them. Whereas it is the contrary that they should believe; it is just when our love is too great that we are afraid to be gentle. . . . Though perhaps we are wrong; for whatever they do, and were they to live a thousand years, it is only the last word we said to them that they can remember. I saw that myself when my mother went. . . . At the last moment of all she did not smile at me, and it comes back to me again and again that she did not smile. . . . And the rest of life scarcely seems to count.

The skill of the dramatist in the foregoing passage could hardly be over praised. M. Maeterlinck can always, by sheer power of suggestion, compel everything to contribute to his desired effect, everything, animate and inanimate alike. Herein is a triumph of imagination over invention.

The book is a treasury of beautiful things. No one now writing loves beauty as M. Maeterlinck does. Sheer, essential beauty has no such lover. He will have nothing else. Gentleness, sweet reasonableness, patience, resignation under grief, self-sacrifice: the old beatitudes of the Evangelists are his too. Into the world which he has created no harshness may enter, no acerbity, no conscious pettiness; nothing, indeed, but beautiful thoughts, beautiful words, beautiful actions, and beautiful mistakes for which he has endless pity and charity. His names are sheer beauty: Pelleas and Melisanda; Aglavaine and Selysette; Meligrane and Yssaline—wistful, harmonious words.

Another quotation or two and we must end. Aglavaine is thus described by Meleander:

She is like no other woman. . . . Her beauty is different, that is all. . . . stranger and more ethereal; it is never the same—one might almost say it was more manifold. . . . it is a beauty along which the soul can pass unhindered. . . . and her hair is very strange. . . . You will see. . . . It seems to take part in everyone of her thoughts. . . . As she is happy or sad so does her hair smile or weep, and this even at times when she herself scarcely knows whether she should be happy or whether she should be sad. . . . I have never seen hair so full of life.

And this is Aglavaine's very wonderful declaration of love:

I go in search of myself, and it is in you that I am to be found: I seek you and discover you within myself. . . . Neither our hands, nor our souls, nor our lips seem to exist apart. . . . I can no longer tell whether you are the radiance of me or whether I am beaming your light. . . . So strangely does all blend within us that it is impossible to discover where the one begins and the other leaves off. . . . Your least gesture reveals me to myself; there is not a smile, not a silence, not a word that comes from you but links me to a newer being. . . . I feel that I flower in you as you flower in me; and we are ever springing to birth again in each other.

M. Maeterlinck gives us much of this half-uttered mysticism. He whispers his innermost convictions. One must read him very vigilantly. "Look you, Selysette," says Aglavaine, "by dint of hiding from others the self that is within us, we may end by being unable to find it ourselves." And Meleander, justifying her love for Aglavaine, says: "Our love lies far above ourselves, Selysette; there where we love each other we are pure and beautiful." "It is only when two people are alone together," says Aglavaine, "that truth descends from its very fairest heaven." And again: "So long as we know not what it opens nothing can be more beautiful than a key." These are notable sayings, and Mr. Sutro, the translator, has preserved their individuality with much skill.

TWO WAR BOOKS.

War and a Wheel. By Wilfred Pollock. (Chatto & Windus.)

NOWADAYS the war correspondent reaps a double harvest. He draws the pay of an ambassador while upon the warpath, and makes a book to his profit as soon as he gets back to London. With others who have followed the fortunes and misfortunes of the Turks and the Greeks in the late war, Mr. Wilfred Pollock has put forth his experiences in book form, and the result is a most engaging little work. Mr. Pollock was, in the body, upon the side of the Greeks; but circumstances seem to have forbidden him to take a very favourable view of the fighting capacity of the Hellenic forces. "Except for General Smolenski's dignified stand for some days at Velesino," writes Mr. Pollock in "Some Notes on the Greek Army," "it was merely a discreditable retreat of the Greeks from one magnificent position to the other." One telegram of Mr. Pollock's, which apparently never got through the Athenian censure, sums up the whole campaign; it was sent after a journey towards Domoko, and contains this pregnant passage: "Immediately afterwards met Crown Prince and staff. Army apparently following."

But by this time we are fairly well acquainted with this campaign, in which the Greeks never saw the colour of their enemy's eyes. You will read with interest Mr. Pollock's encounters with Greek officers, peasants, journalists, and such like ordinary things, but you will be chiefly interested in his bicycle, the first of its kind to carry a man safely through a war. It did not claim to be a first-rate bicycle, but it did its duty; it bumped its way over ploughed fields, over the rocky passes of Thessaly, and up the cobbled roadway of Thebes, with never a puncture in its ragged tyres. Moreover, it enabled its rider to pass all the other correspondents on horse and in carriages, catch the steamer at Volo, and wire the news of the Larissa panic in time for the Morning Post to get well ahead of any other newspaper in the world. We have not space to quote the admirable account of that admirable ride—on a broken saddle too.

The bicycle, furthermore, faced unflinchingly the bullets of the "Great Assassin," to say nothing of its rider. Mr. Pollock did a spin of a mile or two in the direction of the Turks to see how they were getting on. He was not much surprised, he writes,

"to see the spit of a bullet in the dust of the road some forty yards in front of me. The report, a second or two later, showed me that the shot had been fired from the lofty slopes of the 'Dog's Head' on my right. As I looked up I saw the white puffs of half-a-dozen more rifles, and, after a few seconds' pause, heard the whistles of the approaching bullets. It was evident that the Turkish outposts on these mountains looked upon me as an interesting mark, long though the range was—certainly at least twelve hundred yards. The track was too narrow for turning round without dismounting, so I got off, and it occurred to me to wave a white handkerchief to see if it would have any effect. It merely drew a whistling volley, two bullets of which fell into the dust of the road within a foot of each other, and not ten feet from my front wheel. So I quickly remounted, and in a few instants was in rapid retreat. The Turkish soldiers, probably Albanians, had now fully entered into the fun of the thing, and for the two miles back to the fountain—in time, perhaps, six minutes—I had to run the gauntlet. Considering the big range the practice was by no means bad. Their sharpshooters were lining the hills, and no doubt every man among them had a pot-shot or two at the unlucky 'scorcher' within their line of fire. I was not at all sorry to regain the shelter of the solid marble fountain, and pause a minute or two for a drink of water and a mouthful of brandy."

War correspondents who are also cyclists should be popular with newspaper proprietors: they save expense. On another occasion there was a race between correspondents to Athens, and the bicycle won again. The others had to depend on and pay for carriages, trains, and steamers. One of them ran into 400 drachmas. Mr. Pollock's employer was the poorer by a couple of drachmas for his correspondent's breakfast, and got his news first.

Altogether, War and a Wheel is a charming little book of stirring experience, and is well worth the shilling it costs; it has, moreover, its modesty and its literary skill to recommend it.

With the Turkish Army in Thessaly. By Clive Bigham. (Macmillan & Co.)

MR. CLIVE BIGHAM, who acted as The Times correspondent in the recent war, briefly tells its story in this unpretentious little volume. If his accounts of the actual fighting add little to our knowledge, he is able to tell us much that is of value as to the general condition of the Turkish army as a fighting force. He draws a sharp contrast between that army as it might be, and that army as it is. Potentially the finest military machine in the world, in fact it was barely mobile. And led by a commander who understood that he was to be victorious, but not too victorious, who knew that even a trivial defeat would be fatal to him, but not more fatal than a splendid success, the Turkish troops were just thrown at the face of the foe wherever they could be got to stand.

"The Turks' tactics, as far as they had any, were to bang away at the enemy till they beat him. On one or two occasions some elementary movements, such as flank attacks, and once an envelopment were evolved from the commander's brains, but they never got much further and had little result to show."

Edhem Pasha never followed up an advantage, or pressed a pursuit, unwilling to risk a check of any sort, and calmly confident of the ability of his men to turn the Greeks out of their entrenchments at any time. This slowness to take advantage of success is attributed also in part to the necessity imposed upon the Commander-in-Chief of supervising every movement of his subordinates. Mr. Bigham says that with the exception of Edhem Pasha's immediate staff there were not twenty officers in the whole army which conquered Thessaly who could talk French or who had more than a most elementary military training. The bulk of the regimental officers were either poor Turkish gentlemen or else men who, through long service, had risen from the ranks, and these "were very like sergeants in their ideas and methods." But what did these things matter when the men who drove the bayonets and faced the guns were without fear? Over and over again the correspondent breaks out into expressions of astonished admiration at the way in which the Turks would advance in unhesitating and unwavering line in the teeth of the most murderous fire. The Greeks, on the other hand, are credited with courage of the defensive kind—"behind entrenchments they were excellent, but when it became a question of charging they appeared to lose their nerve." Mr. Bigham bears emphatic testimony to the strict discipline maintained by the Turks while he was in Thessaly.

In some quarters the success of the invaders has been freely attributed to the presence of German officers in their ranks. The Sultan's forces had certainly been largely organised upon the German system, and at different times Prussian officers had served on the general staff; but, as a matter of fact, only one German officer was present during the campaign. Grumbkov Pasha, Inspector-General of Artillery, was at the front for six days, and superintended the occupation of Larissa. A German military attaché (Captain von Morgen) is said to have been much in Edhem Pasha's confidence; but whether advice was asked or taken matters little—the war was not won by strategy. Mr. Bigham seems to think the Greek fleet might have done more if it had been more energetically handled. Its existence secured free transit upon the sea. It so fulfilled its true function, and as it was incapable of landing any considerable force, no other achievement could have had any lasting results.

THE SCHOOLBOY MIND.

Some Observations of a Foster-parent. By John Charles Tarver. (Constable & Co.)

MR. TARVER has been an active schoolmaster, and is now an active journalist. But his interest in school life has, doubtless, the keenness and lastingness of a first love. Indeed, his eager and approving critique of Bouvard and Pécuchet, in his well-known study of Gustave Flaubert, might have led us to expect that Mr. Tarver would one day have his own fling at prevailing theories of education. He has it in this book, in which, taking Tommy as the typical schoolboy, and Tommy's parents as typical parents, he shows us what kind of a time the schoolmaster has between them.

Mr. Tarver pities the British schoolmaster from the bottom of his heart. He can only see him ridiculed in literature from Aristophanes to Dickens, disesteemed by parents, who grudge to pay his bill, and insulted by Governments, who assume that he will prove incompetent to do his own work. To be sure, the schoolmaster is loved by his old pupils, but only, Mr. Tarver thinks, as a man and a foster-parent. As a schoolmaster he is contemned right through. The contradiction is seen even at reunions like the Eton and Harrow match. The Old Boys

"do not on these occasions seek out their former teachers and abuse or rend them; they shake hands with them, and discourse pleasantly of old times and friends; then they go back to the House of Commons, and assist in the passing of laws, which, alike by omission and commission, condemn the schoolmaster as an imbecile or a thief."

It is easy to understand such bitterness in a mind imbued with the conviction that almost all the education now being thrust on young England aims to cram Tommy, not to train him. This is Mr. Tarver's ceaseless cry; it is far from new, but Mr. Tarver certainly utters it with a new and penetrating accent. He must be credited, too, with knowing the mind of Tommy. Indeed, if for nothing else, his book should be read for its insight into that mysterious psychological region. Mr. Tarver knows both Tommy and Tommy's parents; and he has much the greater respect for Tommy. His case is that Tommy's parents know just enough about education to be ignorant of their ignorance. They will not share Tommy's training with the schoolmaster by sending him to a day school; they will be rid of him at all costs, but they have not faith or logic enough to trust the boarding-school foster-parent they have chosen for him:

"The mother or father of half a dozen children is usually prepared at a moment's notice to dictate to a person who has brought up several hundred children, and even to rush into print with brand new theories of education. Alike in private and in public, the ordinary citizen habitually tells the teacher his business, because we all know just enough of teaching not to know that we know nothing about it at all. The schoolmaster being thus always under tutelage, and unable to prescribe the conditions of his work, is subject to failure through no fault of his own. He most commonly is obliged to abandon methods which he knows to be sound in favour of processes which are totally unsound at the dictation of a governing body or a board of examiners, or pressure from parents; he is frequently required to teach subjects under conditions which render the effective teaching of those subjects impossible, or to abandon systems of moral or physical training which he knows to be of the highest value, because some amateur has been to Sweden or Germany."

One reason why Tommy's parents prove themselves educational marplots is that they do not, in Mr. Tarver's opinion, perceive the laws of Tommy's development. They do not understand his difficulties, which, after all, are different from their own. Tommy has a much severer race to run, and less time to do it in, than they had. They think, among other things, that Tommy ought very quickly to learn to read, write, and do sums. Mr. Tarver lays it down that the difficulties of reading, writing, and doing sums are universally underrated, and he does not hesitate to twit the adult reader, who does not practise these arts professionally, with his weakness in all three. "The so-called elements are not elementary at all," and in two interesting chapters Mr. Tarver seeks to show that Tommy's poor reading and spelling are due far more to defects in his sight and hearing than to his carelessness; while as for the power of calculation it is almost as much a special gift, and its absence almost as forgivable a defect, as the power to recognise and produce notes of music. Then, again, Tommy's parents are incorrigibly set on having results shown to them, instead of looking deeper and discovering a general development.

"It is," says Mr. Tarver, "impossible to dazzle a parent or the governor of a school by a display of Tommy grappling with the difficulties of a Latin exercise; but much honour may be gained by putting him on a platform spouting Shakespeare in studied attitudes."

In short, the show demanded of him compels Tommy to cultivate a rote memory as distinct from a record memory, to remember words rather than facts. What makes matters worse is that Tommy refuses to reason for himself, and "he has very little sensitiveness to inconsistency of statements. He will gravely tell you in the same breath that Edward the Black Prince was the son of Edward III., and that his father's name was Richard II., and that there are twelve inches in a foot, and that a foot is twenty-two inches long."

What, then, is Mr. Tarver's prescription for Tommy? It is a very old one; but we have rarely met with a better, because saner, defence of Latin, as a teaching instrument, than Mr. Tarver's. He makes the excellent point that this language puts nearly as much strain on Tommy's teacher as on Tommy:

"Nobody who has not been through it can picture to himself the skill and the patience which are demanded in the process of giving an ordinary English boy a sound grasp of Latin. It is really very little less than putting him into full possession of his intellectual faculties, always excepting the mathematical faculty."

The argument that Latin is itself of little use to the average man in later life is one which Mr. Tarver has answered in his chapter on "The Limited Power of Education." It is impossible to discuss, what Mr. Tarver himself does not discuss, the means by which a system of cramming can be converted into a system of training. Our own hope is that the faults of our present educational system are peculiar to the time, and will be eliminated. The prodigiousness of the educational movement which began in 1870 must be borne in mind. We have secured quantity and uniformity. If quality and flexibility have been temporarily excluded we may be confident that they will be recalled in proportion as their absence is noted and lamented. Mr. Tarver's protest is itself an augury of returning wisdom.

AN AUSTRALIAN HUMORIST.

While the Billy Boils. By Henry Lawson. (Simpkin, Marshall & Co.)

CONCRETE facts about Colonial life were never likely to be read with more eagerness than just now. The old country has been doing her best to prove that the Colonies lie very near her heart, and any authentic records of our cousins over sea should find readers. Besides, we are so tired of the globe-trotter stuff that is not authentic. A little book of honest, direct, sympathetic, humorous writing about Australia from within is worth a library of travellers' tales; and such a little book is While the Billy Boils, by Mr. Henry Lawson, a collection of sketches and stories brought together from a number of Australian papers. We have, of course, Rolf Boldrewood's stories of bush life, we have Mr. Beake's vivid glimpses of Sydney, and we have the Sydney beach of The Ebb Tide; but Mr. Lawson's passion for unadorned veracity, and his genuine feeling for character, make him more trustworthy.

It is not, of course, of Australian city life that he tells—you gather that from his title—Mr. Lawson writes of the Wallaby track, of swagmen and landowners, of squatters and shearers. He shows us what living in the bush really means. By force of sketch, dialogue, story and yarn, he brings before us the Bohemians and wastrels of that vast island: their humour, their way of thought, their vocabulary, their comradeship. The result is a real book, a book in a hundred.

Mr. Lawson deals with honest men and rogues indiscriminately. Such a rogue as Steelman—such a spieler, as they would say in the bush—is worth remembering. You put him in your portrait gallery beside the Duke of Bilgewater and the Dolphin of France, in Huckleberry Finn. These are Steelman's instructions to a mate on the outskirts of a New Zealand township, delivered with emphasis before painting hectic spots on his cheeks:

"Remember, they're Scotch up at that house. You understand the Scotch barrack pretty well by now—if you don't, it ain't my fault. You were born in Aberdeen, but came out too young to remember much about the town. Your father's dead. You ran away to sea and came out in the Bobbie Burns to Sydney. Your poor old mother's in Aberdeen now—Bruce or Wallace Wynd will do. Your mother might be dead now—poor old soul!—any way, you'll never see her again. You wish you'd never run away from home. You wish you'd been a better son to your poor old mother; you wish you'd written to her and answered her last letter. You only want to live long enough to write home and ask for forgiveness and a blessing before you die. If you had a drop of spirits of some sort to brace you up you might get along the road better. (Put this delicately.) Get the whine out of your voice, and breathe with a wheeze—like this; get up the nearest approach to a death-rattle that you can. Move as if you were badly hurt in your wind—like this. (If you don't do it better'n that, I'll stonch you.) Make your face a bit longer and keep your lips dry—don't lick them, you damned fool!—breathe on them; make 'em dry as chips. That's the only decent pair of breeks you've got, and the only 'shoon.' You're a Presbyterian—not a U.P., the Auld Kirk. Your mate would have come up to the house, only—well, you'll have to use the stuffing in your head a bit; you can't expect me to do all the brain work. Remember it's consumption you've got—galloping consumption; you know all the symptoms—pain on top of your right lung, bad cough, and night-sweats. Something tells you that you won't see the new year—it's a week off Christmas now. And if you come back without anything, I'll blessed soon put you out of your misery."

Mr. Lawson has gone direct to facts. He does nothing himself but arrange and present; that done, he stands aside. You cannot gather his own opinion on anything. His feeling for style in his own person is poor, but when he makes another speak, his language is terse, supple, and richly idiomatic. He can tell a yarn with the best. One thinks naturally of Bret Harte when seeking a comparison; but the two men have little in common beyond a similarity of subject-matter. Both are concerned with rough and ready pioneers and struggle-for-lifers; but the Californian writer thinks of the story before anything else, the Australian of the human document.

Yet there are one or two stories in While the Billy Boils worthy to rank with the best of Bret Harte's. "Macquarie's Mate," for example, is not less admirable than "Tennessee's Partner." Here is the end of a vivid character sketch called "The Drover's Wife." She lives in the bush, nineteen miles from anywhere; her husband is away; she has four children; a snake has crawled under the house during the day, and the family have gone to the annexe kitchen for safety. The four children are asleep on the table; the mother, with a stick to her hand, and Alligator, the dog, watch for the enemy. Mr. Lawson makes the woman's thoughts reveal herself to you as she sits there, until by the time the climax is sighted you know her as you know yourselves. Here is the end:

"It must be near daylight now. The room is very close, hot because of the fire. Alligator still watches the wall from time to time. Suddenly he becomes greatly interested; he draws himself a few inches nearer the partition, and a thrill runs through his body. The hair on the back of his neck begins to bristle, and the battle light is in his yellow eyes. She knows what this means, and lays her hand on the stick. The lower end of one of the partition slabs has a large crack on both sides. An evil pair of small, bright, bead-like eyes glisten at one of these holes. The snake—a black one—comes slowly out about a foot, and moves its head up and down. The dog lies still, and the woman sits as one fascinated. The snake comes out a foot further. She lifts her stick, and the reptile, as though suddenly aware of danger, sticks his head in through the crack on the other side of the slab, and hurries to get his tail round after him. Alligator springs, and his jaws come together with a snap. He misses this time, for his nose is large, and the snake's body close down in the angle formed by the slabs and the floor. He snaps again as the tail comes round. He has the snake now, and tugs it out eighteen inches. Thud, thud, comes the woman's club on the ground. Alligator pulls again. Thud, thud. Alligator pulls some more. He has the snake out now—a black brute, five feet long. The head rises to dart about, but the dog has the enemy close to the neck. He is a big, heavy dog, but quick as a terrier. He shakes the snake as though he felt the original curse in common with mankind. The eldest boy wakes up, seizes his stick, and tries to get out of bed, but his mother forces him back with a grip of iron. Thud, thud—the snake's back is broken in several places. Thud, thud—its head is crushed, and Alligator's nose skinned again.

"She lifts the mangled reptile on the point of her stick, carries it to the fire, and throws it in; then piles on the wood, and watches the snake burn. The boy and dog watch too. She lays her hand on the dog's head, and all the fierce, angry light dies out of his yellow eyes. The younger children are quieted, and presently go to sleep. The dirty-legged boy stands for a moment, in his shirt, watching the fire. Presently he looks up at her, sees the tears in her eyes, and, throwing his arms round her neck, exclaims:

"Mother, I won't never go drovin'; blast me if I do!"

"And she hugs him to her worn-out breast and kisses him; and they sit thus together while the sickly daylight breaks over the bush."

While the Billy Boils can be recommended to every one who likes full-blooded, man-to-man writing. And reciters in want of new material should look at "His Country—After All," and "That there Dog o' Mine."

SCOTTISH NATIONAL SENTIMENT.

The Early History of the Scottish Union Question. By G. W. T. Omond. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

WHAT is the explanation of the old Scots' sentiment towards England, which has added so much to the romance of history? The mere annals of events teach us much. The temporary subjection of the land by Edward I. and its hard-fought battle for freedom under Bruce gave the foundation for the hostility of centuries. Through the reign of the Scots Jameses a bitter warfare was kept up on the Border hills, till Flodden and Solway Moss played havoc with the best strength of the North. Then come attempts at a union by marriage—the marriage of the young Queen Mary to the son of Henry VIII.—and though the Scots would have none of the proposal, Somerset pressed it hard, offering even that the name of England should be abolished and "the indifferent old name of Britain taken again." But Mary married the Dauphin, and the friends of union sought a new alliance between Elizabeth and the young Earl of Arran, who, as successor to the dukedom of Chatelherault, was heir-presumptive to the throne of Scotland. How near the country came to being ruled by a dynasty of Hamiltons instead of Stuarts we see from the correspondence of the time. But the negotiations were broken off, the Scots took it as an insult, and Mary, in spite of her Romish leanings, was welcomed gladly to her own land. The doleful events of her reign, culminating in the tragedy of Fotheringhay, did not tend to soften international jealousy. "The manner of her trial and condemnation," says Mr. Omond, "was regarded as a national affront; and when the Estates met in July, 1587, the peers offered to give their lives and fortunes to avenge the fate of their Queen."

But behold the whirligig of history! James of Scotland succeeds to the English throne, the crowns are united, and the centre of national life for the North as well as the South is officially in London. The Edinburgh merchants were ruined; many of the nobles by their departure still further impoverished an already poor country; and, to crown all, the ancient palace of Holyrood was dismantled, and nothing remained in the royal apartments but some stray pieces of furniture and some yards of faded tapestry. And now the problem became more difficult, for the Scots grievances are inflicted by kings of their own race, against whom there is no appeal. They are hated by their Southern neighbours, their commerce is crippled, and their best men leave them. A Francis Bacon might talk of them as "a people in their capacities and undertakings ingenious, in labour industrious, in courage valiant, in body hard, active, and comely"; but the ordinary English attitude towards the land and its inhabitants was that of the nameless satirist, who declared that

"as for fruits, for their grandam Eve's sake they never planted any, and for other trees, had Christ been betrayed in this country, as doubtless He should have been had He come as a stranger amongst them, Judas had sooner found the grace of repentance than one tree to hang himself on."

Then came the quarrel about the establishment of Episcopacy, which stiffened the back of a folk never remarkable for complaisance. The clique of Presbyterian lords led by Argyle in no way helped to improve the condition of the people; and it is possible to see in Montrose a democratic reformer, a champion of the proletariat against an aristocracy.

With the Commonwealth we find attempts at a real union based upon equal advantages. The end was admirable, but the methods and the men who used them were bad, and we find the same unconquerable distrust of the Englishman defeating all proposals. Lord Broghill, a son of Lord Cork, was a member of the Council of State, and his non-English birth seems to have gained him popularity. "He has won," Baillie writes, "more on the affections of the people than all the English that ever were among us." Scots commerce momentarily revived, only to be ruined once more at the Restoration. Indeed, the means employed by the Government of Charles II. seem to have been designed with infinite art to exasperate and ruin a people. Trade was hampered in every conceivable way, and penalties on the Presbyterian religion made the feeling in Scotland rise to fever point. But with the coming of William the old question of complete union was revived again. Statesmen on both sides saw that only thus could a source of strength be made out of what was a dangerous weakness. The Scots spirit had attempted of itself to right the national wrongs by various commercial schemes, and a patriotic party had arisen, composed of Hamilton, Tweeddale, Rothes, Roxburghe, and Fletcher of Saltoun (whose Life by Mr. Omond we lately reviewed in these columns)—a party which aimed at the creation of Scotland into a semi-republican form of government distinct from its neighbour. It was the growth of such a party, as well as the growing peril from the northern Jacobites, which forced English statesmen to advocate the Union or endure a dangerous civil war.

Such is the historical account of the relations which gave rise to the sentiment—a narrative of the disadvantages which a poor, proud, and ill-advised people suffered in its contest with a richer nation. But in addition there was another feeling—half-national, half-racial—which a people dwelling in a different air and very different natural surroundings, who were in great part of different blood, and whose whole traditions were those of struggling against odds, of poverty, pride, and fierce love of country, entertained towards a great alien nation, rich, unknown, settled upon its lees. The sentiment runs all through Scots history, and it is altogether apart from any hostility aroused by definite wrongs.

Mr. Omond's book is a handy summary of the history of such international relations, written with an orderly method and much clearness and good sense. Well printed and well bound, it is an excellent contribution to the literature of the subject.

THE NATIONAL DICTIONARY OF BIOGRAPHY.

A TALK WITH MR. SIDNEY LEE.

I FOUND Mr. Sidney Lee at the offices of the Dictionary in Waterloo-place, and after congratulating him on the event of last week, I said: "Will you allow me, Mr. Lee, to run over the story of the Dictionary with you in question and answer?"

"Certainly. What is your first question?"

"The idea of the Dictionary—did it not originate with Mr. George Smith?"

"Yes; that is so. But Mr. Smith first thought of a universal biographical dictionary. It was Mr. Leslie Stephen, I think, who advised him that this was too magnificent a scheme."

"And so its scope was made British?"

"Oh, more than that! It is English, Scottish, Irish, and Colonial; and I may say that we have been scrupulously careful to see that Scottish, Irish, and Colonial biography should be fairly represented."

"Mr. Leslie Stephen was the first editor?"

"Yes, and he remained sole editor until our twenty-first volume was published. I had the honour of assisting him as sub-editor in the very early stages of the undertaking. We were at work two years before a line of the Dictionary was published."

"I suppose you were fixing the form of the whole work?"

"Well, yes; but we were going ahead with it. We set ourselves an ideal of punctuality, and the way to realise it seemed to be to be always well in advance of our publishing day. The publishers decided to issue a volume every quarter-day. We have since published fifty-one volumes on fifty-one quarter-days. We have never been late. That is a record of which we are naturally proud."

"You must have used the utmost method!"

"We had an elaborate machinery for commissioning authors to write articles and to get the articles into our hands. Every article was ordered for a certain date."

"And if it didn't come, you wanted to know why?"

"Yes, and we always left a margin of time in which to secure another article if, for any reason, that were necessary. But, as a rule, our writers were most punctual."

"At this moment, Mr. Lee, your work inside the office must be far ahead of what is published?"

"Oh, yes. I have allotted every article to the end of Z."

"And how many more volumes will take us there?"

"Nine. The sixtieth and last volume is due, I think you will find, in September, 1899."

"The 'T' volume will include Lord Tennyson, of course?"

"Yes; Canon Ainger has undertaken his life. James Watt, I may tell you, is in the hands of Sir Frederick Bramwell, and Wordsworth has gone to Mr. Leslie Stephen."

"I suppose verification of facts and dates has been a great part of your work?"

"It has; but the first thing has been to choose a writer whose facts and dates could be trusted; to find the right man, and then watch him, has been the editorial task."

"You have employed many lady-writers. How have you been served by them?"

"Capitally. They have been most industrious, and in some cases their knowledge has proved most exhaustive."

"I am not asking my questions in the best order, Mr. Lee; but how did you compile and decide on the names to be included in any given volume?"

"We examined, as a matter of course, all existing biographical dictionaries. We searched the obituaries in the Gentleman's Magazine and in many newspapers, and we received suggestions from the public. When we had a list to which we could add nothing ourselves we published it, and asked a still wider public to supply omissions."

"And did this result in many suggestions?"

"Oh, yes, from the descendants of people omitted. We had often great pressure put upon us by well-meaning people with an enthusiasm for their ancestors' memories. Unfortunately, our estimate and theirs of a given individual's career were apt to differ."

"Now, as to the ideal article you aimed to obtain, Mr. Lee?"

"Well, you know that Mr. Leslie Stephen wrote the life of Addison as the model. We used to send it to early contributors in pamphlet form, but this became unnecessary as the work proceeded. What we wanted was a succinct, exhaustive, and intelligent statement of the facts of a man's life, divested of every taint of partiality. We wanted only a minimum of criticism. One of my printed instructions is this: 'No inventory of domestic virtues should be attempted.'"

"Did you, in allotting an article, give the writer a limit of length?"

"Not always. But I preached brevity in and out of season. I suppose I cannot claim to have practised it, for I must admit that the article on Shakespeare which I wrote for the last volume is far the longest in the Dictionary."

"Well, it ought to be. Is there any likelihood, Mr. Lee, that it will be given to the public in a separate form? It would make a nice little book."

"That I cannot say. But it would not make a very little book. The article contains 45,000 words."

"I suppose you look upon some articles in the Dictionary with special pride?"

"Naturally. In many cases the lives in the Dictionary contain new matter. The Life of Cardinal Pole is a case in point. The Life of Lord Halifax, who comes, like other peers, under his family name of George Savile, is another. Lord Halifax's part in the revolution which seated William and Mary on the throne has been much overlooked, except by Macaulay. The Dictionary Life of Halifax, containing as it does new facts and a new estimate of the man, is distinctly valuable. Then Prof. Jebb's Life of Porson and Mr. Firth's Life of Edward Hyde, Lord Clarendon, are strikingly careful and elaborate. Sir Edward Fry's Life of John Selden is equally so. But really I cannot in a moment recollect the more striking biographies; and where so many have been excellent it is, perhaps, invidious to select. But I should like to mention the Life of Charles Stuart Parnell. For obvious reasons it presented many difficulties. Ultimately it was decided to entrust various sections of his career to various hands, and I am glad to say that the result justified this plan. We can point to that article as showing what strenuous efforts have been made to secure impartiality."

"You must have found your work very interesting, if very arduous, Mr. Lee?"

"Yes; and its variety has been not its least charm. To be considering one day where Priestley stood in Chemistry, and the next day where Pusey stood in Theology, has been an education in mental flexibility."

AN OLD PARODY ON WHITMAN.

Books about Walt Whitman seem numerous just now. In one, entitled Walt Whitman the Man, which is announced by Messrs. Gay & Bird, there will appear a facsimile of an unpublished letter from Tennyson to Whitman. In it Tennyson refers to his son Lionel's marriage in Westminster Abbey to the daughter of the late Frederick Locker-Lampson. He also says: "Trübner wrote me this morning, stating that you wished to have a parody of yourself, which appeared among other parodies of modern authors in a paper called London. I have not a copy of it, otherwise I would send it you." This parody turns out to be one of four or five in which the wedding in the Abbey was supposed to be treated by various hands, namely: Whitman, Browning, William Morris, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Austin Dobson. They were the work of a hand that is still active, although insufficiently active, among us. Here is the skit on Whitman:

"1. This is a wedding. All right, then! I'm on it. Three cheers and a tiger!"

"2. (Marriage is not my game, but you mustn't take notice of that, I'm here because I'm everywhere.)"

"3. The parson goes for his glasses. I reckon he judges them misty. (Bully for you, old man! I guess it's a tear that you're wiping!)"

"4. I am the bride and the bridegroom. I know all about it much better than they do."

"5. I fumble with him for the ring, and blush with her while he's finding it."

"6. His boots are pinching me awful, and the thought of her back hair o'ercomes me!"

"7. My heart gives great throbs to his waistcoat, and I feel with her that someone has trodden on my frock and busted the gathers."

"8. I am here though you do not see me. I hear the organ rolling, the people susurrating, the feet shuffling, the silk sibillating, the boys laughing, the girls tittering, the old maids telling them they ought to be ashamed of it, the shoeblacks cheering, the corks popping, the comic man making speeches, the bride weeping, the page kissing the housemaid below stairs, the rice rattling on the carriage roof, the groan the bridegroom gives as a slipper better aimed than the rest strikes him on the nose and makes him see a hundred thousand candles."

"9. I hear, I see, I feel it all, I am Walt Whitman. I guess I know all about it."

Did Whitman ever see this?

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

Le Journal de Liliane. Par Comte à Wodzinaki. (Calmann Lévy : Paris.)

When a Pole writes a story in French about an Englishwoman the results of the international complication are remarkable.

Left to itself, it is to be feared that Le Journal de Liliane will, like many other novels, die without tears and without honour. It came to us with the strawberries; it will be forgotten before the peaches. There is not one word in it which the young girl might not read, nor is there anything whatever in it to make the young girl anxious to avail herself of the maternal permission—except Miss Gibson. Miss Gibson must be rescued. She must be drawn closer to us. There is a certain amount of joy in Miss Gibson.

She is not the heroine of the story. She is the governess of the heroine, the orphan Liliane. On the eve of their departure from Paris, to take up their abode in Poland with Lilian's grandmother, Miss Gibson in making her will writes down her name as Nelly Gibson.

On their arrival in Poland they encounter a mad woman who dances. It is too much for Nelly Gibson. She supplements her thick veil by covering her face with her two hands. "Un cri d'horreur et de dégoût s'échapper de ses lèvres; 'Aoh! very indecently, indeed!'" It is a pity—it is a thousand pities—that after this Miss Gibson rarely speaks a word of English. "Aoh! very indecently, indeed!" is so pleasant and comforting, and we feel so sure that there must be more English where that came from, that we are disappointed. But in some other respects Nelly Gibson remains good.

To them enter two heroes, one of whom is a villain. The villainous hero is Prince Paul Sreniawa; the heroic hero is M. Etienne Gordyan, the prince's guardian. As Liliane's grandmother wishes her to marry the prince, she naturally falls in love with the guardian. The prince is said to have a "British aspect," and in an affair of the heart any little infirmity like a "British aspect" must tell against one.

In the meantime, what is Miss Nelly Gibson doing? She also has not been idle. She also has fallen in love with the guardian. "Serai-je moi-même jalouse de Miss?" exclaims the perfervid diary-keeper, and answers herself, "Non, mille fois non!" Still Nelly Gibson is no despicable rival. "Miss est encore jeune. . . . Sans la couperose qui dépare son visage, Miss serait vraiment jolie." The question presents itself: "Pourquoi donc Miss ne pourrait-elle pas aimer?" Especially when we consider that M. Gordyan, the guardian, quotes "Tennysson." And, by the way, who was "Tennysson"?

M. Gordyan (he is once called Sir Gordyan, but the joke is not repeated) saves the life of Liliane, who is also addressed as Lili, Lily, and Lilienne, thereby reminding us of him who would "answer to Hi! or to any loud cry." Subsequently the guardian also saves the life of Miss Nelly Gibson. These heroes are heroic all right, but in their line of action a little monotonous. Miss and Mademoiselle have now scored one rescue each, and it is Miss's turn to play.

But before she plays there is a little complication about her name which requires to be cleared up. The bad prince, in order to gain favour with the governess, addresses her always as "my lady." We are told that he spoke English badly. "N'est-ce pas une lacune surprenante dans l'éducation d'un homme du monde?" asks the superior Liliane. Miss Gibson very properly refuses the title; she has not that honour. Then comes the astounding statement: "Je m'appelle Miss Hariett Gibson." Nobody notices the change, not even the author; nobody cares, except the reader; but he worries himself. Why has Nelly suddenly become "Hariett"?

"Une lacune surprenante dans l'éducation d'un homme du monde!" —"Hariett" is, of course, the abbreviated form of Nelly.

To return, Miss Nelly, or "Hariett," or compromise it and say Nelriett, at one time supposed that all was arranged between the bad prince and Liliane, thus leaving Miss a clear field with the good guardian. In her delight, says Liliane, "Miss me donna un shake hand énergique." Miss was deceived, and disillusion follows. She inherits "la modique somme de trente mille guinées" from an uncle, and is prompt to take advantage of her new independence. In the usual English way, she writes a letter to her adored, placing herself and her fortune at his disposal, and he refuses her. So she informs Liliane's grandmother: "Je pars demain"; and Liliane exclaims: "Adieu donc, Miss Gibson! la pensée unira toujours nos deux âmes." The pure-souled Liliane reads a letter which was not addressed to her, nor intended for her. This letter had been dropped accidentally by the bad prince, and contains the evidence of his badness, thus making all clear for Liliane's betrothal to the good guardian.

There seems to be only one comment possible upon the conduct of either Miss or Mademoiselle. It is best put in these words: "Aoh! very indecently indeed!"

This charming story has been published this year in Paris. Paris is the capital of France, and the French are a light-hearted people.

BARRY PAIN.

* * * * *

An Electric Shock, and Other Stories. By E. Gerard (Mme. de Laszowska). (William Blackwood & Sons.)

The percentage of short stories which have enjoyed an ephemeral existence in the magazines and weekly newspapers and deserve a more prolonged life in volume form is small. But if in literature, as in biology, it is the fittest which survive, the struggle for existence is equally natural in both cases. With the exception of the first story, giving its name to the book, all the others have been published before. Mme. Laszowska writes, on the whole, with correctness, and possesses considerable powers of focussing the reader's attention, but she lacks the aptitude for character-drawing needed to give vitality to all creative work; and a less heavy touch in light comedy would be an advantage. "An Electric Shock" is of the "forcible-feeble" type. Written "explosively," it depends for interest on crude incident. A young Viennese doctor, in love with his patient's daughter, proposes to cure a certain Herr Querkopf—the name is scarcely a happy one—by electricity. Querkopf has fallen into the hands of a quack "bath physician" at an Austrian health resort, who has invented a ridiculous system for curing diseases with "pine-tree essence." Satirically treated, the story might have been made amusing, but the authoress has chosen instead a lugubrious and tragic key, with the result that it is lacking in sense of proportion as well as in sense of humour. Far and away the best effort in the volume is the tale from the Polish entitled "The Attaman: a Tale of the Kosaks"—our old friends the Cossacks in disguise. The adaptation is excellent, and the legend singularly touching and heroic. At an order from his "master, the king," the Attaman leads the Cossacks of the Dnieper against the Turks. They advance too daringly into Ottoman territory, and at the commencement of winter find themselves surrounded by a vast Tartar horde. The army is wrecked. Only the Attaman and 300 men return from the ill-fated expedition. But in the history of the Cossacks there has been no instance before of a chief returning without his army. What is to be done in this case? A council is summoned, and an ancient chief pronounces the leader's doom:

"A less noble man might be degraded from his office; but thou, Kunicki, shalt not be stripped of dignity in favour of any other man. Attaman thou shalt remain until thy death. Yet as the council in its wisdom does not deem it to be seemly that an Attaman should survive the loss of his army, it will be advisable that thy noble life should come to a speedy termination. . . . Only to lay thy head on the block wilt thou put aside the crane's feather."

The Attaman accepts his fate as inevitable and just, but before his death wishes to see his wife and child:

"'Fix a day for my execution,' he says, 'and I swear to be punctual.'

'As much time as thou pleasest, Father Attaman,' is the answer."

He chooses one day, and returns to die on the block. How much of this fine story is original and how much has been translated I cannot pretend to say, but it is picturesquely told, and the heroic atmosphere throughout has been well sustained. The rest of the book suffers much by measurement with this standard. In "The Portrait of Conceta P—" the supernatural element has been employed with some ingenuity, but the idea of a man falling in love with the ancient portrait of a beautiful lady and finding his reward in the hand of the descendant who bears her likeness is not new. "A Drama in Blue" has but one good scene. A jilted lady in disguise, seeking to win back the affections of her former lover, offers for his recognition the withered forget-me-not which he has given her. He, mistaking her interest in the flower for merely a botanical curiosity, cures her of her infatuation by a pompous scientific dissertation. But for this lapse of memory the large fortune for which he hungered might have been his. As an attempt in humour, "My Wife's Christmas Supper" does not succeed, and "The Price of the Necklace," in which a surgeon amputates the breast of the woman he once loved, although told with some ability, is unpleasant without being startling. Neither of these stories is worth reprinting.

* * * * *

Crooked Paths. By Francis Allingham.
(Longmans, Green & Co.)

"... But my life has been recorded by the angel—it is all there; why expose me to the horror of it again?"

'The Recording Angel is none other than yourself. You will have no reason to doubt the correctness of your account, for you will yourself tell it. Your brain has retained all the impressions it has received, all the thoughts that have come to you, all the words you have spoken, all the actions you have done, all the scenes you have witnessed. All these will be unrolled before you, and you will see your life as it actually was.'

'Is there no escape—no death for me before this takes place?' I asked.

'No; you will see your life and its influence upon others. It is by this influence you will be judged, that is the balance that will weigh you.'

This conversation passes between the spirit, after death, of the writer of this chaotic book and another spirit, from another world, who appears to act as his guide and instructor; and this is the theme upon which a curiously inconclusive and muddled story is built. It is a theme which, in able hands, and treated with high imagination and human sympathy, might yield a notable result; but in Crooked Paths we have neither. It is the kind of book, possibly, to appeal to the commonplace imagination—a book of exclamations and of crude wailings, a mixture of undigested, semi-religious sentiment and weak melodrama. It has none of the balance of life, and, what is essential in such an effort, none of the logic of events. Briefly, it is the story of a man who, in extreme youth, has a very short and ordinarily vulgar amour—a passage which has an effect upon him out of all proportion to its importance. Then he falls in love, and, later, is temporarily led away by a girl of the casual sensual type, who plays so superbly on the violin that she has the power of suggesting to different hearers the kind of love which she wishes them to feel. This incident ends quite innocently—the man marries the right girl and dies young, leaving one son. Now if, in the after life, he had been compelled to see himself and the result of his actions in his child, and in the one or two lives intimately associated with his, there would at least have been a gleam of logic to serve as guide; but instead of this he is linked to the development of a farm labourer named Adam. It is true that the son of the dead witness seduces Adam's sister, but this only makes the confusion worse. Adam, finally, murders his light-of-love sweetheart, and allows himself to be knocked down and killed by a passing train. "And then there was utter darkness."

Thus, the story does not end at all; the conclusion of the whole matter is "utter darkness"; the problem is most inartistically shirked. It will be seen that no logical conclusion could have been arrived at on the lines indicated, but Mr. Allingham might at least have endeavoured to tie some kind of knot.

As I have said, the book is crude and ill-constructed. It is full of laborious hammerings of the commonplace; it has neither grace nor subtlety; it continually hovers between a tract written by a person ignorant of theology and a story written by a person ignorant of life. There are, indeed, passages not without some trace of skill, as, for instance, the scene between the two friends in the twelfth chapter of the second book, and that at the end of the eighth chapter of the third. But in the main the story is shadowy, vague, and wooden.

I am not inclined to be a severe critic of modern fiction—there is much that is excellent, a great deal that is good. But it seems to me that such books as Crooked Paths are superfluous. They serve no purpose that may not be found, more concisely set forth, in the "twopenny box"; they are full of deaths, burials, and, in this instance, of a pseudo-resurrection also; they set out as light-bearers, and leave the reader in—"utter darkness." If Mr. Allingham wishes to write let him try his hand at something nearer the ground; he will soon learn that farm labourers do not talk in just the same way as the folks at "the Manor House." When I see Mr. Allingham's name on the title-page of another book I will read it, in the hope that he may have turned to a more profitable theme.

* * * * *

My Bonnie Lady. By Leslie Keith.
(Jarrold & Sons.)

If Mr. Leslie Keith's new novel may be taken as representative of the Scots school of story-telling, the kailyard has become empty of suggestion. It has all the usual characters. There are the little minister, the elder, the dominie, the gossips, and the beautiful young maid, attractive from having been brought up among influences other than those of the sordid northern village.

Time hangs heavy on our hands as we peruse the book. That is because the plot is quite incredible. It deals with a feud between the Inglises and the Mintos. The one family had for generations been denying the claim of the other to certain lands, which at the beginning of the book seem to be a few arable acres, and a little later have dwindled into a footpath. Such a dispute is not impossible; but it cannot be made the basis of a romance. We are told that blood had been shed and fortunes squandered over it; which we do not believe. Like other rural people, the Scots, with time to waste and money to spend on the sport, are not averse from law pleas. We are sure that, if the family of Minto and that of Inglis did have any difference about rights of property, the question was settled by the Court of Session soon after it arose. According to Mr. Keith, the settlement was arrived at through other means. Night after night, at the bidding of his wife, Mr. Minto went forth to walk upon the disputed territory. Apparently he went out with the coffee and came in with the milk. There, at the very beginning, one finds that the story does not ring true. We are not alluding to the base uses to which ancient Scotsmen are put by shrewish wives. We are thinking of a fact in law. If you are the public, you can establish a right of property in land by walking on the land with persistence; but Mr. Minto was not the public, and, all Scots being notoriously well-informed, we refuse to believe that he acted as if he were. In the chronicles of Mr. Keith, one cold night he fell by the wayside in a faint. His wife, drawn by an opportune intuition, was there to see him. So was Captain Inglis, scion of the enemy, just home from the wars. The Captain tamed the shrew, who was very unwilling that he should lay a hand upon her husband, and he carried the poor man home. There, of course, he met "our bonnie lady," a damsel whom he had loved long since and lost awhile, who, in order to bring peace into the parish, had been induced by the little minister to become house-maid to Mrs. Minto. The minister, it is needless to say, also was in love with her.

How this unconscionable tangle is unravelled it would be unfair to say. It would be tedious also. Mr. Keith can write pretty well; but the artificiality of his theme dogs him to the end. There is scarcely a page in his book which produces an artistic illusion. In short, we do not believe a word of it. The words themselves are often horrible. "The Captain, as he told me, was fair donnered for a moment to see her in such a tirrivee, and could do nothing but sit stock still trying to make out what kind of a randy wife he had fallen upon." That is a fair sample of Mr. Keith's manner. A story told in such language is a tirrivee that donners us too much.

* * *

A Trick of Fame. By H. Hamilton Fyfe. In 2 vols. (Bentley.)

Mr. Fyfe's novel is one of those which reward the persevering. The first few chapters led me to put it down as an inferior imitation of Mrs. Humphry Ward, a study on the lines of Sir George Trevelyan, with the incisiveness and the humanity of Sir George Trevelyan left out. Mr. Fyfe's knowledge of politics appears to be more to seek than even my own. I am sure that a young Tory member of Parliament could not suddenly begin to act as private secretary to a Liberal Minister of Labour, and I do not think that a Cabinet Minister who had only been in office two or three months would get an official pension. The comic relief, again, consists mainly in satire of a kind of affectation which I understand to be now extinct. This is the sort of thing:

"'Cecil and I have been contemplating the pagan ideals, and counter-acting the effects of country air, which would make one energetic but for some such antidote, by consuming cigarettes whose fragrance suggests all the most charming vices of every age.'

'You might have been better employed,' said Lady Beatrice curtly, examining the features of the landscape.

'Ah, dear lady, again the point of view. But I fancy luncheon is at hand—luncheon, which in town might be described as the impecunious in search of the appetising, but which here in this appallingly healthy air one could well call the endeavour of the insatiate to avoid satiety.'

Wearisome fooling, surely: although I own to finding humour in a gilded youth's description of Lady Beatrice Vane as an

"'orflly odd girl, don't you know? Makes you feel, when you've been talkin' to her, as if you'd made rather a fool of yourself; orflly annoyin', that sort of girl.'

In the course of the second volume one makes the discovery that Mr. Fyfe has a distinct talent for evoking a dramatic situation. There is a telling scene in the House of Commons where Hewlett, the Labour Leader, is thrown over by his clever young secretary in the course of a debate, and another at the close of the book, where the same young secretary misses his chance because he fears to put his fate to the touch with the woman who loves him. Harold Fenton has run away with Beatrice Vane, and when they are overtaken by her brother is coward enough to hint, what, indeed, is the case, that the responsibility for the freak lies with her.

"Beatrice looked at Fenton with an expression of bewilderment on her face.

'I—I don't understand,' she said with a catch in her voice. 'You have told my brother that —'

'Mr. Fenton has only allowed me to guess what —'

'Hush, please! You have told my brother,' she went on, facing Fenton steadily and speaking in dull measured tones, 'that it was I who suggested this—this journey, and that you did not approve of it and wished me to return?'

'Beatrice, I only said what I have said to you this morning. I told him nothing of what you—you suggest. Lord Radfield, you will bear me out in this?'

'Lord Radfield shrugged his shoulders almost imperceptibly again.

'From what you were good enough to say I gathered that —'

'Oh! it can't be—it can't be—you could never have been so—Harold! Why don't you say something—anything—deny it—tell me it isn't true.'

Fenton began to see the enormity of the mistake he had made.

'I only said that—but it is absurd to have all this fuss—Beatrice, will you not listen to what your brother wishes to say?'

'You coward!' said Beatrice in a low voice—'you coward!'

So was a subtle cad well unmasked.

* * *

From the Four Winds. By John Sinjohn. (Fisher Unwin.)

Mr. Sinjohn, like so many other clever young men, has been trying to catch the manner of Mr. Rudyard Kipling. He is violent, cosmopolitan, knowing: and I cannot honestly say that the blend of smoking-room ethics and Imperialism which results is very much to my taste. Dick Denver, braggart and bully, who is the hero of two of the stories, is a particularly offensive sort of person. In Synge Sahib, however, Mr. Sinjohn has got a good idea, and has used it effectively. Synge is an English doctor in the Straits Settlements. He has a dash of yellow blood in him, and one tropical night he "runs amok":

"It was Synge—Synge transfigured—a Malay, if ever there was one, in every line of his face and figure. Barring a towel wound round him, he was stark naked, and his flesh was yellow, not white; and whether my eyes went wrong or not, I don't know, but his hair seemed to hang down his naked back, instead of being cropped short, as it always is. His eyes were blazing and glaring with a sort of green light like a wild cat's. That devilish silver streak was his Malay krias, and he brandished it like one possessed."

And one other story in the book is in its way a perfect gem. "Tally Ho" is an Anglo-Indian child who loses himself in London. He is picked up by an old general, who carries him off to tiffin at his club. Tally Ho's ways and speech are delightful from beginning to end. And the general is excellent too. The meeting is by the water in St. James's Park.

"Tally Ho sank on his knees, stuck his head through the girders, and gazed. His affections particularly riveted themselves on two small bronze-green ducks taking first lessons in diving from an attentive parent."

'My wantles dem,' said Tally Ho, joyfully and loudly, through his girders, to the intense astonishment of a military-looking old gentleman, from between whose legs the words arose.

'Gawd bless me! What's that?'

'My wantles 'oo for each of my's tlowers' pottets,' bellowed Tally Ho across the water to the ducks.

'Gawd bless me! It's the ducks the boy wants,' commented the ancient warrior, stepping with much care clear of Tally Ho, and noting the direction of his gestures. At this precise instant Tally Ho withdrew his head from between the girders and scrambled on to his feet, and as he did so his eye lighted on the stranger, whose elderly but martial form he had been doing his level best to upset.

'Salaam, Genelal Sahib,' he said, saluting affably and without embarrassment. 'My is Tally Ho—my wantles dose ducks.'

* * *

"Old Man's" Marriage. By G. B. Burgin. (Grant Richards.)

In this novel Mr. G. B. Burgin continues the history of the inhabitants of Four Corners, with whom we have become in a certain degree familiar. It is written in a style which I must call, for want of a better word, sprightly, and is mainly concerned with the efforts of "Old Man" to avoid the attentions of his friend Ikey Marston's wife, who has married the wrong man. "Old Man" is a noble backwoodsman of the kind which Bret Harte has made known to us, and for Quixotic reasons he marries an Indian squaw. There are other characters and incidents more or less humorous. An editor who is handier with the pistol than with the pen, a beautiful girl who is familiar with the reforming uses of a shot-gun, an English lord who lispes, a pie—no American story is complete without a pie—and a comic mule, the best drawn character in the book. Here is a portrait of the mule, which "Old Man" in a facetious moment had christened "Miss Wilks," that being the name of the lady he had renounced in favour of Ikey Marston.

"The durability of her scarred hide made it as valuable as that of a caribou, and a wider intelligence, fostered by encounters with strange hybrids in the great North-West, had begotten in her an acuter intellect than of yore. She was an extraordinarily powerful, clay-coloured mule, projecting in all kinds of uncomfortable and unexpected directions, blind in the right eye, and wanting an ear, the remaining ear lopping over as if to conceal her lack of sight. The missing ear had been 'chawed' off in single combat with one of her own race. An originality of gait, which had first endeared her to 'Old Man' still remained to comfort his loneliness; she shuffled along, moving both legs on one side at the same time. Her mode of progression suggested an appearance of constant effort, as if she were continually changing shoulders, and undecided which leg should lead."

"Old Man" comes back with "Miss Wilks" to find that Mrs. Ikey Marston (née Miss Wilkes) is by no means happy in her marriage, and the scenes between "Old Man" and the woman who loves him are among the best in the book. I was not aware that the hunting of men with bloodhounds, lynching and murder, were so frequent in the villages on the Ottawa River as Mr. Burgin would have us to believe. The Dominion Government should look to it.

One Man's View. By Leonard Merrick.
(Grant Richards.)

Mr. Merrick shows some freshness in his treatment of a theme which has done duty through generations of fiction. Mamie Cheriton marries George Heriot because she has failed as an actress and has not much alternative. She finds him dull, and absorbed in his profession. But she gets sympathy from Lucas Field, a brilliant and successful dramatist.

"To talk about oneself to a woman, who listens with exquisite eyes fixed upon one's face, is very gratifying to a literary man. If one is mediocre, she makes one feel clever; and if one has talent, one feels greater still. Field had rarely spent a pleasanter hour. It is not intimated that he was a vain puppy—he was not a puppy at all. He had half unconsciously felt the want of a sympathetic confidant for a long while, though, and albeit he did not instantaneously realise that Mrs. Heriot supplied the void, he walked back to his chambers with exhilaration."

Ultimately Mrs. Heriot leaves her home with Lucas Field, and before long falls upon a second disillusion. I think this is perhaps the strongest part of the book.

"When a naturally pure woman, who is not sustained by any emancipated views, consents to live with a man in defiance of social prejudices, she probably obtains as clear an insight as the world affords into the enormous difference that exists between the ideal and the actual. Matrimony does not illumine the difference so vividly, because matrimony, with all its disillusion, leaves her an unembarrassed conscience. With her lover such a woman experiences all the prose of wedlock and a sting to boot. A man cannot be at concert-pitch all day long with his mistress any more easily than he can with his wife. She has to submit to bills and other practical matters just as much with a smirched reputation as she had with a spotless one. The romance does not run any better because the marriage service is omitted. A lover is no less liable to be commonplace than a husband when the laundress knocks the buttons off his shirts."

So Mrs. Heriot and Lucas Field part. The woman realises—it is the traditional ending—that after all she loved her husband, and a happy accident brings them together again. It is a cleverly written story, but I have not a notion what the title means.

More Sentiment. By A. J. Dawson.
(John Lane.)

There are a dozen stories in this volume, of unequal length, unequal merit, and diverse style. They cover a good many phases of life and a wide stretch of map. The Australian Bush is Mr. Dawson's favourite locale, but he does not disdain London, Monte Carlo, or West Africa. Some of the tales are extremely slight; and one of them, "Narita," is unintelligible. Nevertheless, this last is, to my mind, the best of the collection: the struggle in the dinghy, half seen from the other boat through the gloom of night, is weirdly realised; and there is a haunting suggestion of mystery about the lady. "Madge" is an unpleasant story of an hysterical girl, sufficiently unpleasant, but not without a certain tenderness in the treatment. "Mother Carey's Chickens" is the record of two children who act Providence to their elder sister's love-affairs: "The Man Who Was" furnishes the key, and "The Light that Failed," a refrain. Altogether a volume that may be read with pleasure, if not with notable profit.

* * * *

Without Issues. By Henry Cresswell.
(Hurst & Blackett.)

Mr. Cresswell has found out a lovely new way of killing people; and he has wisely made it the cardinal point of an excellent novel. The story is of an infant heir, brought up in a slum; of a miserly life-tenant and his lawyer son, unconscious of the boy's existence; of Muriel and Eva, sisters, both in love with the lawyer son; and of a villainous specialist doctor, ex-shopboy, in love with Muriel. Three characters stand especially forth—the disinherited failure dying nameless in his last squalid refuge; his brother, the life-tenant, indulging a shameful parsimony; and the fashionable practitioner trading upon the vice he professed to cure. Of the two sisters, Muriel is good conventional work, and Eva, the younger (though her creator seems hardly conscious of the fact), is corrupt and unscrupulous. There is humour in Mrs. Jagers, the life-tenant's landlady.

Weighty Professional Opinions as to the Virtues and Efficacy of Guy's Tonic.

Guy's Tonic is the Approved British Remedy for Indigestion, Liver Affections, Nervous Maladies, Debility, Emaciation, and Disorders characterised by Mal-nutrition and loss of Vitality in the System.

A retired Indian Surgeon (late Medical Officer, North Bhangulpore, Bengal), writes:

"Fulham, S.W.

"Gentlemen,—With regard to your query as to your preparation—Guy's Tonic—I may say that it has proved in my hands an Alternative and Tonic of undoubted utility in Low, Weak, and Atonic States of the System, particularly when these are of a Chronic character. I have used it myself for my old Indian Liver Trouble, and prescribed it largely with good results in Functional Diseases of the Stomach, Hepatic Congestion, and Renal mischief. It is also of Service in Nervous Affections, especially those affecting Women, and generally useful in Debility and Emaciation arising from Mal-nutrition and Depressed Vital Force. You may publish my opinion if you wish, but, for obvious reasons, I must request you not to make my name public."

"Milford, co. Donegal.

"Gentlemen,—I enclose Remittance, for which I request you to send me by post Four Bottles of Guy's Tonic. I have prescribed the Tonic to several People, who have derived much Benefit from it, but I may mention that all which I order myself is used by my Wife.—Yours faithfully,

"J. A. OSBORNE, M.D."

Guy's Tonic is sold by Chemists and Stores throughout the World. It is now employed in Hospital Practice, and is widely recommended by Medical Men.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's
SWISS
MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, JULY 17, 1897.

No. 1315, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a News-vendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

ANOTHER very quiet publishing week! Yet it will be a memorable one. The publication of the newly discovered Logia, or Sayings of Our Lord, is an event solitary in its importance and in its appeal to the imagination. One cannot but wonder what records of the life and words of Christ may yet leap to light in the desert places of the East. No event which modern civilisation could produce would be comparable to the discovery of a new and illuminating record of Christ's life and ministry. The discovery of a papyrus not half the size of this page, and containing only eight broken sentences, is a lesser event, but yet a great one. These Sayings are believed to date from somewhere between 150 and 300 A.D.; and they, apparently, have an origin independent of our Gospels. The story of the finding of the papyrus by Messrs. Bernard P. Grenfell and Arthur S. Hunt, two young Oxford scholars, has been told this week in every newspaper. These explorers set to work to examine a series of low mounds on the edge of the Libyan desert, 120 miles south of Cairo, which mark the site of the ancient city of Oxyrhynchus. The papyrus which is now a centre of interest to Christendom "was found at the very beginning of our work upon the town in a mound which produced a great number of papyri belonging to the first three centuries of our era, those in the immediate vicinity of our fragment belonging to the second and third centuries." No time has been lost in giving a translation of these Logia to the world, and it was a worthy thought which prompted the issue of that translation in a cheap form. Sixpence is so small a sum that the message may almost be said to be given without money and without price. Certainly there is no danger of exaggerating the importance and interest of a second century papyrus, which gives us, as Christ's own utterance, the words: "Wherever there are . . . and there is one . . . alone, I am with him. Raise the stone and there thou shalt find Me; cleave the wood and there am I." Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt give the Greek text of the Logia, an English translation with notes, and a few general remarks. We shall not, however, further anticipate our reviewer's treatment of this remarkable relic.

Last week brought us an important book written in reply to another: we refer to Prof. Gardiner's What Gunpowder Plot Was. It is a coincidence surely worth noting that we have this week Mr. Andrew Lang's reply, in book form, to Prof. Max Müller's Contributions to the Science of Mythology. Mr. Lang's book may be beyond the average reader, like Prof. Müller's, but Mr. Lang's Introduction is not. It runs to twenty-four pages; and it is a clean-cut statement of the issue between the anthropological method and the linguistic method of studying and explaining mythology. Prof. Max Müller is the champion, the almost solitary champion, of the second of these methods. The general problem is stated by Mr. Lang to be this:

"Has language—especially language in a state of 'disease'—been the great source of the mythology of the world? Or does mythology, on the whole, represent the survival of an old state of thought—not caused by language—from which civilised men have slowly emancipated themselves? Mr. Max Müller is of the former, anthropologists of the latter, opinion. Both, of course, agree that myths are a product of thought, of a kind of thought almost extinct in civilised races; but Mr. Max Müller holds that language caused that kind of thought. We, on the other hand, think that language only gave it one means of expressing itself."

That is lucid enough. As regards the plan of his book, Mr. Lang writes: "The pages which follow cannot but seem wandering and desultory, for they are a reply to a book, Mr. Max Müller's Contributions to the Science of Mythology, in which the attack is of a skirmishing character."

We have received from the office of the Review of Reviews a copy of Vol. VII. (1896) of the Annual Index to Periodicals, which is so ably compiled by Miss Hetherington. The Index is so complete that an analysis of it would reflect the characteristics of the year in an interesting way. Indeed, in his Preface to this volume Mr. Stead writes:

"The most extensive and tedious topics to deal with in 1896, from the indexing point of view, seem to have been South Africa, and the United States Presidential Campaign with its Free Silver and other issues; Venezuela, Cuba, and Armenia have continued to make a heavy demand on space in 1896; the Education Bill and the question of Anglican Orders are also among the much-discussed topics of the year; Mr. Balfour's Foundations of Belief and Mr. Lecky's Democracy and Liberty have still been favourite subjects of criticism; recent books have renewed the interest in Bishop Butler, Matthew Arnold, Cardinal Manning, and others; and death has brought to special notice the lives and work of such men as Lord Leighton and William Morris."

The sportsmanlike conduct of our South African colonists in presenting an ironclad to the British Navy has received the recognition it deserves. We are not surprised to find that sport in South Africa has reached the stage when it must needs be written about. We have received the 1897 edition of a new "official handbook" of South African Sports. This work is edited by Mr. G. A. Parker, the hon. secretary of the South African Football and Cricket Associations. Referring to the present literature of sport in South Africa, Mr. Parker writes:

"Football Annuals, chiefly Association, are published by hard-working secretaries in various centres, and the Durban Rowing Club also prints a small Annual. An endeavour, however, has now been made to collect full information as to the rise and progress of each branch of sport, and also to bring up to date all records of importance. Considerable time and trouble have been taken in securing from all parts of South Africa much of the data which appears herein; but the labour is a labour of love for pure and healthy sport; and if this book meets with a successful sale, it is the intention of the compiler . . ."

Space does not permit us to print all the intentions of the compiler, but they are excellent.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE LOGIA; OR, SAYINGS OF OUR LORD. From an early Greek Papyrus. Edited by Bernard P. Grenfell, M.A., and Arthur S. Hunt, M.A. Henry Frowde. 2s. and 6d.

BIOGRAPHY.

A SHETLAND MINISTER OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY: BRING PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF THE REV. JOHN MILL. The Leonardis (Kirkwall).

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN. By W. T. Stead. Review of Reviews Office.

FAMOUS SCOTS SERIES: SIR WALTER SCOTT. By George Saintsbury. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 1s. 6d.

POETRY, DRAMA, AND BELLES LETTRES.

ENGLISH VERSE-STRUCTURE (A PRELIMINARY STUDY). By T. S. Omond. David Douglas (Edinburgh).

ATHALIE. By Racine. Translated into English verse by W. P. Thompson. Hachette & Co.

FROM THE WOMBS OF THE MORNING. By Birch Vye. The Roxburghe Press. 1s.

ESSAYS IN LITERARY ART. By Hiram M. Stanley. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co. 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES: HALLUCINATIONS AND ILLUSIONS. By Edmund Parish. Walter Scott. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.

A PRIMER OF FRENCH ETYMOLOGY. By B. Daly Cocking. A. D. Innes & Co.

MYTHOLOGY.

MODERN MYTHOLOGY. By Andrew Lang. Longmans, Green & Co.

FOREIGN.

SOUVENIRS ET IMPRESSIONS: 1840-1871. Par le M<sup>rs</sup>. Philippe de Massa. Calmann Lévy.

MISCELLANEOUS.

CROQUET. By Arthur Lillie. Longmans, Green & Co. 6s.

LEAH'S ROYAL NAVY LIST. Witherby & Co.

THE FOREIGNER IN THE FARMYARD. By Ernest Edwin Williams. William Heinemann.

THE MUSIC OF THE PORTS; A MUSICIAN'S BIRTHDAY BOOK. Compiled by D'Esterre-Keeling. Walter Scott, Ltd.

RELIC FAIR. By Paul Parfait. Translated by a Catholic Templar. Simpkin, Marshall & Co. 3s. 6d.

SONGS, STORIES, AND SAYINGS OF NORFOLK. By Walter Rye. Agas H. Goose (Norwich). 2s.

SOUTH AFRICAN SPORTS. By G. A. Parker. Sampson Low.

THE PROFESSOR'S CHILDREN. By Edith Henrietta Fowler. Longmans, Green & Co. 6s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IN 1889 the trustees of the British Museum acquired from Mr. Ruskin a volume of Italian drawings, which that gentleman had bought some eighteen years previously, at a time when the trustees were unable to make the acquisition themselves. These drawings belong to the most interesting period of Florentine art, about 1460 A.D., and are unique in character and subject, representing the personages and events of sacred and profane history from the creation of man to the foundation of Florence by Julius Cæsar. They are ninety-nine in number, each measuring thirteen inches high by nine inches wide, and are executed in pen-and-bistre and bistre-wash, with an extraordinary richness and fancifulness of invention in matters of costume, ornament, and decoration. No satisfactory guess as to the artist was made until Mr. Sidney Colvin, on whose advice they had been bought by the trustees, brought forward a mass of evidence to prove that they are the work of the famous Florentine goldsmith, niello worker, and engraver, Maso Finiguerra (1426-1464).

MR. COLVIN has now prepared the drawings to form, with a number of subsidiary illustrations, a magnificent volume. It will bear the title A Florentine Picture Chronicle, by Maso Finiguerra. Mr. Colvin supplies a critical and descriptive text to the plates, which have been reproduced in facsimile. Three hundred copies only are to be issued, the publisher being Mr. Quaritch. The book is due to subscribers some time during the present year.

THE dramatic libretto of M. Albeniz' opera, Pepita Jimenez, just produced with singular success in Prague, is in English—the work of Mr. N. B. Money-Coutts, who has taken for his subject the novel of Juan Valera, translated some little time ago by Mr. Edmund Gosse. The Spanish spirit of gaiety and the Spanish touch of conscience and religion—very unlike the matter generally thought worth translating—are admirably captured by the English librettist, who is rather, in this instance, to be called a dramatist. The opera is making the tour of some of the most important cities of the Continent, and will, no doubt, find its way to London in due course.

THE Omar Khayyam Club will almost justify its existence if its proceedings continue to make the entertaining reading which they have done of late. Last Saturday the Club met at Great Marlow in force, and with the addition of new members, who included Mr. J. M. Barrie. There was a dinner at the Crown Inn, and a speech by Mr. Gosse, whose year of office as Shah-in-Shah was then terminating. In a humorous speech, Mr. Gosse announced the result of an appeal which the Club had made to the late Shah of Persia on the neglected condition of Omar's grave at Naishapur. The Shah, not having the advantage of knowing Omar through translations, took a very ordinary view of the matter. In fact, he told the Club that they might come and look after the poet's tomb for themselves. Shortly afterwards he was assassinated; but not, Mr. Gosse assured his hearers, by an emissary of the Omar Club. We believe that, as a matter of fact, emissaries of the Omar Club are exceedingly rare in Persia.

THERE is a rose-bush at Kew which was transported from the tomb, but Prof. Thiselton Dyer says it is of a "contemptible species," though on the other hand the Club is prepared to make oath that its fragrance is "exquisite." One of our caricaturists should give us a picture of the Club devoutly encircling the rose-bush, inhaling attar and Omar from its bloom, with Prof. Thiselton Dyer, in the background, looking on with an air of botanical compassion.

In his speech at the Conversazione of the Library Conference, Sir John Lubbock alluded to the burial of good books beneath unsuitable titles. "Thus," he said, "an excellent work by Dr. Mitchell, of Cincinnati, called The Planetary and Stellar Worlds, never attracted any general attention till it was re-christened The Orbs of Heaven." Here is a hint which publishers with intractable volumes on their hands might consider. Much is said from time to time of neglected books, and spasmodic efforts are made by their champions to get them down the public throat. The right method would seem to be to re-entitle them.

It was amusing to note the courage with which the Lord Mayor preceded Sir John Lubbock on this occasion. If there is in the world one man who has zealously condemned indiscriminate reading it is Sir John Lubbock; yet Sir Faudel Phillips could begin thus: "All his life he had been a collector of books, and before he became Lord Mayor he used to occasionally look inside them. It did not necessarily follow that a collector of books was a reader, and therefore it was necessary that a love of reading should be inculcated in early life, otherwise public libraries would lose much of their efficacy. Indiscriminate reading was often condemned, but any sort of reading was better than none at all." We regret to say that cheers followed this remark.

New series of volumes in honour of the Victorian Era are beginning to wear a menacing air. A book which comes into being at the bid of the editor of a series is rarely anything but book-making or expanded journalism. It is seldom literature. Now and again, however, a good work is thus produced which without such editorial stimulus would never have been written at all, and we fancy that something of this kind is in store for us in Messrs. Blackie's new Victorian Era Series. Among the volumes arranged for is one by Mr. George Gissing, the novelist, on Dickens. An estimate of Dickens by such a student of middle-class and lower middle-class life as Mr. Gissing cannot but be profoundly interesting.

AN urbane critic in the Daily News dissents from our remarks, made a week or two since, concerning the influence of the universities on literature. He proves with little difficulty that from the Isis or the Cam have come most of poets heretofore, although the non-academic band is formidable. In fiction, however, the universities do not score heavily. They claim Thackeray, the Kingsleys, Lytton, Reade, and Sir Walter Besant, and, adds the writer rather cruelly, Mr. Froude. But with the exception of Thackeray, the Noes have it. We knew this when we wrote. But our remarks were in reply to the Spectator, which said that from the universities were to come shortly our novelists, our journalists, and our poets. What has been has been; yet we do not think that the leading poets of the next thirty years will be academics.

THE editors of the American Bookman must look to the chastening of their reviews. In the current number they print a review by a lady which even the author who reaps the harvest of her superlatives must, we feel, consider extravagant. Here are extracts:

"So perfect is his temper as he picks his way among conjectures and controversies, that to match it we must revert to no annalist less sweet than Walton, and to no advocate less great than Newman. . . . Witness the sketch of . . . where every wizard paragraph victoriously says the unsayable. . . . Kind, true, unprofessorial, they are 'as good as clotted cream' to the general. They are also a lasting treasure to the few who keep their regard sacred to pure literature, to golden learning modestly sheathed in easy, almost gay reading, and to themes so magical and old that they seem to their lovers 'Above the light of the morning star.'"

It is perhaps necessary to add that the article in question is a review of Mr. Gosse's Seventeenth Century Studies.

TOGETHER with the punctual appearance of Part III. of Dr. Wright's Dialect Dictionary, in which, by the way, we are given fifty pages more than promised, comes the account of the founding of the Yorkshire Dialect Society. This body, which has its centre in Bradford, a city quite famous for the vigour of its intellectual life, is a direct offspring of the committee formed there by Dr. Wright two years ago. Their prospectus includes the investigation of etymological, historical, and ethnological problems "as revealed by diversities of dialect"; and while it is not easy to see a value in the undertaking of philological research by untrained enthusiasts, there is no doubt that the establishment of societies such as this will do much towards the preserving of all that is worthy of preservation in local records. Possibly the other towns which so readily rendered Prof. Wright assistance in his work of gathering in material may be induced by Bradford's example to do likewise.

THE following story of Count Tolstoi must be put on record. During his recent visit to Moscow he observed a policeman taking a drunken man to the station with some vigour. The Count stopped him and said: "Can you read?" "Yes," was the reply. "And have you read the Gospel?" "Yes, sir." "Then you ought to know that we should not offend our neighbour." The constable looked the Count up and down, noticing his shabby appearance, and asked, "Can you read?" "Yes," said Tolstoi. "And have you read the instructions to the police?" "No." "Very well, then, go and read them first, and then come back and talk to me again."

FRANCIS BACON

From the Picture by Paul van Somer in the National Portrait Gallery

We regret very much to hear that Mr. Richard Holt Hutton, who, as is well known, has long been in poor health, is now rather seriously ill.

We are pleased to note that Prof. A. H. Keane, F.R.G.S., an old contributor to the ACADEMY, benefits by the lately issued Civil List of grants and pensions. Prof. Keane's services to science and literature well deserved such recognition.

The Chairman's Manual is the title of a new volume of reference for the use of those who have to preside at public meetings to be published shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Messrs. B. & J. F. MEEHAN, the booksellers, of Bath, have just got out a very praiseworthy little publication. It is a list of all the famous people who have stopped at Bath in the last few centuries, and the houses that have sheltered them, whenever this detail could be given. Jane Austen, who laid her stories Northanger Abbey and Persuasion largely in Bath, stayed at No. 1, Gay-street, and at 4, Sydney-place. The Gay-street house is demolished. Christopher Anstey, of Anstey's Bath Guide, quizzed Bath from the windows of 5, Royal-crescent. Burke put up at 11, North Parade, Mme. D'Arblay at 41, Gay-street. Landor's house was 3, Rivers-street. It is not known where Byron stayed, nor where Fielding did; but they both went to Bath. Lord Nelson resided at 2, Pierrepont-street. Disraeli and Lord Lytton used to stay at the White Hart Inn. The list is very long, and includes the names and Bath addresses of many royalties, including Queen Elizabeth and Queen Charlotte.

In Mr. John Lane's American list we find this entry: "Max. By Julian Croeskey. $1.50." Can this mean that Mr. Lane has been serving up Mr. Beerbohm in parody in the way he has served up Mr. Le Gallienne?

CRITICISM of fiction on this and on the other side of the Atlantic obeys different standards. Mr. Stephen Crane's new novel, The Third Violet, it seems, has been praised by almost every reviewer in this country, and dismissed as either bad or unimportant by almost every reviewer in America. Is this, asks the Chap Book, an attempt on the part of London critics to bolster up their claim of having "discovered" The Red Badge of Courage?

ACADEMY PORTRAITS.

XXXVI.—BACON.

FIRST and before all things, Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, was a great philosopher. In saying this we make no pretension to estimate the value of his philosophy, regarded as an exposition of truth. But it is the acknowledged fact that he is the founder, the fons et origo, of that utilitarian school of philosophy which is peculiarly English. We do not say that without him we should have had no Scottish school of philosophy; no Hume, no Bain, no Reid; that without him we should have had no Locke, no John Stuart Mill, no Herbert Spencer—who, though very different from the utilitarian school, is nevertheless essentially English, and could not have arisen without the various English philosophers (whether strictly English or Scottish) who had preceded him. That school was in the air, and was bound to come. It is perhaps only in the case of a Shakespeare that we can say a whole literature—nay, almost a whole nation—would have been different if he had not appeared. But as things have been arranged, the whole temper of the British school of philosophy looks back to Bacon as its starting-point. Far more, in our opinion, must it be said that the whole of English physical science must acknowledge Bacon as its very Adam and progenitor. Not because Bacon was himself a great physical investigator. But because he first pointed out the aims and the temper of the physical investigator. Cowley stated the truth, with the usual perspicacity of the poet. Bacon did not enter the Promised Land, but he had the vision of it, and pointed the way to it. His whole aim was to start a new philosophical school, which should antithesize the philosophy of the scholastics and the ancients by proceeding from without inwards, instead of from within outwards; from phenomena to essence, not from essence to phenomena. Physical investigation was but a branch of this new departure, as he conceived it. Yet, in laying down this principle, he unwittingly became the patriarch of our modern scientists. Huxley was bred from his loins, and men greater in physical science than Huxley. This, we unhesitatingly aver, seems to us a greater achievement than the authorship of the British school of philosophy. Already there is a reaction towards the recognition of that very scholastic school which Bacon, the philosopher, lived only to destroy and bring into contempt. But there is not, nor ever will be, any reaction from the temper of physical research which he first inculcated. Other views may arise as to the value of the principle he laid down in regard to philosophy. There can be no other view as to the value of the principle he laid down in regard to physical science.

Here, however, we are not concerned with him on these grounds. We are concerned with him solely as one of the explorers in English prose. And here his name is not so great. He wrote many things, including the not very successful attempt to follow the path of Plato and Sir Thomas More, in the New Atlantis. But he survives chiefly by his Essays. They mainly show Bacon the chancellor, the courtier, and man of the world. They are full of very shrewd wisdom, of a devious and not over-principled kind. No attempt is there in them at deep truths, such as you might expect from a philosopher. Not truth, but expediency; the truth of self-interest and worldly consideration, is their aim. They show Bacon as an opportunist of the first water, a respectable British Machiavel. If to be a sage in the art of "getting on" constitute greatness, then, and not otherwise, they are great. As regards their style, they are what he would himself doubtless call "very pithy, pregnant, and sententious." The sentences are short, clear, well-knit, unsuperfluous. But there is no attempt at the more complex evolutions of style; and the succession of short barks (so to speak) is apt to get as tiresome as the utterances of a dog, though he barked like the hoariest sage in kennel-dom. There is one exception; and that (if we remember rightly) is the first essay in the collection. But though the earliest (or almost the earliest, if our memory should deceive us) in the book, it is stated by editors to be the latest written. We can well believe it. For here Bacon ascends to an altogether higher level in subject-matter; and naturally, therefore, to an altogether higher level in style. In the sustained dignity of its sentences, as in the sustained dignity of its thought, it is altogether worthy of Sir Thomas Browne, and might not unhappily be taken for the work of that later and greater master of prose. Otherwise, even as regards the terseness and weight of wisdom in individual sentences (the excellence in which Bacon excels), the palm must be given to his philosophical works, in spite of their alien language. For example:

"Present justice is in your power; for that which is to come you have no security."

Or again:

"Men believe that their reason governs words. But it is also true that words, like the arrows from a Tartar bow, are shot back, and react on the mind."

And yet again (though it is a precept which has its exceptions, in the case of intuitional minds):

"Let every student of nature take this as a fact, that whatever the mind seizes and dwells on with peculiar satisfaction is to be held in suspicion."

Consider also this most practical maxim:

"In attempts to improve your character, know what is in your power and what beyond it."

Or finally, the saying in the De Amicitia, which we quote in the original language on account of its superior terseness:

"Magna civitas, magna solitudo."

It might be a saying from Seneca or St. Augustine, so pregnant and sparse in wording is it. And if we have somewhat deprecated the excessive praise usually given to Bacon as a writer of prose, let it be acknowledged that, compared with the average modern writer, he is fine and full of matter indeed. It is only by comparison with the great writers of the seventeenth century that he appears less a master of his art. But then, he preceded them; and perhaps even Sir Thomas Browne learned something from him.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

[The first series of Academy Portraits ends with the present issue. A new series is in preparation, which will begin in the autumn.]

THE MOTTOES OF THE ILLUSTRIOUS

LIVES of great men, says the modern psalmist, all remind us we can make our lives sublime. Unhappily it is not until they are dead that particulars of the lives of great men usually reach us, and then often in a distorted shape. It is therefore stimulating to find that repository of ingenious and novel ideas, Mr. Stead, producing a plan by which great men may assist us even while they remain, as members of the Psychical Society call it, in the "form." Mr. Stead's method is to extract from the illustrious of this nation the motto or written passage which has helped them to qualify for a place in the album of Notables (charming word!) which he has just issued as part of his contribution to the Diamond Jubilee. Notables of Britain is the title of the book, and in it you find some hundred and fifty photographs and autographs of those men and women whose pictures the public is apparently never weary of gazing upon. The only really fresh one is that of Mr. F. E. Garrett. To some of us they have become a little tiresome, and it is possibly because he suspects this that Mr. Stead has sauced the old ingredients with mottoes. No one, therefore, who is in the habit of hurrying past the Stereoscopic Company's window in Regent-street or Spooner's in the Strand need be terrified by Notables of Britain, for unfamiliar material is offered, and most of the pictures are the result of recent sittings.

Even Mr. Stead, however, meets with reversals, and many of his Notables refuse to give away their inspiration. Mr. Cecil Rhodes and the humorists state the case for the opposition with most force. Mr. Rhodes, bluntly and to the point, but without any punctuation, writes: "I am sorry I cannot send you as desired my motto the reason is I dislike making public my secret thoughts and I do not care to have my name subscribed to what might be termed a flabby epigram." Mr. Zangwill says: "I cannot recollect ever having been helped most by any particular saying, quotation, or passage." Mr. Burnand is more general: "Except, perhaps, 'Do unto others as you would they should do to you,' I am not aware of any 'precept, saying, verse, text, or quotation' that I have found particularly useful. I have seen them up as 'ornamental' in rooms where texts and mottoes were used for decorative purposes. As a rule, I should say texts do serve decoratively." This is more cynical than Mr. Punch's representative usually is. This conspiracy of silence is joined by Her Majesty, the Princess of Wales, the Duchess of York, Prince Edward of York, the Dowager Empress of Germany, the Marquis of Lorne, Lord Elgin, Lord Salisbury, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Balfour, Mr.

Chamberlain, Lord Rosebery, the Duke of Devonshire, the Speaker, and many more whose mottoes one would be delighted to know. Even Mr. Gladstone refuses, exhibiting as he does so a complaining spirit rare in that most courteous of correspondents: "Very regretfully I find myself unable to comply with your request, as it would expose me to the peckings and ravages of a multitude of birds of prey which are always striving to peck me in pieces." So much for the reticent Notables.

On the other hand, we have some charming confessions. "Tell the truth and shame the devil," is the form of words which has helped to lift Mr. Labouchere to his present altitude. The Duke of Argyll's motto is even more Laboucharian: "Ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free." Earl Spencer gives two: "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might"; and "Be just and fear not." The Marquis of Lansdowne's contribution is one of the most interesting: "I should find it almost impossible to select any one saying or text as that which has been more useful to me than any other; but here is one uttered more than two centuries ago by an ancestor of mine, Sir William Petty, whose ideas I may perhaps have inherited: 'It is hard,' he wrote in 1676, 'to say where the scale ends, either upwards or downwards; but it is certain that the proud coxcomb man is not the top of it. Wherefore let us be sober and modest, and conform to the general practice of good men, and the laws of our age and country, and carefully study the laws of Nature, which are the laws of God!'" Lord Dufferin's reply is of great interest, coming from so accomplished a diplomatist: "The most comforting saying I know of, out of the Bible, is contained in Milton's line—

'They also serve who only stand and wait.'

These words have consoled me for many an unaccomplished task and useless endeavour." "Ich Dien," says the Prince of Wales. "England expects every man to do his duty," writes the Duke of York. "All things are lawful unto me, but all things are not expedient," is Mr. Campbell-Bannerman's favourite excerpt from St. Paul.

"One by one thy duties wait thee, Let thy whole strength go to each,"

says Lord Russell of Killowen, with rich emphasis. "Never fret," says Sir Henry Hawkins, looking as if he never did. "Speech is silver, silence is gold," says Sir George Lewis. "The frontiers of England are the coasts of the Enemy," says Rear-Admiral Sir J. A. Fisher. "God save the Queen," says Lord Wolseley. Prof. Max Müller, standing to it like a soldier, with sword and cocked hat, remarks "Das Leben ist ernst." Two pages later Mr. John Buras affirms, with Tom Paine, "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion." On the other hand, Mr. Tom Mann goes to Swedenborg: "All religion has relation to life, and the life of religion is to do good."

The literary men are communicative. Mr. Lecky, looking humorously puzzled at his close proximity to Mr. Kipling, and Mr.

Kipling himself are, it is true, silent; but Mr. Hall Caine asks, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Mr. Haggard advises, "In your patience possess ye your souls"; Mr. Hardy says, with Marcus Aurelius, "This is the chief thing: Be not perturbed, for all things are according to the nature of the universal"; and Ian Maclaren repeats the same thing, but in different words: "In the will of God is our tranquillity." Mr. Crockett is not conscious of having been influenced by quotations: "Still Tennyson's noble aspiration—

'To speak no evil; no, nor listen to it'— hits the nail as squarely on the head as anything I know, and Scott's dying words to his children I should like to be able to repeat when my turn comes: 'For myself, my dears, I am unconscious of ever having done any man an injury, or omitted any fair opportunity of doing any man a benefit.'" Mr. Meredith, who is represented by an old portrait, sends the aphorism: "Monarchy has its chance of extension only in the spiritual appeal to us." Mr. Alma Tadema says, "I count myself in nothing else so happy as in a soul remembering my good friends"; and the only other artist who is communicative is Mr. Holman Hunt, who writes: "It has always been a pain to me that so much of personal display that cannot be avoided has to be made by an artist in the present day. He is not an actor, nor a member of Parliament who must appear on the hustings at times, and it seems to me that he has the right to seclusion as far as possible. This at least was the feeling with which I entered on the profession, and I have retained it to this day." But Mr. Holman Hunt is not a popular painter. The only poet to deliver his soul is Sir Lewis Morris. Mr. Alfred Austin, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. William Watson merely sign their names, while Sir Edwin Arnold, though he is loquacious enough, is grouped by Mr. Stead with the editors. Miss Ellen Terry and Sir Henry Irving represent the stage. Miss Terry says, "Nothing but the Infinite pity is sufficient for the infinite pathos of human life," a remark from John Inglesant. Henry Irving declares, "Perseverance keeps honour bright." Another believer in this quality is, by the way, Lord Armstrong, who is, however, less enthusiastic. "Perseverance," says he, "generally prevails." Cricketers are not represented among the Notables, nor are doctors, nor architects, nor musicians, nor commercial men. The list is, indeed, ridiculously incomplete, but, as with everything that Mr. Stead does, immensely interesting.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

LOVERS of eighteenth century gossip will relish M. de Ségur's big volume on Mme. Geoffrin. Nobody was ever so mysteriously, so unaccountably celebrated as this illiterate bourgeoise, whose attitude toward the circle of great men she gathered about her was that of a liberal and disagreeable old school-mistress. True, nothing could be more contemptible than the position of the men of letters she protected. It was certainly a case of talent entretenus. Beauty entretenus is not permitted to claim respect, and talent (or even genius) in the same squalid situation has as little right to our esteem. All these great lights of the past century paid for board and bed in extravagant stanzas to their eccentric benefactress, and she repaid herself by rude handling of her protégés. It was a fair bargain. But how unenviable the fate of a keeper of a salon. Better far to keep a menagerie. Wild beasts, not a whit more dangerous, are more entertaining than servile men of letters. And the talk, the eternal brilliant chatter, the futile correspondence, the nauseous comedy between mendacity and liberality, the affronting patronage and degrading submission, the bon-mots, the ill-will, vanity, jealousy, intrigue, and perfidy the tale of such a useless institution of the "kingdom of the Rue Saint Honoré" implies! As a document, the history of Mme. Geoffrin's salon will always be remarkable, so that M. de Ségur is safe to find readers; but it will not heighten our esteem of the gentlemen who conspired to spread her fame through Europe in return for excellent dinners and substantial pour-boires. Who will turn to the unread Bélisaire for being reminded that Marmontel, on its failure, was politely shown his protectress's door, and permitted to find a lodging (this time paid for with coin more substantial than eulogy) elsewhere?

Parole Jurée is a lady's novel. Reversing the order with us, women writers are rare here, and, with the exception of the ever-adorable Gyp, considerably inferior. In a serious line, the single notable woman-writer is Arvède Barine. Gyp pictures the latter half of her century, and is a creature apart. Nobody else counts. Mme. de Bovet, in her Parole Jurée, has attempted to modernise and make practical George Sand's figure of Lélia. Her success is not conspicuous. Her heroine is a young French lady belonging to the best society, who, bent upon independence in the fullest sense of the word, obtains the title of canonness. Though unmarried, she declines chaperonage, family ties, and lives alone; is seen everywhere—at opera, concert, ball, dinner, and returns to her rooms at all hours accompanied by various men, all more or less in love with her. In New York or in London this might exist. In Paris it is pure romancing. She falls in love with a diplomat separated from his wife, becomes his mistress, after a great deal of reasonable discussion, joins him in Switzerland, where their relations are countenanced by the diplomat's mother. Still, society continues to receive the Countess Jacqueline with open arms, a proceeding we are permitted to doubt on the part of society. She declines to marry her lover, after an open liaison of three years, because his wife made him promise on her death-bed that he would never do so—hence the title. There are many truths harshly and unsympathetically said in this clever novel, in spite of the absurdity of the central figure. Mme. de Bovet's claim is that a woman, honest, beautiful, young, unmarried, and noble, may, with all a man's sense of independence and honour, yield to illicit love, and remain purer than many a wife or maid. She mars her object by a lack of style, of charm, of art, or humour, and by an inveteracy of preaching. Women writers, who are not de race, like the great ones, are apt to be too sentimental or too hard. In their wish to propagate what they regard to be an essential idea, they forget that the novelist should be an artist before a preacher; that his first mission is to please and afterwards persuade if he can. The book is written in a domineering, coarse, aggressive mood; in a harsh staccato style.

Responsable is another lady's novel; this time a princess's, no less. Its theme is quite the opposite. The heroine, a Scotch girl, Viviane Ford, is beautiful, philanthropical, wealthy, intellectual. She has taken her university degrees, and astounds her French friends by being simple, pure, womanly, and lovely in spite of it. She, too, conducts her affairs with extraordinary independence. She bids for a large factory off-hand because the French owner is unpopular with his work-people. Finding a young French nobleman in love with her French cousin, the unpopular employer's wife, she carries him off in her yacht to the Congo, where she undertakes to provide him with plenty of philanthropical occupation as soap for his soul, as well as that of the Prince of Congo for his material ablutions. On the voyage they talk a great deal of virtue and the eternal good, and, washed clean in the Congo, the young man returns on the husband's death to marry the widow the beautiful and virtuous Viviane so authoritatively saved him from seducing. We hope this will prove a precedent, and that Parisian exiles in the provinces on the eve of a fatal rendez-vous, will henceforth submit to be carried off to the Congo, in the interest of their own virtue and that of their neighbour's wife, by fair and interesting dragons. The question is, would Viviane have found M. de Tresseurs so surprisingly facile had she been plain, poor, and middle-aged? So here the recipe of the Princess Olga Cantacuzène-Altieri (the writer with such a troublesome name ought in the interest of the public temper to adopt an easy nom de plume) falls. Beauty, as well as yachts, is rare, however universal the desire may be to save our neighbours from ill-doing. Viviane herself proves her weakness by loving a shabby and futile young man who writes. Him, too, she extricates from the meshes of vice, and this extremely virtuous, if not very powerful novel, ends with the lovers sitting with clasped hands "like Monica and Augustine on the beach of Ostia."

Dans la Brume, by Léon de Tinseau, is purely a "literary" novel. The hero is a poet, the heroine a novelist, and the villain is a journalist—an appropriate trinity. How it may be with other readers I do not know, but the literary hero is to me an abomination; the literary heroine, if possible, even worse. The finest novel in the world would be spoiled for my reading if the hero presented dabbled with ink in the capacity of popular dramatist, popular novelist, popular poet, or, worst of all, brilliant journalist. I think I should even prefer a heroine who could not spell to a heroine who wrote like an angel. The heroine of Dans la Brume does not write like an angel, and she has the soul of a milliner. The poet is a colourless fool, which is after all an improvement, as poets in fiction are generally supposed to be Ouidaesque creatures—superlatively brilliant, successful, and seductive. The reporter is a cad, and the atmosphere such to make one grateful, since books must be written and newspapers and magazines filled, that matters are conducted differently with us. The venality and intrigues of French journalism as exposed in Dans la Brume carry imagination to a lower atmospheric condition than fog, and plunge it into mud. H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Crépuscules. André Fontainas.

Zeitoun. Aghassi.

Parole Jurée. Marie Anne de Bovet.

Lettres à Alfred de Musset. George Sand.

THE BOOK MARKET.

THE DISCOUNT QUESTION.

PRO AND CON.

IT was not easy to collect authoritative opinions on the renewed intention of the Publishers' Association to assist the Booksellers' Association in their attempt to reduce the discount on books from 3d. to 2d. It is recognised that if this alteration is to be brought about there must be something in the nature of a struggle. No one wishes to be specially identified with the unpleasant part of the revolution; and, meanwhile, the situation remains delicate and doubtful.

PRO.

"What line are you taking?" I said to one large bookseller, who shall be nameless.

"What line! Oh, make no mistake about it. I'm heart and soul in favour of the change."

"Of a reduction from 3d. to 2d.?"

"Yes. I want a better profit on new books. There is no trade in which profits are cut so low as ours. We have worked for this reversion to the 2d. discount for years, and now we mean to have it!"

"And are you hopeful of the result?"

"Oh, yes. The great publishers are not going to support the movement for nothing."

"You believe, then, in coercion?"

"Yes, in the coercion of about as many men as I can count on the fingers of one hand. That is all that is needed to settle the whole business."

"But these are big men, are they not?"

"They will come in."

"I am told that a 2d. discount will mean a loss of country customers to London booksellers."

"Undoubtedly. I expect to lose a lot of my country customers. They will have much less need to send to London for books. But I am willing to make the sacrifice, if it be one. Live and let live is my motto, and I am convinced that a healthy state of the book trade throughout the country will be favourable to every bookseller. I shall lose country customers, and I expect to lose revenue in the first year after the change. But the increase of profits will gradually compensate me for any losses. Moreover, the town bookseller will always have an advantage over the country bookseller under any system of discount. Books being produced in London can best be sold there. We shall keep all our customers who live in remote rural districts. Where we shall lose them will be in the big provincial towns. I don't mind. I believe in this movement."

"Well; your success seems to depend on force in the last resort. Do you think you have force enough at your command?"

"Yes, I do."

Con.

I next called on a very large bookseller, who turned out to be an opponent of the reform. "Are you," I had said to him, "one of the 729—I mean the 729 booksellers who have declared for a 2d. discount?"

"I cannot talk to you on this subject."

"I am told they mean to have their way this time."

"Indeed! I don't believe in coercion. I want Free Trade. But I cannot say a word to you."

"The change must tend to multiply prosperous booksellers throughout the country."

"Oh, yes. Still, I don't see why I should be called upon to establish my rivals in business. That is what it comes to. But I must preserve absolute silence on this topic."

"Do you consider that coercion is, as a matter of fact, possible?"

"No, I don't. There have been attempts already. But a bookseller who wants books can get them. And do you mean to say that if I send an order for fifty books to a publisher I shall not have it executed? I have my own opinion on the point, but, as I have said, I prefer to remain dumb."

"You are satisfied, then, with your profits on new copyright books under the 3d. discount?"

"Yes, I am. I have got inured to them, and I have built up a big turnover on them, and I have developed my trade in bound books to help out, and the whole thing is systematised and fixed; it is an evolution; and it is absurd to talk of legislating it into something different. You must excuse me, but you really cannot persuade me to talk on this subject."

"May I take it that you have always been loyal to the 3d. discount? I mean, you have never allowed more than 3d., or allowed discount on books published at net prices?"

"I have never done either; but I may tell you that the practice of certain booksellers of giving discount on net books has reached such a pass that I have lately been considering my position."

"Then you are really between two fires?"

"Yes, I am. I am between those who stretch the present system and those who wish to contract it. But I must decline to open my mouth; silence, I find, is the best policy."

"Thank you. Good morning."

DRAMA.

PLAYS as well as books have their destinies. That a version of "Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle" should be following one of "Un Mariage sous Louis XV." at the Haymarket Theatre would seem to denote a boom in Dumas. In point of fact, chance has been the main factor in this as in so many other situations. The West End managers have no particular belief in Dumas per se; nor, most assuredly, has the revival of "Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle," under the title of "The Silver Key," at Her Majesty's, been determined by the success of "Un Mariage sous Louis XV.," otherwise "A Marriage of Convenience," at the Haymarket. The explanation of this conjunction of adaptations, which I have from the adapter himself, is curiously simple. Some little time ago Mr. Sydney Grundy turned to "Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle" with a view of making a fresh version of it for Mr. Tree. In the particular volume of the Dumas "Théâtre" which he took up "Un Mariage sous Louis XV." happened to be the next play in order. It attracted his eye; he read it, saw possibilities in it, and adapted it, with the result that it is now making the fortune of the Haymarket management. But had it not been for the accident of the second play being bound up with the first in a Calmann-Lévy collection, it would, probably, never have been heard of by the playgoer of the present day. And that would have been a pity. "Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle" has frequently been adapted to the English stage. I have myself seen two or three versions of it, and others were before my time. Not that it ranks so much higher than other plays from the same source or of the same period, but the story is one of the few that happen to be as serviceable in an English as in a French form.

THE device by which the good name of the heroine appears for a time to be hopelessly compromised in her lover's eyes appeals very readily to the dramatic instinct. Yet I have never heard a man of the world defend it as plausible. It is of the stage stagey, it reeks of the footlights. I doubt whether the realistic novelist, who is never too particular, would regard it as "documentary." For the author of the famous wager not only deceives his friends but is himself deceived. This I am inclined to think is a little piece of unnecessary cleverness on the part of Dumas, who could have worked the play without it. The profligate Duc de Richelieu bets with his friends that he will obtain a midnight rendezvous from the first woman he meets. Chance determines that the beautiful and virtuous Mlle. de Belle-Isle shall be the one chosen for the experiment; but on the fatal night the notorious Marquise de Prie, an old flame of the Duc's, arranges to get possession of her young protégée's apartment. It is she who receives him there, and from the window of this apartment accordingly the Duc is enabled to throw the compromising note to his friends in the street. According to Dumas the practised roué believes that it is indeed Mlle. de Belle-Isle and not the Marquise (who, in his own language, "does not count") that does him the honours of her boudoir in the darkness. But is this circumstance really necessary? To be sure it is an extra link in the chain of evidence fabricated for Mlle. de Belle-Isle's undoing, but its only effect is that when the Duc de Richelieu is himself appealed to to testify to her innocence he is unable to do so. It is a stage trick, I repeat, and one of a rather obvious character; but its success with two, if not three, generations of playgoers would seem to show that the theories of the realistic dramatist, according to whom truth is the one great desideratum on the stage stand in need of revision. Not only in this, but in his dramatic works generally, Dumas is a living proof that the well-made play has a better claim to popularity than the merely true one.

IN the costume play, especially that which is born of the rich and glowing imagination of Dumas, the acting is necessarily of a showy order, and it need scarcely be said how admirably in this respect "The Silver Key" is suited to Her Majesty's. Mr. Tree himself, the Richelieu of the cast, wears costume with an old-world grace. The most modern of villains when he likes, he can also enact the scented dandy or the tired rake of the last century—a clouded cane, a sword, or a modern walking-stick being equally familiar to his hand. This implies a rare and precious versatility on the actor's part. Nor does Mr. Tree alone in his company possess the secret of acting with what the French call the panache, the larger manner, appropriate to the costume play. Mr. Lewis Waller has latterly been taking a high position in the classical and pseudo-classic drama, and in this piece he plays d'Aubigny, the fiancé of Mlle. de Belle-Isle, with fine breadth and manliness. Dumas is certainly an inspiring author. It is d'Aubigny who accepts the infamous wager because, to quote his own words, "I wed in three days the lady whom M. le Duc de Richelieu proposes to dishonour within four-and-twenty hours." There, indeed, is panache in the text! What magnificent rhetoric it is for the boards! In an affected dedication of the play to Mlle. Mars, of the Comédie Française, who first sustained the title-part, Dumas ascribed the success of the performance in a large measure to her rendering of the wronged heroine. Despite this, however (and its title), the play hardly depends for its success upon the heroine. At Her Majesty's it is the magnificent Duc who holds the haut du pavé, but an excellent representative of Mlle. de Belle-Isle has been found in Miss Evelyn Millard, who, in her outburst of maidenly indignation for one brief moment, crows the splendid profligate as he stands before her, and almost shames d'Aubigny out of his suspicions. This is what the notorious Mrs. Ebbsmith would call Mlle. de Belle-Isle's "hour," or rather her "quarter of an hour," and a splendid one it is. Miss Millard is entitled to every credit for her share in it. Otherwise the character is of the bread-and-butter order. Of considerable dramatic moment is the part of the Marquise de Prie, whom Mrs. Tree depicts with much intelligence and subtlety. She, too, has a scene—a scene of confession, admirably done. For the time being, then, the star of the costume drama continues in the ascendant.

I DON'T know whether the object of the Elizabethan Stage Society in reviving one or two of the "doubtful plays" of Shakespeare is to render them more doubtful still, but this is the effect produced with "Arden of Feversham," which was given the other night at St. George's Hall. Whoever may have been its author, "Arden of Feversham" is one of the earliest domestic dramas written in blank verse. It is also, as regards its story, one of the crudest and most primitive, being an attempt to depict upon the stage a notorious murder of the period, which it does without relief, and, what is worse in a dramatic sense, without plausibility. The text contains a few vigorous lines and passages, and to these, probably, Mr. Swinburne and others who declare for the Shakespearean authorship of the play have given undue attention. Had these enthusiasts seen the play acted they might have altered their opinion. Shakespeare is not only a poet but an adept in the construction of plays, and it is incredible to me that he should have written, or even taken the trouble to revise, such a clumsy piece of dramatic workmanship as "Arden of Feversham."

J. F. N.

ART.

I.—MR. LINLEY SAMBOURNE.

THE Fine Art Society shows a large collection of Mr. Linley Sambourne's drawings—chiefly or altogether done for Punch, and given here in their proper size and in the vivacity of the handiwork. Mr. Sambourne's manner is all his own, and his matter is as original as the conventions of weekly political caricature may permit. That is, we have a perpetual recurrence of the Bear, the Eagle, the Turkey, and so forth; and it has been decided for the designer, in the day of his fathers, how much human character is to be given to the Bear, and how the Turkey is to have an expression according to the Foreign Policy acceptable at the hour. If the voices of the country could be taken, there would probably be an overwhelming majority glad of the opportunity of saying that these simple allegories have become more than tedious; that they are so dismally well known as now to have no more fun in them than abides in a Reuter telegram. Why, after all, should there be? Satire may lurk in the news from abroad, but hardly, or seldom, laughter. And the Bear and Turkey belong—if they have any place at all—to the mood of guileless and infantine laughter. But who is amused? It has really come to this—the printing of the plain words "Russia" or "Greece" or "France" would be as like to a joke as the repeated drawing of a composite animal is now in our eyes. It is with some sinking of the heart, therefore, that we face the long-accustomed allegory here in scores of vigorous drawings. It is not Mr. Linley Sambourne's fault, for neither did he invent this nursery-book manner of picture-writing.

Nevertheless, so familiar is the Sambourne line employed upon these tiresome allegories that a tired public is inclined to hold him more responsible than are the other artists who are patiently drawing, out of Punch, year in and year out, the same images of the same things, to the same purpose. Thus it seems to be generally understood that Mr. Linley Sambourne is not the master of a very smiling kind of humour. But the fact is, after all, that he has no little humour, and of no poor quality. To clear the Bears and Turkeys out of sight is to find some hearty humour in the invention and in the drawing alike. Take, for instance, the drawing called "Shocked." It is the Autocrat of all the Russias who has been taken by surprise, and the incident that has moved him is this, reported by the daily paper: "A private university teacher has been sent to prison by the Emperor of Germany for writing a letter in praise of a certain kind of soap." The one Emperor stands in the foreground, reflecting: "Well, I'm a bit of an autocrat myself; but how his people can stand him! Oh!" The other emperor is pronouncing sentence upon the criminal, in the background, and the physique and action of the private university teacher, in custody and on his way to his dungeon, are very jolly comedy indeed. Mr. Sambourne, however, in spite of much practice, does not often succeed with the German Emperor on the point of resemblance. Again, it is, perhaps, no very subtle joke to show Mr. Arthur Balfour in the blouse, hat, and skirt of a nursemaid of the popular classes, with two infant Bills upon his arms, and a rather more advanced Bill running unmanageably at his side on its own feet; but the designer has really put what must needs be called by the intelligible name of "fun," since with neither "wit" nor "humour" is it precisely suited, into the statesman's strangely attired face. Generally, it may be granted, Mr. Sambourne is rather ingenious than funny, rather ingenious than imaginative, and even rather ingenious than fanciful; and to what curious purposes he uses his extremities of invention may be seen in the design called "Interesting Development of the 'Josephus Cubicularius' Orchidensis." The collection of orchids—each one a Mr. Chamberlain—is managed with the most fantastic deliberateness of transformation, an almost Dantesque attention to the process of interchange of Colonial Secretary and flower, leg and petal, head and pistil of the blossom. As fantastic flower-drawing the work is remarkable, and it is more remarkable as a drawing of a fantastically flowering political humanity. Mr. Linley Sambourne has a decision and definition of line that stand well in the place of the more quietly commanding qualities of style. He draws with a grasp, grip, and weight more than ever to be commended now that a strangely insolent ignorance of drawing has become, for the time, the boast rather than the confession of a little group of illustrators.

H.—MR. HUGH THOMSON.

It is for far other qualities than those of well-grasped drawing and a solid-enclosing line that Mr. Hugh Thomson's illustrations of Miss Austen and Mr. Austin Dobson are acceptable. He has expression, to which Mr. Linley Sambourne hardly makes so much as the customary claim. He has prettiness in perfection, a less measure of grace, and a sense of the humour of manners. Miss Kate Greenaway showed him and others the way to illustrate the early century with a retrospective improvement, and her influential example has not been without its perils. She, too, draws without any sense of weight, her figures must float or fall but for the physical conditions of the pen and ink and paper, which keeps, at any rate, the outlines where they are; and it would be to do Mr. Hugh Thomson an injustice to suggest that his lack of turn, station, and gravitation is at all so conspicuous as hers, but with him, too, the charming effectiveness of the "quaint" (the word is almost too appropriate) has seemed to dispense with the presence of some of the fundamental qualities of drawing. It is not that he draws ill; he has none of the grotesque ignorance of the fugitive illustrators already mentioned; he has proportion, and such command of living design as gives him a command also of movement and of the inflexions of bodily expression; it is merely that he falls short of the fulness of drawing—of the solidity which the sure and searching line implies. For the rest, his designs are full of charm and interest. The "Pride and Prejudice" illustrations are perhaps too exclusively represented by a selection of prettinesses. Mrs. Bennet appears but once; that once is altogether admirable and gives the wish for more; and for Elizabeth's cousinly and clerical suitor, with whom also Mr. Hugh Thomson was successful to admiration, we look in vain. Nor have we the group of diners and the uncle "breathing port wine" which we remember with pleasure in the book; but instead there are those illustrations of the history of Elizabeth and Jane in which these discreet sisters appear at their prettiest. Mr. Hugh Thomson has shown in the absent designs some of his best qualities of spirit and comedy, qualities exquisitely suited to Jane Austen's own composure, vivacity, malice, and irony.

Mr. Hugh Thomson does these early-century figures the signal service of setting them free from the dismal popular art of their own time. He restores the women to what must, after all, have been their share of nature and beauty, though they were under the observation of no pencil able to render those graces; in a word, he takes the costume of the time (which he a little adorns, it must be owned) and the nature of all periods, and reconstructs a most charming woman. But, above all, he delivers the people of "Pride and Prejudice," "Emma," and "Sense and Sensibility" from the landscape of the illustrator of that and a nearly subsequent day. In our mind's eye, all that generation inhabited (it is an inevitable association of images) "modern mansions" set in motion—less shrubberies, with hard and deserted carriage-sweeps to their front doors, amid conditions of puerile but prevailing gloom. Mr. Hugh Thomson's trees, cottages, interiors, windows, little scraps of winter and spring—barely outlined—are fresh and full of talent.

At the same gallery (148, New Bond-street) Mr. Charles Sainton exhibits fourteen of his silver-point drawings—good examples of his own peculiar skill and feeling for beauty and fancy.

A. M.

OPERA.

"DER EVANGELIMANN" was performed for the second time last week. I intended to say something about the music, but find I shall have little space. And for that I am scarcely sorry, for, to speak frankly, there is not much to say about it. There is many a fine moment in the work; the music shows great skill and the orchestration is often effective, but the difficulty of getting at the real composer, who has covered himself with Wagner as with a thick garment, still remains great. I certainly think that the work given in English would be far more attractive here in England. And I also think it not at all unlikely that F. Kienzl will one day produce something of much stronger calibre. Nay, perhaps he has already done so, for a new opera of his has lately been produced. At the second performance Miss Meisslinger took the part of Magdalena; she was not, however, quite so sympathetic as Frä. Schumann-Heinck.

ANOTHER new opera, "Inez Mendo," composed by M. Fred. Regnal, was produced at Covent Garden on Saturday night. The French libretto, of which M. Beatty-Kingston has made a good translation, "after Prosper Mérimée," by MM. Decourcelle and Liorat, illustrates the old proverb: "The course of true love never did run smooth." Inez, daughter of a wealthy farmer, Juan Mendo, is in love with Salvador, son of a duke. Difference of station offers no hindrance; Salvador, however, kills a rival in duel, and, by the law of the land, is condemned to death. It devolves on the farmer to carry out the sentence, but at the fatal moment he throws away the axe and stabs himself, rather than slay his son-in-law—for by means of a marriage in extremis Salvador intends to leave Inez a duchess. The librettists have provided an alternative ending. According to one, the duke arrives on the scene bearing a royal pardon, but the death of Mendo prevents a bright close. According to the other version, Mendo recovers, and everything ends happily. There is a touch of worldly wisdom in this, and no doubt the latter will be more in request than the former. Why should not the public go home in a bright, happy frame of mind? is a practical question which managers cannot afford to neglect. At Covent Garden, however, the better part was chosen, far better in so far as the interests of dramatic art are concerned—Mendo dies.

The composer is comparatively young, and appears to have only written one opera previously, which was accepted by the late Sir A. Harris, yet never produced. Inez Mendo is a decidedly clever work. There are a few representative themes in it, but the composer has been influenced by Meyerbeer, Gounod, Bizet, far more than by Wagner. M. Regnal has a natural flow of melody, which, if as yet not very distinctive, is a very promising sign. Then, again, his dramatic instinct leads him to write music which, if not strong, is always appropriate. His technical knowledge is great, and he constructs and develops with an ease which many a composer of perhaps greater individuality might envy. The book, though it will scarcely bear very close investigation, offers to the composer excellent contrasts and effective situations, and of these much has been made. It seems of no use entering into further detail with respect to a work which probably will enjoy a fair measure of success, yet which, as soon as M. Regnal comes forward with another one of equal skill and stronger character, will speedily go the way of the majority of operas—i.e., will be forgotten.

"DON JUAN" was given for the first time this season on Tuesday evening. The performance, though in many ways praiseworthy, was unequal. Miss M. Mackintyre impersonated well the forlorn Elvira, but her voice was not in good order. She struggled, however, bravely through her part. Sometimes excuses are made for vocalists when there is little need; on this occasion an apology would have been most reasonable. Mme. Adiny as Donna Anna showed good intentions; her singing, however, lacked power, and her acting was stagey. Mlle. Zélie de Lussan played the part of Zerlina with much grace and animation. M. Renaud was the Don. His most artistic singing and refined, intelligent acting deserve all acknowledgment; and yet he was not an ideal Don. He showed that he had carefully studied his part, and for that very reason his rendering was not ideal. The Leporello of M. Fugère was extremely funny, although he might here and there be accused of slight exaggeration. He is probably one of the best Leporellos on the stage. M. Bonnard proved fairly successful as Don Ottavio, and M. Gilibert was amusing as Masetto. Signor Mancinelli conducted carefully.

The recitativo secco was accompanied on the harpsichord by Mr. Dolmetsch, who a few days previously had rendered a similar service in Le Nozze di Figaro. What, it may be asked, is the use of reviving this antiquated instrument? And it may be answered that the nearer we come to a composer's intentions the better. But if that be the motive, why should not those intentions be also respected on the stage? The Don Juan as given was very different from the Don Juan as conceived by Mozart. A performance as near as possible to the original one at Prague, one hundred and ten years ago, would be most interesting. But to introduce an instrument which in quality and power of tone is out of keeping with the size of the orchestra and of the house, and to permit certain things on the stage quite out of keeping with Mozart's intention—as, for instance, the singing of the chorus in the Finale of Act 1, the omission of Elvira's first song, and various other sins of commission and omission which cannot now be noticed in detail—these things recall the old saying about a certain straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Several encores were accepted, a most foolish return to eighteenth century practice. The public and the artists are most thoughtless. They have been trained in Wagner's music-dramas, the one not to make any demonstration during the course of an act, the other not to expect any applause, still less an encore. Yet neither seems to feel that what is good for Wagner is equally good for Mozart. The latter, following tradition—for he had not, like Wagner, time to reflect on his art—unfortunately tempted the public by his full closes to frequent applause and interruption of the course of the drama. But why should the public of the present day, knowing better, not render proper respect to a composer whose musical genius was great, whose dramatic instinct was keen, and who, if he had lived longer, would probably have written even a greater work for the stage than "Don Juan"?

J. S. S.

SCIENCE.

I DREW attention a few weeks ago in this column to the autobiographical account of the "New Astronomy" contributed to the Nineteenth Century by Dr. William Huggins. The magnificent work therein recorded has since received such public recognition as is supposed to be conveyed by a "Jubilee honour"; but before the well-earned title had even been conferred, and while yet the merits were being counted up, Dr. and Mrs. Huggins weighed in with a fresh achievement which alone was worth the recompense. It was a splendidly lavish thing to do, and in any ordinary person might have passed for a piece of bravado.

THE discovery referred to is contained in a paper read before the Royal Society on June 17, and is described in the Times of July 10 with a degree of accuracy so rare in secular journals as to bespeak the scientific hand. It is no less than the artificial reproduction of the two lines "H" and "K" in the coronal spectrum which have been supposed by students of eclipses to show the presence of calcium in an attenuated form within the flaming chromosphere. The persistence of these two solitary thin bars of light out of the seventy odd lines which characterise the ordinary spectrum of calcium, and their position within the broad dark lines of Fraunhofer, have formed a puzzle to astronomers and chemists, who could only surmise a reason for the disappearance of the others, and base on that their belief that calcium was indicated. Then, again, calcium gives a far heavier vapour than hydrogen or helium; yet that pair of lines haunting the ultra-violet limit appeared from whatever point of the solar excrescences the light was taken. Fiery prominences ranging, according to our measurements, 300,000 miles up from the globular mass of the sun, showed it to their very tips, along with, and probably beyond, the spectra of the lighter gases. To account for this we have to suppose either a violence of ejection which is inconceivable, or else something amounting to a violation of gravity. Hence there have been many who doubted whether those two shy lines really represent calcium.

PROF. YOUNG, in 1872, first examined these lines, which photography had given him in the chromospheric spectrum, but declined to accept them as representing calcium for the reasons given. Sir J. Norman Lockyer, who holds theories as to the gradual disintegration of our so-called terrestrial "elements" by heat into simpler substances, with less complex spectra, regarded the lines as due to a last constituent of calcium, from which everything else had been eliminated. What no one appeared able to do was to show that calcium vapour, when sufficiently attenuated, as it would be in the enormously rarefied atmosphere surrounding the sun, would give the "H" and "K" lines only for its spectrum; and this is what Sir William and Lady Huggins have now done, in a beautiful series of experiments. Thereby they have not only settled the immediate point that calcium exists in superabundant quantities throughout the solar chromosphere, but they have also laid the foundation of an important branch of research dealing with similar cases.

HAVING failed to raise a spark of enthusiasm for antarctic research out of our phlegmatic home Government, the Council of the Royal Geographical Society invited the Australasian Premiers to a Conference, and begged them to induce their Governments to do something in the matter. So many broad hints and open demands have now been made to them that they might well be feeling rather like guests who are asked to contribute to the expense of their entertainment. But I hope there is a real curiosity on the part of the Australasian Colonies to know what the pole nearest to them is like, and that they will contribute to the solution of its problems.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR STAMFORD RAFFLES.

Ipswich: July 11.

In the "Notes and News" of your current issue I read a Life of Sir Stamford Raffles, Governor of Java, is shortly to be issued, said to be "now first written." This seems an error, as in 1835 his widow published a Memoir of him in two volumes, octavo; Duncan, of London, an essay on the same "Sir Thomas Stamford Raffles" being taken from the fore-mentioned source, and published by James Burns, London, in the "second series" of "Lives of Englishmen," it being No. VI. of same.

THOMAS E. JONES.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

A BOOK OF THE HOUR.

THE WINDS OF MARCH. By George Knight.

Author of "Dust in the Balance," "Sapphira of the Stage," "Circle of the Earth." Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s.

"Since his last work Mr. George Knight has unquestionably advanced by leaps and bounds, and if this progress is maintained he must soon force his way into the very first rank of our novelists. It is a great novel...one of the best, if not the best novel that this season has produced. It is an ennobling and invigorating book that everyone should read."—Weekly Sun.

"The celibacy of the priesthood is a difficult subject to handle. But Mr. Knight's 'The Winds of March' cannot but add to his already considerable reputation. Told with a vigour, a pathos, and a wealth of poetic sympathy with all that is beautiful that make the book admirable from first to last."—Star.

THE REJUVENATION of MISS SEMAPHORE: a Farceful Novel. By HAL GODFREY.

Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 3s. 6d.

"It may be said to out-Anstey Anstey...as mirthful as may be." Daily Telegraph.

"A lightsome, laughable farce...some delightfully grotesque situations...the humour of the book is most enjoyable." Daily Mail.

"The clever expansion of a clever idea...Well written, drawn to the life, and full of fun...not a book to be missed."—Black and White.

BLIND LARRY: Irish Idylls. By LEWIS MACNAMARA.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Deserve to rank with Miss Jane Barlow's 'Irish Idylls'...One of the best contributions to Irish literature for some considerable time." Irish Independent.

"A picturesque group of idylls, the high literary quality of which alone suffices to recommend them irresistibly to general perusal. All are excellent word-paintings."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of exceptional merit, and cannot be too highly commended because of the literary treasure it contains. One of those intensely fascinating books."—Belfast News Letter.

Now ready, the First 5,000 Copies of the Sixth Volume in THE "DAFFODIL" LIBRARY OF SHORTER NOVELS

BY AUTHORS OF THE DAY,

VOL. VI.

ENTITLED

THE TOMBSTONE TREASURE. By FERGUS HUME.

Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab." Crown 12mo, paper, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, 2s.

"The interest of the story prevents the reader ever dreaming of laying aside the book till the end."—Glasgow Daily Mail.

"Told with vigour and originality. Mr. Fergus Hume is well able to make the most of a melodramatic plot."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick Lane, E.C. Of all Booksellers and at the Libraries.

Now Ready, No. 23, price 3s.

NEW SERIES. MIND. JULY, 1897.

A Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy.

Edited by G. F. STOUT.

With the Co-operation of Professor H. SIDGWICK, E. CAIRD, DR. VENN, DR. WARD, and Professor E. B. TITCHENER.

CONTENTS.

1. TYPES OF WILL. ALEXANDER F. SHAND.
2. ON THE RELATIONS OF NUMBER AND QUANTITY. B. RUSSELL.
3. HEGEL'S TREATMENT OF THE CATEGORIES OF THE SUBJECTIVE NOTION.—(II.) J. E. MCGILVER.
4. ARISTOTEL'S THEORY OF INCONTINENCE: a Contribution to Practical Ethics. W. H. FAIRBROTHER.
5. DISCUSSIONS: Reply to Mr. Muirhead's Criticism. Mrs. BAIN.
6. CRITICAL NOTICES: G. F. Stout: "Analytic Psychology." Professor Josiah Royce—Dr. H. Höfding: "Geschichte der neueren Philosophie" (Band II). Professor J. F. Bense—Mrs. K. C. Moore: "The Mental Development of a Child." Professor J. Sully—Albert Lévy: "Psychologie du Caractère." A. F. Shand—J. T. Mear: "A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century" (vol. 1). G. Sandeman.
7. NEW BOOKS.—8. PHILOSOPHICAL PERIODICALS.—9. NOTES AND NEWS: On the Temperature-Sense (I), by S. AIRAULT.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE.

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London; 24, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh; and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALl.

"A monument of painstaking and skilful work, which no one probably could have undertaken with so many advantages as Mr. Miall, or have accomplished with greater success."—Literary World.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Farnival Street, E.C.

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING:

C O C O A

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COLLECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CONTINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED, AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE CHANGES.

The characteristics of the literary matter, and of the advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE* ... ..	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS, the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 230, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896.

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman. "To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the

BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

The objections to them, and how they have been met.

Ceteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1316.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1897.

PRIME 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.
Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.
LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1442 lots.)
.. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (752, 753 lots.)
.. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 115, for JUNE), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street,
East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
28, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPIKE & Co.
MSB. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS of 27 and 28 West 3rd Street, New York, and 24 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 6512. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest month on month completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANAC, with full particulars, post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.—LAST WEEK.—
The EXHIBITION will CLOSE on the EVENING of MONDAY, AUGUST 2nd.

ROYAL ACADEMY of ARTS.—EVENING
EXHIBITION.—The EXHIBITION will be OPEN in the EVENING from MONDAY, JULY 26th, to MONDAY, AUGUST 2nd (Bank Holiday), from 7.30 to 10.30. Admission, 6d. Catalogues, 6d.—
On BANK HOLIDAY the Admission throughout the day will be 6d., on other days it will be as usual.

LAST TWO WEEKS.
ROYAL SOCIETY of PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 5A, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIEGFRIED H. HERRMANN, Jun., Secretary (pro tem.).

ROYAL STATISTICAL SOCIETY.
HOWARD MEDAL.
The SUBJECT of the ESSAYS for the HOWARD MEDAL, which will be awarded, with £20, in November, 1898, is as follows:—
"THE TREATMENT OF HABITUAL OFFENDERS with SPECIAL REFERENCE to their INCREASE or DECREASE in VARIOUS COUNTRIES."
Essays must be sent in on or before the 30th June, 1898.—For further particulars apply at the Offices of the Society, 9, Adelphi Terrace, Strand, W.C.

MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.
I.—PROFESSORSHIP OF MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY,
AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.
II.—PROFESSORSHIP OF METALLURGY.
The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above PROFESSOR-
SHIPS.
Applications, accompanied by thirty-five copies of Testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 18th of September.
The Candidates elected will be required to enter upon their duties as soon after the 1st of October, 1897, as possible.
Further particulars may be obtained from
Geo. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SHEFFIELD.
LECTURER IN PHILOSOPHY AND ECONOMICS.
The Council will proceed to the ELECTION of a LECTURER in PHILOSOPHY and ECONOMICS in September. Duties to commence in October next. Salary £200 at least, together with half the fees of the Lecturer's Classes.—For particulars apply to the Registrar.

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made daily qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 8, Furnival Street, London, E.C.

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.
PATRON—H. R. H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.
PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.
VICE-PRESIDENTS—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Very Rev.
the DEAN of LLANDAFF, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., Sir
HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.
TRUSTEES—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF,
Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY.
The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-
Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo.
price 21s.; to Members, 16s.
C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

EDUCATIONAL.

EPSOM COLLEGE.—ANNUAL EXAMINATION
for SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS early in JULY.
New Junior department just opened for 100 boys. Preparation for London Matric. and Prel. Scient. Exams. the Army, Navy, and Universities. Numerous recent successes. NEXT TERM begins
SEPTEMBER 16th.—Apply to the BURSAR, 6, The College, Epsom, Surrey.

SCHOLASTIC.—ASSISTANT MASTERS
WANTED, SEPTEMBER.
(1) Mathematics, French, Freehand Drawing, &c., for good Preparatory School. Experience necessary, and Hon. Deg. £150. Residence.
(2) Modern Languages and Gymnastic Classes for Grammar School.
Experienced Disciplinarian. £80—£100. Residence.
For these and other Vacancies, apply promptly to W. H. FRICKER
M.A., Teachers' Guild Registry, 74, Gower Street, W.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum. LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.	COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum. N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.
---	---

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BANTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY

74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER—PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 6s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:— 1896.

BEN JONSON ... ..	November	14
JOHN KEATS ... ..	"	21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... ..	"	28
TOM HOOD ... ..	December	5
THOMAS GRAY ... ..	"	12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ... ..	"	19
SIR WALTER SCOTT ... ..	"	26
1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON ... ..	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ... ..	"	9
LEIGH HUNT ... ..	"	16
LORD MACAULAY ... ..	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY ... ..	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..	February	6
CHARLES LAMB ... ..	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ... ..	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ... ..	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..	March	6
EDMUND WALLER ... ..	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS ... ..	"	20
JOHN MILTON ... ..	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER ... ..	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN ... ..	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ... ..	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG- FELLOW ... ..	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL ... ..	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING ... ..	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE ... ..	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ... ..	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS ... ..	"	29
JONATHAN SWIFT ... ..	June	5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ... ..	"	12
WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..	"	19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ... ..	"	26
ALEXANDER POPE ... ..	July	3
DOUGLAS JERROLD ... ..	"	10
FRANCIS BACON ... ..	"	17

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,
ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich,

the well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND

BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS
BOOKSELLERS, LIBRARY MEN, BOOK COL-LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE* ... ..	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE ... ..	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING
POSTAGE ... ..	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—THE ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,
whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.
"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records..... The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

LOGIA;

OR,

SAYINGS OF OUR LORD.

From an Early Greek Papyrus.

Discovered and Edited, with Translation and Commentary,
BY

B. P. GRENFELL, M.A., and A. S. HUNT, M.A.

CONTAINING—

TWO FACSIMILES of the PAPYRUS and WRITING.

EDITORS' INTRODUCTION.

REPRODUCTION of the ORIGINAL GREEK TEXT in PRINT, with RESTORATIONS.

THE LOGIA in MODERN GREEK TYPE, with TRANS-LATION of EACH SAYING into ENGLISH, and CRITICAL NOTES.

EDITORS' STATEMENT of PROBLEMS CONNECTED with the DISCOVERY and the DIRECTION in which its VALUE SEEMS CHIEFLY to LIE.

With Colotype Plates, stiff covers, 2s. net; or with Process
Reproductions, paper covers, 6d. net.

(Published for the Egypt Exploration Fund.)

By JOSEPH F. PAYNE, M.D. Oxon., Fellow and Censor of the College, Physician to St. Thomas's Hospital, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

HARVEY and GALEN. The Harveian
Oration. Delivered before the Royal College of Physicians, October 19th, 1896.

CLARENDON PRESS LIST.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

SOURCES for GREEK HISTORY

between the PERSIAN and PELOPONNESIAN WARS.
Collected and Arranged by G. F. HILL, M.A., of the British Museum, Fellow of University College, London.

MANCHESTER REVIEW.—"A most meritorious volume from every point of view."

Demy 8vo, Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged, 12s.

CHAPTERS of EARLY ENGLISH

CHURCH HISTORY. By WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D., Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford.

Just published, Second Edition, small 4to, 10s. 6d.

REGISTRUM SACRUM ANGLI-

CANUM: an Attempt to Exhibit the Course of Episcopal Succession in England. By W. STUBBS, D.D.

The TIMES.—"It is needless to point out how useful such a volume should be. The mediæval portion has been greatly improved through the increase of knowledge which has come from the researches of scholars."

Just published, in 2 vols., medium 8vo, half-roan, 28s.

*.* Uniform with Dr. BIRKBECK HILL'S Editions of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" and "Letters of Samuel Johnson."

JOHNSONIAN MISCELLANIES.

Arranged and Edited by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL,
D.C.L., LL.D., Honorary Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford.

ACADEMY.—"We have now, in all, eight volumes of 'Life, Letters, and Miscellanies,' embodying practically all that is known, and all that ever will be known, of Dr.
Johnson."

A SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME TO "THE OXFORD CHAUCER."

Now ready, demy 8vo, cloth, 18s.

*.* Uniform with the Library Edition of Chaucer's Works.

CHAUCERIAN and OTHER PIECES.

Edited from numerous Manuscripts by the Rev. W. W.
SKEAT, Litt.D.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS
WA HOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Machiavelli .....	63
On the Navy .....	63
A Great Churchman .....	64
Aristotle for the Million .....	65
The Yew .....	66
Peter the Great .....	67
Another Faust Translation .....	68
Mrs. Urquhart .....	68
In Finland .....	69
FROM CROWDED SHELVES .....	69
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books .....	71
New Books Received .....	71
NOTES AND NEWS .....	72
A BUNDLE OF EPITAPHS .....	74
Jean Ingelow .....	74
"SHELLEY" .....	76
THE BOOK MARKET .....	76
WHAT AMERICA READS .....	77
MUSIC .....	77
SCIENCE .....	77
CORRESPONDENCE .....	78
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED .....	79
FICTION SUPPLEMENT .....	37-40

REVIEWS.

MACHIAVELLI.

Machiavelli: The Romanes Lecture, 1897.
By John Morley. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE great and curious Bayle, who wrote erudite folios with an indecent skittishness, opens his account of Machiavelli with the remark that he was "un homme de beaucoup d'esprit et une très-belle plume." The phrase is not exhaustive; and yet, O si sic omnes! Niccolo Machiavelli did not, whatever Butler may say, "give his name to our Old Nick," nor did he deserve so singular a distinction. Yet four centuries have shuddered at his name: "Machiavellian" has rivalled "Jesuitical" as the proper epithet for dark and tortuous ways. "Captain Machiavel," as Burton calls him; "one of the doctors of Italy," as Bacon has it; a "patriarch of evil," according to Ascham, stands for most men by the side of Cæsar Borgia: one, the man of monstrous principle, the other, of monstrous practice. To quote a veteran mystic:

"Thou art the atheist of the world, and thou Hast earth for seal and star upon thy brow."

Mr. Morley is to be thanked, in that he has not joined his mighty voice to the chorus of condemnation; he discriminates, illustrates, puts historical imagination into his final censure, and passes judgment with no note of unctuous rectitude.

What Machiavelli valued was ability, that Italian conception of virtù, which means virility far more than virtue; the quality of vigour, mental and physical, which enables a man, who is indeed a man, to achieve his ends and maintain his achievement. Luther's peccata fortiter smacks of him: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might"; do it like a man, make certain-sure of success. Impotence is his scorn and loathing; mismanaged vice, mediocre virtue, how feeble they are, how stupid, what signs of inability. Of his contemporary Florentines he hates chiefly the timid statesman Piero Soderini. He pillories the weakling in an epigram, which contains Mr. Kipling's "Tomlinson" in four lines:

"La notte che morì Pier Soderini
L'alma n'andò dell' inferno alla bocca;
E Pluto le gridò: Anima sciocca,
Che inferno? va nel limbo de' bambini."

To be "neither for God nor for His enemies" was despicable in Dante's eyes; and the sentiment is perfectly Machiavellian, one might almost say perfectly Italian and not a little Roman. There is scarce a word in Machiavelli which shows an hatred of good, a choice of evil. He praises Saints Dominic and Francis as true followers and restorers of primitive Christianity. They made religion operative, effective, a real power; and Machiavelli thought religion a very good thing. He was no saint, far from it; he had no personal sense of religion, no touch of spiritual emotion; but he could not away with a Church which did not do its work. Had the Church in Italy done its proper work Italy would not have become "the poison and reproach of the world," a place of all lawlessness and disorder. Did the Church do its duty, it would inculcate those private and public virtues which are good for the patria, strengthening its stability, preserving its peace; if the Church also teaches the way to heaven—well, he has no objection to that, though terrestrial politics mean more to him than the Civitas Dei. He would heartily applaud the French policy of Leo XIII. and the "rallied" Catholics. Like Carlyle, though without his idealism, he hated confusions, weaknesses, and loved a strong man of no scruples, while approving also of a firm democracy. He was a true Italian patriot—as true as Petrarch, the first to cry Italia mia in the sense of Italia una. Doubtless, he is as black as the pit by the side of Mazzini, that white soul; but between the two stretches a vast period, full of an ever-increasing humanity. Machiavelli had humanism in place of humanity. He learned from Greek and Roman histories—chiefly from the Roman—and from the past and present history of his own country and state. "There scarcely is any maxim," says Hume, "in his Prince, which subsequent experience has not entirely refuted." Not quite so, though true in the main; but those unscrupulous maxims were true to his own experience, and to his knowledge of the past. He lays it down, as a cheerful presupposition to be held by every lawgiver, tutti gli uomini essere cattivi; in other words, that mankind "in the loomp is bad." And yet we gather a painfully like impression from Thucydides or Tacitus; and Machiavelli is a kind of soulless Thucydides or sinister Tacitus, a man walking through dry places; and Italy of the Renaissance abounded in dry wastes of wickedness and glittering evil. Machiavelli invented nothing. He systematised the teachings of his times, and pointed the moral from antiquity. Lord Acton says of him, in a right Machiavellian phrase, that he "released government from the restraint of law." Unquestionably, for might is right, and "whatever is"—i.e., has proved itself the fittest or strongest by surviving—"is right." He handled these matters as De Quincey handled the "fine art" of murder; but where De Quincey was humorous and fantastic, Machiavelli was straightforward and most serious. To him, those regrettable incidents, murder, lying, treachery, are sometimes necessities of politics; how can you read your books, and look about you, and doubt it? "What constitutes a state" is strength of brain and arm, not sympathy of rulers and ruled; at the least, the sympathy can but be the admiration of the ruled for the ability of the rulers, and a certain tactful power in the rulers to keep the ruled quiet, amused, contented with their panis et circenses. As Paul de Saint-Victor puts in, in his admirable essay upon Cæsar Borgia: "C'est en naturaliste plutôt qu'en historien que Machiavel envisage les affaires humaines. Il formule les lois du succès, sans les blâmer ni les justifier; il n'a ni préférence ni système." It is terrible to us; not so to the men of the Borgia times, an age of blood and lust and paganism, when Alexander VI. was the Vicar of Christ, and Savonarola but fuel for the flames. To consolidate and confirm the patria Machiavelli would use, with equal calmness, the infinitely great in crime or the infinitely little; peccata fortia and tragic sins, or petty chicaneries and attorney's tricks. And he was a man who enjoyed life; he liked his country retreat, his talks with his humbler neighbours, the pleasures of the town. He wrote comedies, and was no inhuman pedagogue of immoral statecraft, hugging himself in seclusion for joy of his own wickedness and infamous reputation. He was the incarnation, in the sphere of thought, of Italian insensibility to the things of the spirit, of Italian deadness to the moral sense; but he was in no way a Florentine Faust, who sells his soul as the price of initiation into political wickedness and the arts of a godless diplomacy. Next to his sincere patriotism, his paramount emotion was what Church calls "grim, terrible humour, telling of intense scorn in the background, at the wickedness and, still more, the weakness round him." His nervous, laconic style vibrates with the energies of zeal and scorn; the Roman accents are on his tongue. It is with the magnificent and mighty lines of Petrarch that he ends his Prince; it shows the nobility of his aim, which was also that of Dante and Michael Angelo, while his means were those sanctioned by the common conscience of Italians, except in men like-minded with those two glories of Florence and of Italy:

"Virtù contro al furore
Prendera l'arme, e fia il combatter corto;
Chè l'antico valore
Negli Italiani cuor non è ancor morto."

ON THE NAVY.

Naval Administrations, 1827-1892. By the late Sir J. H. Briggs. (Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

THE Review at Spithead has come and gone, and England has made the grandest display of her force at sea which has ever been seen. Yet a work such as this, which records the course of our naval administrations during sixty-five years, and notes their varied excellences and defects, is not out of place, or without present value. For the late Sir John Briggs, an Admiralty official of immense experience, has told us in these pages how uncertain has been the progress of our maritime strength in this long period; how its ascendancy has been more than once threatened; how it has suffered from false economy and routine; and how, unrivalled as it certainly is at this moment, there is still room for reform and improvement, bearing in mind the exigencies of modern war, and the necessity of defending a world-wide empire. The book, too, abounds in interesting anecdotes and details, and, apart from its importance, is very pleasant reading.

The period comprised in this volume may be divided into three parts. The first part extends from 1827 to about 1850, when the British navy still depended on sails for movement, and seamanship was deemed the peculiar merit of a British naval officer. The matériel of the Fleet was immensely improved in these years, spite of the obstruction of men of the old school—Sir George Cockburn was the foremost of them; though the type of the warship remained the same, and a few small vessels marked the advent of steam, Nelson would have been amazed at the giant sail of the line—surpassing the Orient and the Santissima Trinidad—which carried the flags of Stopford and Napier. This great progress was partly due to the efforts of Nelson's Hardy, a far-sighted and most capable man; it became most conspicuous under the administration of Sir James Graham, one of the most efficient and able of First Lords. For many reasons, however, the personnel of the Fleet was in an unsatisfactory condition throughout this period. The enormous merchant marine absorbed our seamen; the power of the pressgang was all but gone; there was no excitement of war to attract men to the flag; the pay of the sailor was too low; there was nothing resembling a proper reserve.

The service, besides, was crowded with old officers, and favouritism was but too prevalent; no wonder then, as Sir John Briggs informs us, that we feared a war with France in 1841 and 1844. The second period is of great length—say, from 1850 to 1885. It marked a complete revolution in naval affairs. Steam was gradually applied to the largest warship; the ironclad was launched, the heavy gun created; every navy was completely transformed. England was certainly backward in this mighty change. France produced the Napoleon and the Gloire, ships which, for the moment, we could not equal; the Monitor and the turret battery were first seen in America. The traditions of the Nile and Trafalgar, in fact, were too strong with us; and the Admiralty, as Sir John Briggs points out, clung too long to the memories of a glorious past. The apotheosis of our renowned sailing Fleet was seen in the splendid naval review which took place after the Crimean War; yet veteran admirals were still heard to say that in war we should turn again to the sailing ship of the line. Our iron-clad Fleet slowly became larger; but it was composed of a great variety of types, a circumstance by no means in its favour; and the fate of the Captain was a startling instance how long reliance was placed on obsolete routine. The improvement in the personnel of the Fleet was much greater; the continuous service and training systems formed a reserve; the system of retirement effected by Mr. Childers quickened promotion and put nepotism down; and the status of the man-of-war's men having been made much better, while ironclads required comparatively few men, we had an ampler supply of good seamen for the requirements of the Navy than in the former period. Still, the system of gunnery and guns was far from excellent; in organisation, in the means of defending the empire, in all the appliances needed for an immense service, we were by no means up to the exigencies of the time; and at the close of this period we had nothing like the ascendancy at sea which our fathers possessed. Meanwhile, an immense and far-reaching change had been affecting England and our international interests. Our dominions had been extending over all parts of the world; our commerce had doubled and even trebled; the development of Free Trade had made these islands dependent on foreign lands for the necessities of life; the application of steam to our war marine had made it inevitable that supplies of coal should be forthcoming at numerous naval stations; the celerity which was a condition of modern warfare rendered efficient organisation of supreme importance. And, at the same time, other Powers were largely increasing their navies: those of France and Russia at the close of this period were probably not very inferior to our own; and in 1885 England was less prepared to resist a coalition of foes at sea, and all that might be produced by their efforts, than she was since the war of 1776-83.

This revolution is well described in this volume; a memorandum from the pen of Sir John Briggs, written as long ago as 1867-8, shows how our maritime power was relatively in decline; and we need not refer to the celebrated minute of Lord Charles Beresford, as remarkable as the warning letter of Wellington in 1847. The facts were well known to many observers; and several First Lords endeavoured to avert a growing national danger by timely reforms. But the spirit of the Manchester School prevailed in our councils; the Empire was deemed a huge costly burden; the value of the Colonies was denied; "bloated naval armaments" was a phrase in high places; even the tremendous lessons of 1870-71 were thrown away on the men in office in England. The insufficiency and weakness of our resources at sea were made apparent in 1885, when Lord Northbrook, our Marshal Leboeuf, proclaimed that the Fleet was in perfect order, and in a few months admitted the exact contrary. We have now arrived at the third period; in the last twelve years astonishing efforts, seconded by an intelligent Press and by a school of naval officers—scientific, well-informed, and set free from tradition—have been made to restore our power at sea; Parliament has voted ample sums for the purpose; and Lord

George Hamilton and Lord Spencer have presided at the Admiralty with the best results. The extraordinary contrast between the Fleet assembled at the naval review of 1887—ill-assorted, really feeble, and largely obsolete—and the magnificent array of warships we have just witnessed, shows how rapid and successful has been this progress. There is little doubt that England could now contend against any probable league of enemies at sea. The improvement, too, has been not less certain in all departments of naval administration—in organisation, in preparation for war, and for the protection of our gigantic commerce: in the personnel and the mechanism of our armed marine, and, above all, in the readiness to strike should the occasion arise. Sir John Briggs, however, contends that further reforms are necessary before we can safely say that our naval supremacy has been assured; that we are masters of the seas as in the day of Nelson. We shall not pronounce upon this assertion; enough to remark that from every point of view, and for reasons obvious to everyone who can reflect, our maritime ascendancy is more than ever necessary to the power, nay to the existence, of England.

A GREAT CHURCHMAN.

The Life, Letters, and Writings of John Davenant, D.D. (1572-1641), Lord Bishop of Salisbury. By Morris Fuller. (Methuen.)

"HE was remarkably born in the seventh month of his conception, and remarkably preserved in the first half seven years from his birth, falling down a high pair of stairs, and rising at the bottom with so little harm that he smiled—God and His good angels keeping him for further service in the Church."

The italics are ours. The passage is Cassan's. The child was the Bishop. Mr. Fuller says that his biography of Bishop Davenant "illustrates, and is meant to be, an ideal picture of the via media of the Anglican Church." Good; but that tumble down the stairs, and sundry other incidents that caught our eye on first opening Mr. Fuller's book, have prepossessed us so much with the worthy Bishop himself that we are inclined to let his doctrine go by the board. Davenant was a moderate Calvinist under James I. Under Charles I. he submitted to the Laudian rule in matters of Church ordinance, remaining a moderate Calvinist at heart. In both stages of his career he won the love of all parties by those qualities of mildness, catholicity, and benevolence which are reflected in the long, grave, and formally bearded face fronting the title-page of this book. Let us, however, know the man better.

John Davenant was born in Watling-street, London, his father being a wealthy merchant. In July, 1587, he entered Queen's College, Cambridge. Mr. Fuller digresses considerably into the history of the college, and is forgiven for the sake of his quotation from Fuller concerning the College ale. This beverage had been declared by connoisseurs to be "raw, small, and windy," which is an awful indictment, and Erasmus, according to tradition, used to have wine sent him to Queen's from London, and "sometimes encouraged his faint ale with the mixture thereof." After imbibing ale and learning in suitable proportions, Davenant was ordained somewhere about 1597. He took his first degree in divinity, that of bachelor, in 1601. Seven years later he was Lady Margaret Professor, and his D.D. degree quickly followed. Cambridge, moreover, soon discovered that the Doctor united shrewdness to learning, and in the great disputations on Justifying Faith, Predestination, and Election—disputations which were frequently "mapped out for the entertainment" of James I. and Charles I.—Davenant was the favourite Moderator. His rise, indeed, was assured. In 1614 he was unanimously elected President of Queen's College. He held that position for seven years in great esteem, and then his closer connexion with the Court began. James wanted four English theologians to attend the Dort Synod, where an attempt was to be made to reconcile the Arminians and the Calvinists. Their disputes were technical, some were trivial; and the sublapsarian and the super-lapsarian hypotheses may be now left to those whom they keenly interest. The Bishop is still to be thought of as flesh and blood, and as a great Englishman. The Hollanders received Davenant and his companions with the utmost respect. Although the English deputies were in a peculiar position (they attended not as representatives of their Church, but only as friendly delegates from James), Davenant impressed his personality on the proceedings; "his part being the best in that work," according to Hacket. His success, indeed, won Davenant his bishopric.

Davenant's consecration was preluded by circumstances which may be counted among the oddest in our ecclesiastical history. In 1621 no less than four Bishops-designate were awaiting consecration, and it seemed as if their waiting would be long. There was Dr. Williams, elected to Lincoln, who was said to be ambitious of the Primacy; there was Laud waiting for St. David's chair; there were Dr. Carey and Dr. Donne. The obstacle to the consecration of these men was this. The Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Abbott, had just stained his hands with blood; he had shot a gamekeeper. The accident—for, of course, it was an accident—took place on Lord Zouch's estate of Bramshill Park, in Hampshire. Mr. Fuller says:

"The scandal occasioned by the circumstance will scarcely be credited in these days. Many of the learned and conscientious divines lamented it with bitter tears. They considered our Church as dishonoured by it in the eyes of all Christendom. It was a matter of serious doubt among them, whether the shedding of blood, although purely accidental, did not utterly disqualify a Bishop from the performance of any sacred office. . . . The Archbishop himself was nearly inconsolable. He retired to Guildford to await the issue of this disastrous adventure."

James, always shrewd and often kind, had much compassion on his distraught Primate, and is said to have remarked: "An angel might have miscarried in that sort"; but he could not pacify the Bishops and the purists. Some of the Bishops declared that "if they had fallen into the like mischance, they would never have despaired of God's mercy for the other life; but, from this world they would have retired, and besought His Majesty for a pension to support them in their sequestered sadness." A rather comic utterance! The end of it was that the Archbishop stood aside and the four were consecrated by a commission of Bishops. Davenant duly went to Salisbury, where he settled his household, consisting of himself and his widowed sister Margaret, who had at least nine children. Davenant was pledged to celibacy. It is good to think of him there; as Mr. Fuller says: "The physical surroundings must have been very picturesque; the cathedral Close, with the different canons' and other official residences, with their beautiful gardens, and in the centre of all the magnificent spire of the pure, unmixed Gothic cathedral itself, with its striking air of simplicity, lightness, and grace." But the order and grace of the cathedral were not typical of the diocese that spread far and wide around it. "The See of St. Osmund," says Mr. Fuller, "had passed through many changes and vicissitudes, and not only had the grand old 'Sarum Use' given way to a slovenly state of things at the 'paramount' cathedral itself, but throughout the diocese there was great laxity, even of morals, and a general state of spiritual torpor." Lazy and unlearned parsons, strife and confusion in church government, and brawling during services, were all common. Puritan parsons and churchwardens gave great trouble. One of Davenant's first duties was to receive the confession of one Sherfield, who had pleasantly opened a service in St. Edmund's, Salisbury, by smashing a stained glass window with his staff. But Davenant was equal to his duties, which he discharged with mildness for twenty years.

Yet his tending of his sheep did not stay Davenant's prolific pen. Mr. Fuller discusses his principal writings at length. Alike in his Exposition of the Epistle to the Colossians, and in his Dissertation on the Death of Christ, and in Letters on the Old Religion, the Bishop of Sarum is seen as a sound Anglican, a walker in the via media. Nowhere is Davenant's opposition to the Papacy more uncompromising than in his Fast Sermon delivered at Westminster Abbey on April 5, 1628. This sermon has long been lost, but Mr. Morris Fuller set himself to find it. After a prolonged search he lit on it—where, after all, it ought to have been—in the British Museum. "Behold, wee come unto thee, for thou art the Lord, our God," served the Bishop of Sarum for the text of a sermon, which is a fine specimen of the laborious preaching of the day. Another sermon that Davenant came up to London to deliver got him into hot water. This, indeed, was the sole adventure that broke the even tenor of his bishoply walk. Charles I., more devout and less theological than his father, no sooner came to the throne than he began to handle religious subjects. Influenced by his training and by Laud, he resolved to extinguish what he deemed profitless discussions on Predestination and Election. He forbade "all curious search" into these subjects. The king's ukase was fiercely resented by those most concerned. Davenant does not appear to have fully understood the King's will, and in preaching a Lent sermon before the Court he trod on the forbidden ground. Charles was intensely annoyed, the Bishop a little frightened and very penitent. The effect of the incident seems to have been that Davenant kept much at Salisbury. Here he died in his palace, surrounded by Davenants and Townsends, at the age of seventy-one, after a life in which serenity had never been bought by selfishness or weakness. By this careful and always readable study of Bishop Davenant Mr. Morris Fuller has rendered a great service to our national biography and to our national Church history.

ARISTOTLE FOR THE MILLION.

Lectures in the Lyceum; or, Aristotle's Ethics for English Readers. Edited by St. G. Stock. (Longmans & Co.)

ARISTOTLE for English readers! Does the English reader, you may ask, very much want to read Aristotle? Does he not rather regard him, as a famous hero of fiction regarded him, as the "Staggerer," as a philosopher who was not particularly intelligible while he lived, has now been dead for a couple of thousand years or so, and is of no possible interest but to such as are reading for the school of Littera Humaniores at Oxford? The average English reader, it is to be feared, has taken too literally the maxim laid down by Sydney Smith in his essay on the classics in modern education, that nothing will serve in literature but the blackest ingratitude, that we must kick down the ladder by which we have climbed. And the English reader probably imagines that he has kicked down Aristotle. In great measure Aristotle is himself to blame. He never took the trouble to make himself attractive. We may suspect that he had a sort of contempt for the graces of his predecessor Plato. Even from the scholar who can read Greek with his feet upon the fender he demands a wakeful brain, having a way of putting his main proposition into a casual, but concise, sentence of half a dozen words. In a literal English translation he is something to shudder at. Probably no philosopher but Kant ever presented his thoughts in such unattractive garb.

Nevertheless, the English reader is undoubtedly wrong. For whereas we have advanced to a considerable distance beyond the Greeks in sanitation, in steam navigation, in electrical engineering, and many other things, it is by no means clear that we have likewise outstripped them in either poetry or philosophy. Our historians are more careful of their facts than was Herodotus; the rawest M.B. at the London hospital could give Galen seven symptoms and a beating; but we certainly cannot write a better epic than was produced by the people called Homer, and it may be doubted whether the philosophers of the past two thousand years have taught us more in the way of speculative ethics than may be found in Plato and Aristotle. These two writers seem to have laid down once for all the lines, idealistic and practical, on which human thought concerning human conduct must run, and to-day every little boy and girl—if we may adapt Mr. W. S. Gilbert—who is born into the world alive is either a little Platonist or a little Aristotelian, according as his mind leans to the idealistic or the practical side.

It is with the purpose of helping the English reader to understand the basis of all ethical theory, as well as in order to help the Oxford undergraduate through his "Schools," that Mr. St. George Stock has published this excellent work. He wrote it, as he tells us in his preface, during the Long Vacation of 1893, though it has been modestly withheld from publication for three and a half years. It is in no sense a translation of the ethics—that work Mr Stock has already partially performed—but rather a series of papers, cast into dialogue in which Aristotle is the chief speaker, and following closely the lines of the original treatise. But Mr. Stock forces Aristotle to explain himself, to drop in here a luminous illustration, there an acknowledgment of a difficulty, until the original crabbedness disappears, and you are face to face with a clear exposition of the philosophy of a practical man of the world. And it is to the practical man of the world that the Aristotelian system of ethics will always appeal, even though its originator go unread. The conception of virtue as a middle course between two extremes, the frequent appeal to the "sensible man," the "reasonable man," the man who thinks, the acceptance of moral facts as principles, all mark the thinker who thinks with one eye on the world as it is. Where will you find a more admirable definition of happiness—eudaimonia—which Aristotle assumes, on the authority of all reasonable men, to be the supreme ethical end—he calls it, by the way, "political," thinking that the well-being of the individual is the business of the state—"an activity of the soul in accordance with virtue in a complete life?" (Mr. Stock, by the way, translates "a perfect life," which contains some slight ambiguity; he has, however, influential support.) We cannot call to mind anyone who has bettered this account of the end of human action, though many have paraphrased it. What is it but the late Prof. Green's "self-realisation"—self-realisation "writ clear"? As an illustration of Mr. Stock's method we may give the passage in which he expands and expounds the saying—hard because it is so compressed—which really lies at the foundation of Aristotle's ethical system: τὸ δ' ὅτι πρῶτον καὶ ἀρχή.

"Now our science is not a speculative, but a practical one. There are many subjects which we may have to touch, but which we shall not be able to go into, for fear the by-work should exceed the work. Neither is it possible to ask the reason why in all cases alike. We must often be content with the fact, as in the case of first principles. Now the fact constitutes a starting-point and first principle. For it is the non-existence or indiscoverability of the reason why that makes a thing to be a first principle. The moment you give a reason for it it ceases to be so, and the reason given takes its place. So that to challenge first principles is to become involved in an infinite regress."

It would be difficult to put more clearly the position which Aristotle takes up in starting from the acknowledged facts of morality as a firm basis for his ethical philosophy.

In fine, we are grateful to Mr. Stock for his effort to give modern dress and ornament to a philosopher whose influence on thought is perennial. We would even recommend these lectures to the attention of the man in the street who, with an occasional hour to spare for thinking, has become mentally confused by the ignorant assertion and morbid speculation of some ephemeral prophet. Let him follow Mr. Stock back to Aristotle for a week or so—he could not have a more instructive and amusing guide. And he will probably learn enough to conclude that he has not gone backwards after all.

THE YEW.

The Yew-trees of Great Britain and Ireland.

By John Lowe, M.D. (Macmillan & Co.)

DR. LOWE'S is one of those modest books which by the painstaking thoroughness and zeal of their authors stand out prominently among scores of more pretentious volumes, and often enjoy a far fuller measure of life. When intelligent men produce what we may call labour-of-love books they have always interest and often value above the regular periodical products of professional authors. The study of yew-trees has been Dr. Lowe's hobby for many years; he has given to it most of the leisure of a busy life, and here, plainly and orderly set forth, are the fruits of his observation, thought, and reading on the subject. The result is a monograph on the yew, which promises to be a standard work for many years.

Yews are very well worth writing about. There are larger, more majestic, more historic, and more beautiful English trees; but none so feeds the imagination as the yew. Dark legends appertain to the yew: it stands sentinel over our dead, and once it furnished the stuff of which England's greatness was made. But in our respect for the tree we are apt to have too little respect for the truth. Dr. Lowe's correction of exaggerated estimates as to the age of yews is not the least valuable part of his book. He decides upon sufficient data that the fair method of computation is to allow about fifty-six years for each foot of diameter. Persons who measure trees for age should take their measurements about three feet from the ground. Dr. Lowe indeed brushes away a quantity of superstition concerning the age of yews. With reference to the mistaken practice of ascribing to a tree the age of an adjacent building, he writes:

"To show the absurd deductions to which it may lead, there are in Kent two contiguous parishes, the churchyards of which have each a large yew, the one 16 feet and the other 17 feet in girth. The churches are eleventh and fourteenth century, so that there would in this way be three centuries of difference.

So many causes contribute to variation of the rate of growth in yew-trees that exact calculations as to age are impossible, but Dr. Lowe's allowance of years per foot may be taken as a good working rule. Dr. Lowe adds to his chapters on the age of the tree a list of the yews in Great Britain and Ireland which have a circumference of ten feet and more. We gather that he offers the list as exhaustive, but it is not so. The present writer is at this moment seated within six yards of two yew-trees which, at three feet from the ground, have a girth of between ten and eleven feet, and yet are not noted by Dr. Lowe.

Various reasons are given to account for the planting of yews in churchyards. It is said to be sacred: the Druids sacrificed in groves of yews, and when Christianity superseded Druidism the character of the tree was preserved. Evelyn maintains that branches of yew being employed in processions, it was well to have the tree handy to the church. Others consider it a substitute for the sacred palm—in East Kent yew is still called palm by rustics. Another writer affirms that yew being an evergreen, it was considered typical of the immortality of the soul. A more prosaic reason is that the yew offers shelter to the sacred buildings, but it is rarely that the tree is sufficiently near or large to protect anything but the lych-gate. Dr. Lowe, however, while entertaining all such theories as possible, gives his support to the contention that yew-trees were grown in churchyards in order that there might be a continual supply of bow-staves for our English bowmen. As Mr. Conan Doyle has sung—

"What of the bow?
The bow was made in England;
Of true wood, of yew wood,
The wood of English bows."

In the reign of Richard III. a general plantation of yew-trees was ordered for the use of archers, and in the reign of Elizabeth it was enjoined that yew-trees should be planted in churchyards to ensure their cultivation and also to protect cattle from their leaves. To-day, although most churchyards have each a yew-tree, we can have little idea of how common the trees once were. Of those that were planted for bows all must have perished. People who talk glibly of the yews on the Pilgrims' Way having been planted to mark the track are totally mistaken, says Dr. Lowe, although the predecessors of the present trees may, of course, have answered that purpose. At Merrow, above Guildford, there are wonderful trees beside the track. A scrutiny of old statutes shows that although some English bows were made of English yew, for the majority outlandish wood, imported from the Hanse towns and other places, was used. An Act of Elizabeth fixes the prices thus:

"Bows meet for men's shooting, being outlandish yew of the best sort, not over the price of 6s. 8d.; bows meet for men's shooting, of the second sort, 3s. 4d.; bows for men, of a coarser sort, called livery bows, 2s.; bows being English yew, 2s."

The best bows were made of Spanish yew. To-day bows are made of hickory or other American woods, as the yew is no longer sufficiently free from knots. It is probable that when we grew yew for bows the trees were planted close together. No yew that is allowed to express its individuality unchecked will furnish forth a bow.

The poisonous nature of the yew may not be generally known. Dr. Lowe gives instances of yew-poisoning:

"A female patient in the Cheshire County Asylum was seized with an attack of faintness, followed by convulsions resembling epilepsy, and died within an hour. Five grains of yew leaves and some small seeds (? yew) were found in the stomach. She must either have chewed a large quantity of leaves, and swallowed the juice, or some other cause of death must have existed, for five grains is far too small an amount to prove fatal in so short a time. Taylor speaks of a lunatic who died in fourteen hours from the effect of chewing the leaves; and another fatal case occurred in the Shrewsbury Asylum. . . . In the presence of this tendency it would certainly seem desirable that all poisonous shrubs, and especially yew, should be excluded from the grounds of asylums."

On the other hand, yew affords a drug of value in medicine. Opinions differ as to the precise effect of toxin, the definite alkaloid or active principle of the yew, which was discovered in the leaves by Marmé in 1876; but it is agreed that it is useful. Dr. Lowe says:

"I have undertaken a large series of experiments with toxin, made on myself at various times. The tracings of the pulse show beyond doubt that it is a cardiac tonic of no mean value. The heart's action is decreased in frequency by small doses, such as one-twentieth to one-eighth of a grain, at the same time that the cardiac pressure is distinctly increased. These effects I have found to be durable. In large doses it generally depresses the heart's action. On the whole, it contrasts favourably with digitalis and convallaria, and is worthy of more extended observation."

Animals are also liable to yew-poisoning, but, Dr. Lowe decides, only where they eat copiously, or when the branches have been cut. Dr. Lowe says:

"On inquiring of a very intelligent resident at Tintern whether cattle suffered from eating the yew, so abundant in the vicinity, he replied that they never ate sufficient to injure them unless it was cut. And an old shepherd on Box Hill told me that his cows frequently ate the leaves of this tree, but never took any harm from it, as they were turned out daily, and therefore never took a hurtful quantity. When they have been shut up, and especially when the ground is covered with snow, the result is very different, as they eat greedily of the only green thing visible."

Dr. Lowe's summary is that deer, sheep, goats, hares, and rabbits eat yew without harm. Cattle and horses, if not freshly turned out, do not eat sufficient to cause any evil. To revert for a moment to yew-poisoning of human beings, it might be mentioned here that schoolboys are fond of taking the small red fruit of the yew into their mouths, mixing the slimy juice with their saliva, and then expectorating it. They are careful not to swallow any. The berries when thus used go by the name of "spitagobs."

Enough has been said to prove the interest and thoroughness of Dr. Lowe's book, which is indispensable to anyone drawn to the study of this fascinating and sombre tree. It is also a very agreeable companion to a traveller in the British Isles, for Dr. Lowe offers notes on all the celebrated yew-trees in the kingdom, which he seems to know intimately, just as Dr. Holmes knew the New England elms, and of several of which he gives good pictures. There are a few errors of hurry. On p. 200, for instance, for "Brailley's History of Surrey" read "Brayley's," and, on p. 201, the date of Gilpin's Forest Scenery should be 1794, not 1694. But these are unimportant.

"GREAT" AND CRUEL.

Peter the Great. By K. Waliszewski. Translated from the French by Lady Mary Loyd. In 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

It would not be strictly fair to describe M. Waliszewski as Peter the Great's apologist, for apologists are usually persons with a strong and even a conscious bias in favour of their hero. M. Waliszewski, on the contrary, sets himself throughout these two volumes to maintain a strictly judicial attitude towards Peter. He quotes freely from all authorities favourable or unfavourable to the subject of his biography, and gives to each his due weight; and yet, on the whole, we must set him down as one of the Tsar's admirers. How are we to account for this in a writer who is dealing with the character of one of the most sanguinary ruffians, as well as one of the coarsest and most brutal monsters, who ever filled a throne? The answer is simple. It is all a question of historical perspective. M. Waliszewski sets himself to view Peter from the standpoint of Peter's time, and in the light in which his own countrymen in his own day might have regarded him. The nation which he ruled was, as a whole, cowardly, cruel, drunken, and barbarous to the last degree; and Peter was like his nation. He ran away before the battle of Narva in panic; his cruelty is too notorious to need insisting on; he not only drank to excess himself, but insisted on all who surrounded him, both men and women, doing the like; and in all his habits he was utterly uncivilised. He was also shamelessly vicious. It must be owned that it requires considerable suppleness of mind and more dispassionateness than most people are capable of to feel any very cordial sympathy with such a ruffian. The mere description of the way in which he had his son Alexis repeatedly put to the torture—and even, it is said, himself took a hand in the process—is enough to sicken the most ardent Slavophile, while it leaves M. Waliszewski without a single justification to offer for the ghastly incident.

"Perhaps," he writes, "he simply yielded to the horrible charm of the murderous procedure he was tempted to set in fresh motion. Willingly would I believe that he himself had been caught in the wheels! His inquisitorial tastes, his instincts as a despot and a merciless judge, were all excited. He thirsted for blood."

In the case of the Streltaky massacres some sort of palliation of Peter's ghouliah cruelty is suggested (vol. ii., p. 113):

"He (Peter) was present at the examinations and in the torture-chambers. Is it true, as some writers have declared, that he enjoyed it—delighting in the sight of the panting bodies, the long-drawn anguish, and all the bitter incidents of suffering and death? I cannot believe it. He may have watched it all, I will admit, with curiosity—with the zest of a man thirsting for new sensations and inexorably resolved to see and touch everything himself—his heart growing yet more hard, and his imagination running wild, amidst the bloody orgy of sovereign justice."

The distinction between one who delights in the sight of tortures and one who "watches them with curiosity—with the zest of a man thirsting for new sensations" is too fine to save Peter from the accusation of fiendish and disgusting cruelty, an accusation, indeed, which no amount of ingenuity on the part of historians can possibly rebut. But this, with Peter's other vices, hardly affects M. Waliszewski's main contention with regard to his hero. To him the Tsar was a man of genius, of immense personal force, of boundless curiosity and energy, who, realising the defects of his own countrymen and the superiority of the European civilisations surrounding them, set himself to work to Europeanise them, till, by mere force of will, he brought them into the path which he wished them to follow, and so created modern Russia. That his way of doing this was always a satisfactory one our author does not pretend.

"Peter," he writes, "harried by his long war, carried away by his own eagerness, fascinated by what he had seen in Germany, in England, and in Holland, could neither clearly arrange his plans nor prepare them thoughtfully, nor show patience in their execution. He swept over his country and his people like a whirlwind, extemporising and inventing expedients, and terrorising all around him."

His work, in other words, was imperfect, but only a great man could have done it at all. We are inclined to think Frederick the Great's verdict, quoted in this book, a truer one:

"Lucky circumstances, favourable events, and foreign ignorance, have turned the Tsar into a phantom hero. A wise historian, who witnessed part of his life, mercilessly lifts the veil and shows us this prince as possessing all the faults of man and few of his virtues. He is no longer that being of universal mind who knows everything and desires to sift all things; he is a man governed by whims sufficiently novel to give them a certain glamour, and dazzle the onlooker. He is no longer that intrepid warrior who neither feared danger nor recognised it, but a mean-spirited and timid prince, whose very brutality forsook him in seasons of peril—cruel in peace, feeble in war."

The fact was, Peter was not a sane man. He was one of Herr Nordau's degenerates; and it is only by mistaking his restlessness for energy, his recklessness of other people's lives for courage, and his insensibility for strength, that Russia has been able to set him upon the pedestal on which he stands.

It is only fair to add that, while we do not agree with many of the conclusions arrived at by M. Waliszewski, we appreciate the industry with which he has amassed facts and consulted authorities, and we commend his book to anyone who desires a detailed picture of Russian life in the beginning of the eighteenth century.

ANOTHER FAUST TRANSLATION.

Goethe's Faust. Part I. Translated by R. McLintock. (David Nutt.)

WHY the Faust should be translated again is not easy to explain, but translations will ever continue to appear. The complete and final rendering is not possible, and each votary, as he realises the imperfections of his predecessors, will try to produce a work that will be free from them. This volume has the peculiarity that it contains the variants of the Göchhausen Transcript—discovered within the last decade—and upon this transcript, which gives the form of the Faust I., as written 1775, Mr. McLintock has thought to indentify further the work of Marlowe-Dekker and of Goethe. Nor has he left it at this, for he attempts to deduce that Part II. is an excrescence and forms no part of the whole. But this is too worn a controversial point to raise now and here. The transcript, of course, will be welcome; to many, worden is of more import than sein.

The translation before us is in the original metres; it is not easy to give in little a careful scene-by-scene critique. Speaking broadly, Mr. McLintock is at his best in the exceedingly difficult short lines and verses of lighter vein; weakest in the lyrical passages. As an example of the latter, the lines:

"Und mich ergreift ein längst entwöhntes
Sehnen
Nach jenem stillen ernsten Geisterreich," &c., are rendered by Mr. McLintock:

"And now by long-unwonted yearning taken To sway your stern still phantom realm I long."

Compare with this Bayard Taylor's

"And grasps me now a long unwonted yearning
For that serene and solemn spirit land."

But the following is a happy translation:

"I'm not at home when corpses seek my house,
I like my game, as pussy likes her mouse."

And this, again, is an excellent specimen:

"I like to see the old chap now and then;
To break with him would be a pity.
To find a great Lord kind as other men—
And with the devil too—is downright pretty."

The couplet,

"And culture giving all the world a lick, Can't leave the fiend the same old stick!"

could not be better.

It was necessary to turn to the original for the meaning of:

"Dare voice of such resound where spirit ranks,
Close hovering thick, one moment earlier girt me."

In the line,

"More beist than any brute contrives to be,"

the effect of "Thierischer als jeder Thier zu sein" is not produced.

Here and again the phraseology (bolt-word, vulture-line, symbolry) is curious, but so is that of the original.

"Auerbach's Cellar" is capitally given; the difficulties wherewith the "Witch's Kitchen" is fraught are well met.

The "King in Thule" is a failure! and the literalness of "no drop more drank he" amounts to blasphemy. To be brief, the translation is an achievement of some distinction, but the repetition of unusual expressions and the defects in the lyrical passages, where, for the exigencies of rhyme, unimportant words are given undue emphasis, would seem to detract from its value.

MRS. URQUHART.

Memoir of Mrs. Urquhart. By M. C. Bishop. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.)

THE interest that attaches to Mrs. Urquhart is a derived one. She was her husband's wife; and the justification of her memoir is mainly to be found in the fact that that bold scribe, the biographer of David Urquhart, is still to seek. Many a worse man has had a better fate biographically, unless, indeed, posthumous silence is the best fate of all. David Urquhart did England at least one good service—he gave the Turkish bath; and it may have been partly by way of return for that boon that he lavished on Turkey all the homage of his career as a member of Parliament. Perhaps the Turkish bath has done something to soften English asperity against Turkey in the clubs, as Turkish delight has done it, one dares to suppose, in the nursery. That, indeed, would be the bath-importer's best reward. But when he brought it here in the fifties, founding the Hammam in Jermyn-street and many lesser shrines in the provinces, so little favour did it find that it was not then regarded by even Urquhart himself as an international go-between. Indeed, Mrs. Bishop records that his propagation of the bath was "perhaps the only serious work Mr. Urquhart undertook which had not for immediate purpose the arrest of international injustice and war." So little do men realise their greatest successes.

David Urquhart, though a Turk lover, loathed the Crimean war. In fact, he was one of those men, afflicted by logic, who cannot see why a duel between two units should be deadly sin and between two nations a Church-blessed ordeal. Though not himself a Roman Catholic (his wife became one after his death) he went, in his straightforward way, to headquarters in Rome with his hatred of needless bloodshedding. He stormed the Vatican, and had hopes that the Council of 1870 would pronounce that killing was murder when a war was lightly or unjustly provoked. By lectures up and down the land, by newspaper articles (of which his wife was joint author), by fly-sheets which he had printed at his own expense, he was the propagandist of peace, of Turkey, of novel views about the laws of health. He stopped short at no personal labour. He did not shrink from becoming the accepted bore of the House of Commons: which may suggest to some people that the Westminster breed of bores has since degenerated. Urquhart might be a prig; but, at any rate, he had the saving grace of enthusiasm.

That, one gathers, was the opinion first formed of him by Miss Harriet Fortescue, a lady whose brothers, Lord Carlingford and Lord Clermont, became well known. At any rate, she accepted him, on a slight acquaintance, and did not repent in the knowledge of leisure. The love-letters that passed between them are, for the most part, preachments. But they are redeemed by touches of tenderness now and again; as when, for instance, Miss Fortescue exclaims: "My David, God bless you! It is so sweet to remember you in my prayers—once I hardly dared to think of you at any other time." To the day of her death she remained the scrupulous woman, very sensitive and very gentle; a little prosaic, perhaps, and with an inclination to be a slave of convention under the impression that she was thereby proving her devotion to unchanging law. Her faith in her husband's principles, even in his whims, never failed her, though circumstances would now and again arise to try it sorely. She was born in 1825, and she died in 1889, having outlived her hero for a dozen years. Children carry on their line, children who were brought up on "a system," you may be sure. Systems have a doubtful success; they certainly have martyrs. "David junior" was their eldest son. "This child," wrote his mother, "may be killed by a brickbat, but he has no more to fear from disease than a calf or a foal; for this is life according to nature, using the elements for health and strength which when misused are those of destruction." Easy dogmatism for the healthy mother of the healthy child; but how far too easily and too painfully disproved! Another son was born to them, of whom it is merely said that he was "fated to die in infancy."

IN FINLAND.

Through Finland in Carts. By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. (A. & C. Black.)

WE confess that this book has upset our most cherished fancies. We had thought of Finland as a semi-barbarous land on the confines of the wild north, inhabited by a wholly primitive people, and inaccessible to all save experienced sportsmen. Instead of this we learn that the place is riddled with telephones, that on the very border of Lapland coal is burned and salmon caught with the "Jock Scott," and that the roads are crowded with cyclists.

We do not quite see the precise meaning of the title, for the journey in carts occupied only a very little of the time. Mrs. Alec Tweedie and her sister, starting from Helsingfors, went east to Viborg and then north to Kajana, whence they descended the river Ulea to Uleaborg, and came back down the coast to Hangö. The book is a minute record of the journey, and it is a record of admirable pluck and good-humour under difficulties. The writer, tired of the beaten tracks of travel, went forth to seek adventures, and adventures she found. She visited the famous Russian monastery of Valamo, and found an interesting monk who asked her about Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury, and the Home Rule Bill. She spent a night in a haunted castle, crossed Savolax in a cart, and descended rapids at midnight in a tar-boat. All this was in the summer, when the heat is very great and mosquitoes and other creeping things are legion in number. She intended to push on to Lapland, but the report of the ravenous insects which flourish in the short Lapland summer deterred her, and she cut short her plans and returned. Everywhere she seems to have met with the friendliest hospitality, for which she makes generous acknowledgment in her pages. She saw much, too, of native life, and went through the terrors of the Finnish bath, which seems the most effective thing of its kind in existence.

The book is written in a pleasant, gossipy style, and Mrs. Alec Tweedie tells us for the most part just the things which we want to know, so that her narrative has not only interest as narrative, but some practical value as a guide-book. It is probable that some will be found in the future to brave the mosquito plague and explore this little known land. For one thing, it is the paradise of the angler. The authentic story of the man who caught 1,600 pounds' weight of salmon, trout, and grayling in three weeks is enough to make one's mouth water.

As a piece of literature, the book is rather discursive, and the style lacks the higher qualities of the picturesque. It is a little confusing to the reader to be dragged from the contemplation of cataracts or pine woods, and confronted with columns of statistics or a discussion on female education. Nor do we find in the description of nature the speaking word and the vivid impression which a more delicate sense of style might have achieved. As it is, what we like the book for is just the multitude of small, interesting details and the genuine high spirits of the writer. It is a record of pluck and good nature, a vigorous, rapid survey of the chief features of the land and people. It is emphatically the modern Finland that we get, for the narrative of old customs and the chapter on the "Kalevala" are done merely to complete the survey. It is not the Finland of Runeberg—the land of great inland lakes, with shores muffled in forest, where no footstep breaks the silence but some Russian pedlar from Archangel. Rather is it a country of modern improvements and pleasant, hospitable people, where men spend their summers in the country—a most admirable custom—where higher education flourishes, and the liquor trade is carried on under severe disabilities. As we said before, our old idea of the place is shattered utterly.

The book has an excellent index, a map, and some eighteen illustrations.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Journeys among the Gentle Japs. By the Rev. J. Ll. Thomas. (Sampson Low, Marston & Co.)

IN the summer of 1895 a cruel chance enabled Mr. Thomas to make a hurried tour through Japan and write a book about it. We say a "cruel" chance advisedly, for far too many dull books have been written about Japan already, and one may be permitted to regret that another should have been added to their number. Moreover, we would fain protest against the notion which prevails so extensively among tourists that a mass of trivialities jotted down in a note-book during a three weeks' journey through this or that country necessarily provides a valid excuse for writing a book. We are far from saying that the traveller who has the faculty of keen observation combined with the faculty of artistic expression, the whole being seasoned with a sense of humour, may not produce an interesting book about even the most familiar country. A man with a genius for description and an eye for what is beautiful or quaint or bizarre can write a chapter on a Midland village or a Devonshire lane or some old market town in the Fen country, or almost any scene however familiar which will be read with delight. A man without those endowments will only make us yawn over far more wonderful sights. Mr. Thomas, alas! makes us yawn. And his utter want of discrimination as to what is or is not worth recording in his travels causes him to fill his pages with matters that can be of no interest to anyone. Can Mr. Thomas seriously suppose that it was worth while to record the church services he attended, the sermons he preached, the missionaries who were at home when he called, and the like? It is not that these details are offensive or ridiculous. They are merely tedious, and one looks in vain for any reason for inserting them. An instance will show what we mean:

"At Kobe I was the guest of the Rev. C. Graham Gardner and Mr. Cameron Johnson, the former a missionary of the S.P.G. and a contemporary of mine at Oxford. I was much interested in his work at Shinomiya—a quarter of the town—and in the neat little church in which he officiated to the native population. Mr. Johnson was a Virginian, and was in temporary charge of the Seamen's Mission. He was a young man of varied experience in Japan, and his account of life in the most out-of-the-way parts of the country with which he was familiar was very entertaining. On the second Sunday it was my privilege to occupy the pulpit at the 'Union Church.' . . ."

In this passage it will be noticed that Mr. Thomas entirely omits the only thing which the general reader would have been interested in hearing, namely, Mr. Johnson's account of life in the most out-of-the-way parts of Japan. What he does tell us is, that Mr. Graham Gardner was a missionary of the S.P.G., and the like. And that has nothing to do with the "gentle Japs." When we add, as we must, that the style of the book is slipshod in the extreme, we feel that we have said all that need be said to enable the reader to know what to expect from Mr. Thomas. He will find a great deal of amiable chatter, a sprinkling of statistics, a few scraps of history, but, we honestly think, not one original thought, not one new idea, not one vivid piece of description, nothing but journalistic small-talk about a country which has been written about to satiety already.

* * *

Lady Hamilton and Lord Nelson. By John Cordy Jeaffreson. New and Revised Edition, containing Additional Facts, Letters, and other Material. (Hurst & Blackett.)

THE material which Mr. Jeaffreson has been able to add to his work is sufficient amply to confirm Pettigrew's principal assertion respecting Horatia's parentage, and enables the author to dispense with the more elaborate reasoning by which, in his original edition, Mr. Jeaffreson laboriously sought to demonstrate that the child was Nelson's offspring.

"Whilst careful to destroy her letters, Nelson in writing to Lady Hamilton used a curious kind of literary mystification. . . . Sometimes the letters were addressed to Mrs. Thomson, and read like letters from an affectionate husband. At other times, addressing his correspondent by her proper style, and signing with his own name or initials, Nelson affected to send messages from Mrs. Thomson's friend at sea to Lady Hamilton's particular friend Mrs. Thomson on shore."

But sometimes, as was to be expected, the writer became a little mixed, with such results as this:

"MY DEAR MRS. THOMPSON,—Your good and dear friend does not think it proper at present to write with his own hand, but charges me to say how dear you are to him. . . . I have given Lord Nelson [he has given me] a hundred pounds this morning, for which he [I] will give Lady Hamilton an order on his [my] agents; and I beg [he begs] that you will distribute it amongst those who have been useful to you on the late occasion."

The occasion referred to is her clandestine confinement. Besides the "Thomson" letters there is also a letter extant in which Nelson calls Emma "his wife in the eyes of heaven," and sends a kiss to "our dear Horatia."

Mr. Jeaffreson's volume is composed in the true spirit of historical impartiality. Romney's "divine lady" was neither shameless harlot nor irreproachable matron; she was a terrible story-teller, but she quite often spoke the truth; a "guttler," "loving" champagne, she was no drunkard; she did, in fact, render services to the nation, but the nation could have done very well without them—circumstances rendered them ineffective; she did not depend in her last days on broken victuals and dogs' meat for a precarious sustenance, but she was pretty hard-up, and that entirely as a consequence of her own imprudent extravagance. For this she was the more to be blamed since as a girl she had known, while under Greville's protection, how to economise a small income, and, even as Sir William Hamilton's wife and the bosom friend of the Queen of Naples, had contrived to send her grandmother £20 a year out of the £200 allowed her for pin-money. Her letters are delightful reading. Warm-hearted, clear-minded, hot-headed, quick-tempered, quick-witted, generous as they manifest her to have been in those early best days, when (to use the words she attributes to the King of Naples) she was "a dymond of the first watter and the finest creature on the hearth," surely no so-called bad woman ever had so many of the pleasantest qualities of a good one.

The Memoirs of Lord Edward Fitzgerald. By Thomas Moore. With Preface and many Supplementary Particulars by Martin McDermott. (Downey.)

THE moving romance of that chivalrous and very hot-headed gentleman, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, as told by Moore, is sufficiently well known to students of Irish history in the last century. Mr. McDermott has performed his task excellently well: he has broken up Moore's run-on narrative into chapters, provided with a running table of contents, and has furnished the text with adequate notes, explanatory and critical. In his supplementary chapters he tells us more than the author knew about two interesting persons, whose place in the original narrative was by no means proportionate to the parts they played. Of Lady Edward (Pamela) Moore leaves his reader with the notion of such a clinging bread-and-butter cry-baby as the eighteenth-century novelist rejoiced in. In the light of more perfect knowledge she develops into one of the charming women of her age, a beauty and a finished coquette, and moreover with a natural aptitude for intrigue; it is certain that she was no less deeply involved than her Quixotic partner in the various plots against the English Government, which in the end cost him his life.

"She received and passed on the momentous communications between the Government of the French Republic and the Irish Directory. . . . She gave credentials to persons . . . who were thus enabled, through the intervention of her own friends and relations in Paris, to obtain access to persons in power—to such men as Hoche [the leader of the ill-fated expedition of 1796], de la Croix, and Talleyrand."

In concluding his chapter upon the after history of this lady, Mr. McDermott draws out a striking parallel between her character and career and those of her putative ancestress, Marguerite de Valois: for Pamela was almost certainly the daughter of the Duke of Orleans by Mme. de Genlis.

Bound closely up with the years of her married life is the career of that prince of traitors, Samuel Turner, whose treachery was for the first time fully established five years ago by Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick in his Secret Service under Pitt. A doctor of laws of Trinity College, a member of the Irish bar, of dashing presence and winning manners, he established himself as the intimate friend and confidant of the Edward Fitzgerald family.

"He remained at Hambourg, Froude tells us, 'as Lady Edward's guest and most trusted friend; saw every one who came to her house; was admitted to close and secret conversations upon the prospects of French interference in Ireland with Reinhard, the Minister of the Directory there; and he regularly kept Lord Devonshire informed of everything which would enable Pitt to watch the conspiracy.'"

That a man should be able all his life long to play such a game, never to yield to the temptations of his better angel, or to give way ever so little to the impulses of honour and generosity, betokens a character of almost preternatural constancy in evil. Beside these chapters a number of letters are reproduced which furnish many sidelights on the family history, as well as on the condition of Ireland during the months following and preceding Lord Edward's death.

Mr. McDermott's temperament, perhaps, hardly permits him to maintain an ideal attitude of judicial impartiality, and his language is not always remarkable for restraint; but he handles his matter, upon the whole, with substantial equity, and Moore's book has greatly profited by his enthusiastic pains.

The Outlines of Physics. By Prof. Edward L. Nichols. (The Macmillan Company.)

The Elements of Physics. By Prof. Edward L. Nichols and William S. Franklin. Vol. III. "Light and Sound." (The Macmillan Company.)

TEN or twelve years ago there were scarcely more than a dozen physical laboratories in the country—at the present time no science school is considered to be efficient unless it possesses the room and the equipment for imparting practical knowledge of the properties of material substances. The rise of experimental physics, and the wider recognition of the principle that the only scientific knowledge worth having is that gained by individual experience, are, indeed, the most gratifying features of educational development during the past decade.

In consequence of the encouragement now given to practical work, a host of books have been published for use in physical laboratories, and the cyclopædic species of textbook is slowly giving place to volumes which brings the student in touch with the realities of nature. The two volumes under notice—both from America—are excellent examples of the new methods of science teaching. As an elementary work, suitable for use as a text-book and laboratory guide combined, Prof. Nichol's Outlines of Physics fulfils every requirement. The experiments described are practicable, and they bring out prominently the leading principles of physics, while the text, though concise, is sufficient to give students an intelligent interest in their work.

The volume which Prof. Nichols has prepared in collaboration with Prof. Williams is the third of three which together cover the region of investigation belonging to physics. It is lavishly illustrated with diagrams, and should find a place among the books used in our university colleges and institutions of the same rank.

Old Memories. By Gen. Sir Hugh Gough. (Blackwood & Sons.)

WE have rarely met with a more straightforward, modest record of gallantry than this book. Gen. Sir Hugh Gough tells his story like a brave man and a soldier: it is as direct as one of his own charges at the head of Hodson's Horse; and the literature of the Mutiny, which in the last few months has been increased by Lord Roberts's autobiographical work and Mrs. Steel's long novel, is very sensibly enriched by it. It was at Alumbagh that the author won his V.C.; his account of that memorable action and his incidental references to Hodson, whom he admired intensely, are the best things in the book.

Siam on the Meinam, from the Gulf to Ayuthia, together with Three Romances illustrative of Siamese Life and Customs. By Maxwell Sommerville. With Fifty Illustrations. (Sampson Low.)

THIS is the work of an interested but not very profound observer. Mr. Sommerville visited Bangkok and Ayuthia, and conversed with people on board the river steamer. Being under the mistaken impression, it would seem, that he was the only foreigner who had accomplished this daring feat, he has written the result of his observations at length in a large yellow volume, profusely illustrated with excellent photographs. The author indulges the irritating peculiarity of writing almost exclusively in the historic present, and his strictures upon Buddhism strike the dullest note of provincial Evangelicism.

The Annual Register, 1896. (Longmans & Co.) THIS ancient and honourable publication renews itself once more. How many people know that its first editor was Edmund Burke? He planned and edited it under Dodsley, the publisher, and the first volume appeared in June, 1859. There is no doubt that the labour of compiling this annual during several years greatly widened and strengthened Burke's grasp of politics. The present summary of 1896 seems to us in every way good, and it is we suppose only an evil chance that on first opening the volume the present reviewer's eye fell on a misprint.

Handy Guide to England and Wales. By Edward Smith. (George Allen.)

THIS guide-book is written for American visitors, and therefore it contains many statements which to an English reader appear rather naïve. It is nevertheless a useful manual, allowing for its comprehensiveness. The whole of England and Wales is surveyed on an alphabetical plan, and tours are suggested.

A Doctor's Idle Hours. By "Scalpel." (Downey & Co.)

THIS book is a sheaf of essays on such subjects as "Sleeplessness," "Alcohol," "Contentment," "Earnestness," "Recreation," "Holidays," "Cripples," "Antipathies," and what not. We can conceive that a doctor might write about these things in his idle hours to some purpose. "Scalpel," however, is much too superficial. Vainly we seek meat in these interminable pages. All we find is the amiable writing and the prodigality of quotation that we have learned to associate with such chapter headings as "Scalpel's."

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

THE FRENCHMAN IN ENGLISH FICTION.

In his amusing review of an insignificant French story, La Journal de Liliane, Mr. Barry Pain is highly entertained by the absurdities of the French pen in over-seas character and tongue. Is Mr. Pain aware that British popular authors generally show themselves no less ignorant when imagination carries them to France? I speak now of writers who, unlike the unfortunate Polish count, can both spell and quote French correctly, and who have lived in France. Little Florac, the immortal husband of 'Igg of Manchester', is a delightful acquaintance, but it is doubtful if any French nobleman would recognise him for a compatriot. Miss Edwards is regarded as a complete authority on French life, but her characters are all British under French names, and, like her countrymen at Tours, she transports her English surroundings, habits and ideals across the Channel. The men remain at table and the ladies proceed to the drawing-room, a thing nobody ever saw done at a French dinner-table. Young French girls chaperoned by their governesses go to lunch with their fiancés in starched provincial French towns where you dare not walk on the right side of the street if it is pronounced proper to walk on the left. For the French girl who in real life dared this outrage against public propriety there would be nothing left her but the grave or the cloister. Mrs. Humphry Ward's Bohemian Paris in David Grieve is still a matter of astonishment and laughter to her French readers. Her Montmartre and artists of either sex are as likely to be found in the moon as here.

But the honour of breaking the record in French caricature lies with Mr. Keary. The critics assured me that The Two Lancrofts was a great and immortal work. I read it with misgivings of my own or the author's reason. He sends one of his heroes over to Paris to study art. Of his art we know nothing. His language, supposed to be acquired in Paris, would astonish the rifest Frenchman. He bellows "My God" three times in every phrase he utters. Now Frenchmen occasionally say "Mon Dieu!" but rarely more than once in a single conversation, and then in the lightest of tones, with a little shrug that robs it of profanity. They sometimes change the Mon into Tu, thus giving the Dieu a sprightly insignificance and connecting it possibly with one of our old Olympian friends. And it is not at all necessary to despatch a young man to Paris to learn bad manners, rascalities, and the art of profane speech. It is not long since the Englishman has ceased to be called abroad the Goddam Englishmen, and Frenchmen, Mr. Keary may not be aware, have an ideal of conduct as respectable as his own.

Herbert Vanlenhart contains a distinguished French novelist over which the French critic, if he could be induced to peruse that masterpiece, might write wittier pages far than Mr. Pain's mirthful rescue of Miss Gibson from oblivion. M. Victor Desanges is a kind of Paul Bourget, a brilliant man of the world and of letters, beloved of duchesses, and welcomed in the best English houses and clubs. To be a brilliant man of letters implies in France intelligence, polish, and wit; English social recognition and the love of French duchesses imply the habits and standard of society. Yet M. Desanges is an idiot and a cad. He designs to seduce a young girl he has met socially. A Frenchman of the world would as soon dream of cheating at cards or robbing a bank. He is content to betray the husbands of his acquaintance, when he can, but he can be trusted to respect a young girl. Then M. Desanges discourses drivell to the moonrays. Even international animosities and contempt cannot justify the imbecility of Mr. Keary's distinguished French novelist. He plaintively conjures Jesus, Mary, and Joseph to assist him in the seduction of Kitty, his friend's guest. "O Marie, aie pitié de moi," he prays to Mary in heaven—does the reader recognise MM. Bourget, Anatole France, Guy de Maupassant, Paul Hervein, Daudet, or Loti in this amiable portrait? "Donne moi ça, O Marie, and I am yours for ever." Exactly, this is just the sort of humour displayed by a brilliant French novelist. It adequately explains his position in letters and justifies his social success. He habitually, being of course a villain and a cad, implores the assistance of the symbol of purity, the patroness of maidenhood in the ruin of a maiden in the grossest abuse of hospitality. As a child he was taught at his mother's knee to say, "Mary, Mother of God, pray for me." Mr. Keary conceives him in manhood meditating a base crime, shouting, with streaming eyes, to the moon: "Mary, Mother of God, assist me to be a black-guard." Is Miss Gibson shielding her face with veil and hands at a maniac's dancing and crying, "Oh, very indecently, indeed," more monstrously grotesque as an international caricature?

HANNAH LYNCH.

* * * * *

Possessed of Devils. By Mrs. Harold E. Gorst.
(Macqueen.)

Mrs. Gorst's demoniacal heroine is not, perhaps, so new a departure in fiction as one would imagine from the elaborate apology for her in the Introduction. I have met her before in feminine novels of recent date, nor can I say that I have been any the better for the acquaintance. They may be very actual and very artistic, these raving women who hate their husbands and love their husband's friends, but one may hope they are over-represented in present-day novels. Mrs. Gorst would say that I am a prejudiced person, "for, without disparagement to his critical faculties, a man is incapable of realising the strong element of hysteria which so often underlies a woman's actions." But is it hysteria? It may be hysteria which makes the Lady Radclyffe of the book see visions and talk the usual preposterous nonsense about being "understood"; but is it hysteria which makes her intimidate Francis Ingelow into eloping with her? I am afraid Sir Francis Jeune has a less technical name for it. It is, indeed, a very sad world if Mrs. Gorst reads it aright. She recognises it as "a great primary fact" that "a woman's first natural impulse (to which she may or may not give way) lies in a crooked direction." That, after all, is but another way of saying that the offending Eve has not been whipped out of her. But the author goes far beyond this elementary statement of original sin. "My friend," says Lady Radcliffe to her lover, who had just engaged himself to a non-hysterical girl—

"My friend, can you really believe that the pure angel you approach in fear and trembling when you are wooing her is anything else but an imaginary creation of your temporarily disordered brain? Look about you at the women you have known as girls, and contrast their old-time, sweet, retiring manner with the boldness and assurance which characterise them as wives. Why do they change thus? The answer is simple. They have secured their husbands. No further need for innocence and simplicity, bashful maidenly modesty, blushes and simpers, the bait with which they lured their victims into matrimony. . . . One thing, and one only, can you be certain about respecting a woman. From the cradle the female infant, child, girl, woman, is not, and never has been, what she appears. She is a creation evolved out of an age of shams and unrealities. In her youth a girl dare not be real. In her womanhood she sometimes is just once. You do not think me a good woman. If you knew us better you would understand that now I am at my very best. As good as any woman could be, for at last, and for the first time in my life, I am true. True to myself and to you. George [the husband] I don't count. He is an accident, connected only with the unreality of my past."

It is our duty to resist a philosophy which removes devoted husbands—it is one of "George's" faults, in the eyes of this lady, that he is consumed by solicitude when she has a headache; she "shudders" on these occasions—into the region of "accidents." Of course I do not for a moment attribute to Mrs. Gorst the heretical opinions of her heroine. The question is, whether it is worth while, for the sake of recording an egotistical type, to put such ravings into print. Unfortunately, though the story is novel in arrangement, it has not that supreme quality which can reconcile one to a good deal.

* * * *

His Daughter. By W. L. Alden.
(Neville Beeman.)

If you are to write a story about Americans you can make no more happy choice of place than Venice. In its cafés, on its piazzas, under the shadow of its palaces, you are bound to get the full value of the grotesque modernity of speech, the shrewd simplicity of thought, and the delicious incongruity of sentiment with which our cousins pay their piquant contribution to the treasury of the nations' gaiety; but the gaiety in this story is tempered with a genuine sorrow. Silas G. Hoskins, engineer on the St. Paul and Milwaukee road for forty years, brings his daughter to Venice to study singing. It seems that many American young ladies arrive there annually with a view to overcoming, by means of elaborate training, that lack of a voice which alone stands between them and the career of a prima donna. But Miss Emmy Hoskins really had a voice. Her father guaranteed it, and, as he justly observed, "when a man's been listening to locomotive whistles and torpedoes for forty years he's apt to be a middling good judge of a voice when he hears it." Silas picked out of the crowd a resident American, named Fairchild, and opened to him his arms and his house. Fairchild rendered him the service of demonstrating the unworthiness of a certain gay Frenchman to touch the hand of the beautiful Emmy. Unfortunately, Emmy was very much attached to this rake, and so, while she ostensibly yielded to the cogency of the reasons set out before her judgment, she plotted at the same time a cruel revenge against this officious friend. Deliberately she set herself to win Fairchild's affections, and on the date appointed for his marriage the unfortunate young man received a cold letter from which he learned that he had been fooled, and that his betrothed was united to the adventurer. But it was upon the old man that the blow fell most heavily. His trust in his beautiful daughter was unqualified, his assurance of her impeccability was unstinted; and they were strained to the utmost. Some months after the break-up Fairchild finds him patiently earning a humble livelihood as fireman on one of the despised "Eyetalian" lines, with his confidence in his Emmy still unshaken, though he has heard nothing of her since the announcement of her marriage; and it is his privilege to soothe the last hours of the single-minded, excellent old man. The conclusion of the story—the union of Fairchild with Emmy, who reappears as a disenchanted widow—whether or not an artistic feature, will probably please the majority of readers; of which majority I am not. The tale is bright with humour, and warm with a personal interest; and the main theme has been worked out with thoughtful care.

* * * *

A Princess of Islam. By J. W. Sherer, C.S.I.
(Swan Sonnenschein.)

Mr. Sherer has constructed a very fair story out of material with which he is evidently familiar. George Wilton is Minister of State to Hassain Khan, the reigning prince of the independent Moslem State of Ling. His royal master is much attached to him, and proposes to marry him to his own niece, the Princess Noor-oon-issa. Wilton, being easy-going and fond of power, consents with some hesitation, and Mr. Sherer has the opportunity for a long and interesting description of the three days' ceremonies of a Moslem wedding. Then Wilton is summoned by family affairs to England, and in his absence Hassain Khan dies and is succeeded by the fanatical Kadir Khan, to whom marriage with the infidel is an abomination. Noor-oon-issa falls ill, and Kadir Khan announces her death. Everyone, except, perhaps, the wily reviewer, is deceived. George Wilton's services at Ling are now dispensed with; he settles down in England on two lacs of rupees, and ultimately marries an old English flame, Kate Fortescue. Then Noor-oon-issa escapes from the durance vile in which Kadir Khan has held her, and makes her way to England to seek her husband. The foreseen complications are near at hand, though we do not propose to reveal precisely how they are in the end resolved. There is a touch of the amateur in Mr. Sherer's writing, a stiffness in the dialogue and the by-play, but he is not without a quiet humour, and has the serious interest of his story well in hand. Both George Wilton and the passionate Noor-oon-issa are careful studies of character.

* * * *

Elementary Jane. By Richard Pryce.
(Hutchinson.)

Here is a psychological study which concerns itself with the normal—a satire tenderly long-suffering towards weakness and frivolity; humour that smiles through tears.

"The orchestra was playing the opening bars of her first song. The second time they were played she would have to run on. Would she have the courage? What if she broke down? The drum in the band made the tune sound nice, didn't it? . . . She closed her eyes for a moment. It was now or never. It was now. . ."

And excellent Mrs. Kerridge whispered to her niece, Mrs. Atwell, that she was "come over all of a heat," and she trembled "fit to make the bench shake."

This is Elementary Jane's début at a southern hall. She sang "a treat," and after a while won to fame and the West End. But it is not with her professional career that we are mainly concerned. Two men loved "Jenny Tandem" (née Smith), each after his kind—Curley, the pride of the famous Merino Family, and Michael Seaward, utility bandsman, a serious, strong-hearted man. When Seaward's friend and first patron exerted his influence to withdraw him from the neighbourhood of a siren (what else could a "Jenny Tandem" be?), Jane fell altogether under the charm of the handsome boy. Her simple heart and purity awoke in him the best of his rudimentary soul, and he offered her marriage. For six months she was happy, and then the inevitable accomplished itself: he went adrift. But she was loyal to the last; and for her reward it was she, and not the other, in whose arms he died, with her tears upon his face. The author has not limited his pains to the three principal characters. The members of the Merino Family, the various ladies of the profession with whom Jane has to do, her friend and landlady Mrs. Kerridge, are no lay figures; and in the delicate handling of them all, that characteristic of Mr. Pryce to which we have made allusion—his large tolerance—manifests itself. In all of them the cruel pushfulness that plays so great a part in social life is but the armour that protects a freight of charity.

* * * *

A Noble Haul ("Little Novels," No. 11). By W. Clark Russell.
(Fisher Unwin.)

Mr. Fisher Unwin is indefatigable in his labours in the railway passenger's behalf, and his ingenuity matches his zeal. The "Little Novels" are of a handy width and slinness, their binding is in strong cloth, and their print is leather-tong'd: even the thunderous darkness of your tunnels will hardly break the continuity of your study. Mr. Clark Russell, who fills the eleventh volume of these series with a capital pot-boiler, is so even a writer that we set out with confidence to read him; and in the result we are not disappointed. We have here the careful technical detail, the picturesque sky and sea, the conscientious and capable style we have learned to expect; and the story of the heroic officer and his brutal captain, the midnight evasion from the tyrant's ship, the lighting of the fugitives upon the dismantled derelict, which they happily navigate into port, will exhilarate readers who delight to snuff the briny in their comfortable armchairs. But the talk of the third officer, whose escape is the principal business of the book, is surely a little too much of the if-you-please order. "How long a time was to elapse before the second mate should be released?" and "With whom did this scheme originate?" are perfectly polite and grammatical English, but I suspect they are not just the sort of phrase which third officers of small trading vessels use in conversing with the men.

Paul's Stepmother, and One Other Story. By Lady Troubridge.
(Grant Richards.)

Paul's stepmother is the young wife of an old man. Paul is disgusted at the match, and visits his father's house with contempt written on his brow. He finds it invaded by a troop of his stepmother's relations—vulgar children of a shady military man—who are preying on their sister's new fortune. Paul, who came to rebuke, commits the extraordinary and improbable sin of falling in love with his stepmother, and instead of holding his tongue or going away, as any gentleman would have done, blurts it all out on the first opportunity. The stepmother meets him at least half-way, and when she hears of his death in a railway accident dies too, of heart-disease. The rumour, as usual, is false, and Paul lives to weep upon the grave and to comfort his father's declining years. Lady Troubridge opens her first chapter with a sniff at Ibsen; but I can assure her that if Ibsen had thought fit to deal with an incestuous tale at all he would at least have treated it with some adequate realisation of the horror and tragedy involved. This Lady Troubridge has not done, and, I should judge, is quite incompetent to do. She had better have kept within the range of incident and emotion ordinarily permitted to novelists without genius. The second story, of which the title is "Poor Roderick," is quite harmless, but it is also quite insipid. A girl marries a man she does not love, without even a conventionally adequate motive for doing so. She then breaks her heart for the man she does love, who also loves her and promptly goes to the bad through her loss. It is all very foolish; but we really cannot conjure up much interest in a young woman who behaves in this sort of way.

* * *
Miss Tudor. By John Le Breton.
(Macqueen.)

Bessie Richardson finds herself destitute, and her mother a widow. She resolves to earn her living on the variety stage. Her relatives, who are in trade, consequently cast her off. She takes the name of Bessie Tudor, and learns some "coon" song. But she finds that in order to get any further it is necessary to allow her agent to seduce her. Having attained to fame and fortune, she gets rid of him. She then gets engaged to a millionaire of philanthropic habits, but his philanthropy and his millions turn out to be equally bogus. Ultimately Miss Tudor falls in love with Arthur Sinjohn, a black-and-white artist on a theatrical print known as Sidewings. Her affection is returned, but there is the past to be reckoned with. The discarded agent takes his revenge in boasting of Miss Tudor's favours. Arthur Sinjohn breaks off the match, and the unhappy life ends in the Thames. It is a sordid chronicle of the seamy side of London civilisation, of a world where every man calls every woman "my dear," and where an offer of drink is the only recognised form of salutation. To read it is a bad dream, and to analyse it nauseates. Of course such material is capable of, and has before now received, artistic treatment; but this remark has no direct application to Mr. Le Breton's story.

* * *
A Daughter of the Klephts. By Isabella Fyvie Mayo.
(W. & R. Chambers.)

Recent events appear to have stimulated a mushroom crop of novels and other books dealing with modern Greece. The heroine of the present story, Patience Hedges, alias Stella Tzavellis, is a Greek by birth. She is sent to England in early childhood; her protector dies by the wayside, and she becomes a waif and stray. Through the kindness of an ancient lady she is brought up in an English school, and receives a small legacy. Her parentage is discovered by an accident; she returns to Greece, finds herself in the thick of the struggle for Independence, devotes her fortune to the national cause, and escapes from the disastrous evacuation of Missolonghi in the dress of a pallikar. To this motive is somewhat loosely hitched on a second one, dealing with the misfortunes of a respectable English family from whom the heroine had received kindness in childhood. Miss Mayo describes well, and has some gift of character-painting; but the book is irritating, because it is so badly constructed. The various threads of interest have little or nothing to do with each other. There are also various morals scattered about; but as Miss Mayo is apparently writing for girls, she may, perhaps, claim a traditional right to be didactic.

SELECTED NOVELS

BOOKS FOR SUMMER READING.

BY IAN MACLAREN.

KATE CARNegie and THOSE MINISTERS. By Ian MacLaren. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A notable book, and one in which Ian MacLaren has bettered the best work he had previously given us."—Daily Chronicle.

BESIDE the BONNIE BRIER BUSH. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s. ELEVENTH EDITION, completing 80,000.
"As fine an interpretation as we have yet had of the real inner spirit and life of rural Scotland."—Speaker.

THE DAYS of AULD LANG SYNE. Crown 8vo, art linen, gilt top, 6s. FOURTH EDITION, completing 60,000.
"The characters in 'The Days of Auld Lang Syne' are as actual and real as it is possible for them to be in the printed pages."—Daily News.

BY J. M. BARRIE.

MARGARET OGILVY. By her Son, J. M. Barrie. With Etched Portrait by Manasse. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. FOURTH EDITION, completing 40,000.

"This is a beautiful idyll—deep, tender, true."—The Aberdeen Free Press.

AULD LIGHT IDYLLS. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. TENTH EDITION.
"At once the most successful, the most truly literary, and the most realistic attempt that has been made for years—if not for generations—to reproduce humble Scottish life."—Spectator.

A WINDOW in THRUMS. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. FIFTEENTH EDITION.
"We think that this is the very best of the many good sketches of Scottish peasant life which we have ever read."—Standard.

MY LADY NICOTINE. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. SEVENTH EDITION.

"A very delightful book. Wherever it is opened it will please."—Speaker.

WHEN a MAN'S SINGLE. A Tale of Literary Life. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. TENTH EDITION.
"From one end to the other the story is bright, cheerful, amusing."—Saturday Review.

London: HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27, Paternoster Row, E.C.

DOWNEY & CO.'S NEW NOVELS.

TALES of the ROCK. By Mary Anderson, Author of "Othello's Occupation," &c. 3s. 6d. [Next week.]

TWO SINNERS. By Lily Thicknesse. 6s.

"A strong and extremely well-written story, abounding in clever and convincing characterisations."—Daily Telegraph.

DID HE DESERVE IT? By Mrs. Riddell. 6s.

"We welcome without fear or favour a story which is worthy of 'George Geith.'"—World.

A ROGUE'S CONSCIENCE. By David Christie Murray. 3s. 6d.

"The pace and swing do not flag from start to finish."—Daily News.

DOWNEY'S SIXPENNY LIBRARY

OR
The BEST NOVELS by the MOST POPULAR AUTHORS.

[These books are printed in new and readable type on a laid paper, crown 8vo size.]

The following volumes are now ready:—

ESMOND	...	...	W. M. THACKERAY.
OLIVER TWIST	...	...	CHARLES DICKENS.
THE ANTIQUARY	...	...	Sir WALTER SCOTT.
BASIL	...	...	WILKIE COLLINS.
THE O'DONOGHUE	...	...	CHARLES LEVER.
JANE EYRE	...	...	CHARLOTTE BRONTË.
CONTARINI FLEMING	...	...	B. DISRAELI.
LAST DAYS of POMPEII	...	...	Lord LYTTON.
FRANKENSTEIN	...	...	Mrs. SHELLEY.
MIDSHIPMAN EASY	...	...	Captain MARRYAT.

DOWNEY & CO., LTD., London; and at all Booksellers'.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

The Queer Folk of Fife: Tales from the Kingdom. By David Pryde, M.A.; LL.D. (Glasgow: Morrison Brothers.)

This book, which is neatly bound and excellently printed, contains eight stories dealing with various aspects of life and character ranging from "The Breach of Promise" to "How the Deacon Became an Abstainer." The stories are readable though not unduly exciting. The folk are not specially queer nor are they inevitably of Fife. Indeed, most of them express themselves at times in phraseology ponderously English. The following extract taken at random from "How the Deacon Became an Abstainer" is a fair sample of the author's more didactic style:

"By taking the pledge," replied the minister, "not publicly—just now at least, that might rouse people's suspicion, but privately to myself. I shall draw up a paper here to-day, which you will sign, and to which Mr. Slater will append his name as a witness. I shall then explain to the people of the house that you were ill, not intoxicated, and that to prevent the uncharitable world putting the worst construction on the circumstance, they must mention this lamentable occurrence to nobody."

The minister would surely have made a happier choice of words if he had exhorted the people of the house not to mention this lamentable occurrence to anybody, in preference to imposing upon them the impossible injunction that "they must mention" it "to nobody." The best story in the book is "The Boy Heretic." The title is gained by a boy of seven who, on the schoolmaster informing the assembled school that one of their number, aged nine, who had gone for a row on the loch on a fast day, and had been drowned by the capsizing of the boat, "was now bitterly repenting his neglect of ordinances in the place of woe," has the courage to retort, "It's a lee." "Then was witnessed a spectacle which was not uncommon in that class of schools—a man trying to beat what he called 'human depravity' out of a child, just as a housemaid beats the dust out of a dirty carpet." But neither blows, nor expulsion from school, nor home persecution moved the youthful protestant, and to every fresh attack his response was terse and emphatic, "It's a lee." Ultimately the juvenile heretic meets with a more sympathetic teacher and triumphantly emerges from his childish sorrows.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.—No. 2.

Do you recognise how essential good teeth are to the health of the whole body? Every tooth that is decayed or inefficient throws extra work on the rest, and hastens their decay. Presently the work of mastication is interfered with, and that leads to Dyspepsia, while the decaying teeth are themselves a source of direct injury to the health

Teeth that are kept really clean, do not decay, and only a very little care is needed. The greatest danger is from small particles of food that lodge in irregularities of the teeth. What must be done is to use some dentifrice that will reach and remove these, while, at the same time, cleansing and sweetening any incipient decay. Only one thing will do this: SOZODONT. No one who has not used it has any idea how pleasant SOZODONT is. Sold everywhere, price 2/6.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

Nilma. By Mrs. Campbell Praed.
(Chatto & Windus.)

Mrs. Campbell Praed is always at home in the treatment of Australian themes, and in Nilma she gives us a good picture of Government House life in a Colony. Briefly, it is the story of a married woman's struggles to retain her lover's allegiance, and her somewhat unscrupulous method of defeating the young girl who is her rival. Mrs. Praed has done better work.

THE STORY OF A PLAY.

The history of Gabrielle d'Annunzio's Le Songe d'une Matinée de Printemps, says the Saturday Review, is worth telling. It is connected with the name of La Duse and her visit to Paris. D'Annunzio was with her when the invitation to the Renaissance came, and when, according to Comte Primoli, she was in two minds as to accepting it. D'Annunzio recalled to her the generous reception the work of a young and unknown Italian novelist had received in France. "Je suis sûr," he said, "que vous trouverez à Paris mieux que partout ailleurs des oreilles attentives et des âmes recueillies." Duse, still unconvinced, pointed out that, as Parisians did not know her tongue, attentive ears would be of little use. D'Annunzio said that was of small account, since she would astound them with the thousand expressions of her mobile face and the music of Italian words. "Jolie musique!" Duse is reported to have said. "Mon répertoire se compose de mauvaises traductions de pièces françaises connues!" She then challenged him to write her "une œuvre de poésie."

"Vous n'y pensez pas: en une semaine! C'est une folie!"
'Alors faites-moi un rôle de folie.'
'Vous iriez à Paris?'
'A cette seule condition.'
'Eh, bien, dans dix jours vous aurez votre folie!'"

The "folie" was completed in the given time; the MS., bound in a piece of rare brocade and tied with green ribbons, was in Duse's hands. It was "Le Songe d'une Matinée de Printemps."

MAYPOLE SOAP

For Dyeing Silks, Satins, Velvets, Cottons
Feathers, Lace Goods, Wool, &c.

Such as Lace Curtains, Antimacassars, Toilet Mats, Blouses, Dresses, Underlinen, Ribbons, Children's Frocks, Pinafores, Lamp Shades,
Silk Scarves, Handkerchiefs, Gentlemen's Shirts,
Silk Gloves, Stockings, Shawls, &c., &c.

4d. per Tablet, all Colours. Black 6d. Sold Everywhere.

THE MAYPOLE COMPANY, Ltd.,
98 AND 99, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

SATURDAY, JULY 24, 1897.

No. 1316, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom.	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c.	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

BOOKS on naval history and practice may or may not be literature; in most cases, of course, they are not, but literature may be read into them. They are fragments, so to speak, of the unwritten epic of the British Navy. Hence, in a week in which pure literature is hardly represented in our list of new books, it cannot be improper to give the first place to Capt. H. Garbett's R.N. work, Naval Gunnery, just published by Messrs. George Bell & Sons. Capt. Garbett's aim, as expressed by himself, is

"to trace the history of naval gunnery from the date when guns are first mentioned as having been used on board ship down to our own time, and to put into a readable form enough of the heavy matter contained in the standard text-books to give non-professional readers a fair insight into the causes which have brought us from the smooth-bore muzzle-loading 68-pounder, the heaviest gun in existence at the time of the Russian War, to the breech-loading 111-ton guns of the Sans Pareil and Benbow, and from the smooth-bore 32-pounder of the same period to the 6-inch quick-firing gun of to-day; and also to give some idea of how the guns on board men-of-war are now constructed, mounted and worked, and how complex but formidable a fighting machine is the battleship of the present day when compared to the wooden ships of the line and frigates of only thirty years ago."

With Capt. Garbett's book comes a new volume of the publications of the Navy Records Society—The Journal of Sir George Rooke. Mr. Oscar Browning edits the Journal, which he states to be an account of an expedition into the Sound in 1700, and of an attack on Cadiz and Vigo in 1702.

Colonial books may be expected for some time to come. Mr. William Gisborne, a member of the New Zealand House of Representatives, has revised and practically re-written a work published by him ten years ago, entitled New Zealand Rulers and Statesmen, from 1840 to 1897. A leading feature of the book is its series of portraits and character-sketches of the statesmen who have had to deal with the problems of New Zealand politics. These problems have been, many of them, extremely knotty: "take, for instance," says Mr. Gisborne, "the assumption of British sovereignty founded upon what is called the Treaty of Waitangi; the native land question; the mutual relations of the Crown, the natives, and the colonists; the work of colonisation in the midst of civil warfare; self-government; internal defence; the union of the two races under conflicting conditions." Many of the men who dealt with these questions are now dead, and it was certainly time, as Mr. Gisborne suggests, that their Valhalla was constituted.

Early in this year Mr. Augustine Birrell, who is Quain Professor of Law at University College, London, delivered four lectures to his students upon The Law of Employers' Liability at Home and Abroad. These lectures are now issued in part by Messrs. Macmillan & Co., and they make an attractive little book. Mr. Birrell has already published his lectures, delivered in the Inner Temple last year, upon The Duties and Liabilities of Trustees, and these two books, together with Mr. W. Blake Odgers' Outlines of the Law of Libel, suggest the growth of a little library in which legal subjects might be treated after a new fashion; for these books are entertaining as well as learned and practical.

A book of interest and importance to schoolmasters is Teaching and Organisation, edited by P. A. Barnett, M.A. It is a manual of teaching practice written on a "frankly empirical plan" by a number of practised teachers. The editor humorously prefixes to the book the following colloquy between Smith and Cade in Henry vi. 2:

"SMITH: He can write, and read, and cast account.

"CADE: O monstrous!

"SMITH: We took him setting of boys' copies.

"CADE: Here's a villain!"

Books of maxims, and books on the conduct of life generally, seem to have been issued in numbers in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Balthasar Gracian's book of maxims was then translated from the Spanish, and last October Judge E. A. Parry revealed to us the existence of Osborne's Advice to a Son. Mr. Herbert H. Sturmer has been exploring this field, and has just produced a re-written version of The Counsels of William de Britaine. Mr. Sturmer tells us that his book is founded on the eleventh (1717) edition of de Britaine's Humane Prudence, of which the first edition appeared in 1680. Although this edition appears to be the best, it is full of printer's errors, and presents, according to Mr. Sturmer, "an extraordinary mélange of styles." Just what amount of revision

Mr. Sturmer has brought to the original text it is not easy to gather, and for our own part we should have preferred a reprint of the old text—assuming it is worth reprinting—with all faults. Mr. Sturmer has tried hard to identify William de Britaine. He believes that this name is a pseudonym, and that the writer, whatever his name, was a South Welshman, a scholarly man of the world, fond of retirement, with a turn for epigram, and whose father's name was William. A writer who answers to this description is John Davies, of Kidwelly (Carmarthenshire), who was a fairly prolific writer, and the author of Epictetus Junior; or, Maxims of Modern Morality, and another similar work. The book which Mr. Sturmer presents to us is divided into thirty-two chapters, with such headings as—"Of Religion," "Of Injuries and Revenge," "Of the Art of Being Happy," &c., &c.

A new and cheaper edition of Messrs. Cassell & Co.'s Familiar Wild Flowers is sure to be welcomed. Originally published in five volumes at 12s. 6d. each, this work is to be issued in the same number of volumes at 3s. 6d. each. The coloured plates throughout are good and numerous. Meanwhile, Mr. J. H. Crawford publishes, through Mr. John Macqueen, Wild Flowers of Scotland. Botanising in Scotland has features of its own:

"If," says Mr. Macqueen, "only a bold man dare take the golden eagle's eggs from the face of a 'campion precipice, it needs a bolder one still to rob that little colony of alpine, faintly glowing through the field-glass, five hundred feet above and below."

A new edition of the late Prof. Henry Drummond's Ascent of Man is issued by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton, making the twenty-fifth thousand.

Bishops of the Day is a squat octavo in a blue cloth cover studded with episcopal coats-of-arms; its aim is "to give some account of the life and work of every living Archbishop and Bishop, without exception, 'the Church of England, and of Churches in communion therewith, including colonial, missionary, suffragan, and the retired Bishops, as well as the Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THOUGHTS FOR ALL TIMES. By the Right Rev. Mgr. John S. Vaughan. The Roxburghe Press. 5s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

NEW ZEALAND RULERS AND STATESMEN: FROM 1840 TO 1897. By William Gisborne. Sampson Low.
A REGISTER OF THE MEMBERS OF ST. MARY MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXFORD. By William Dunn Macray, M.A. Vol. II: FELLOWS, 1522-1575. Henry Frowde.
PUBLICATIONS OF THE NAVY RECORDS SOCIETY. Vol. IX. THE JOURNAL OF SIR GEORGE ROOKE, ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET, 1700-1702. Edited by Oscar Browning. The Navy Records Society.

ART, POETRY, THE DRAMA.

THE TEMPLE DRAMATISTS: THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL. By Richard Brinsley Sheridan. Edited by G. A. Aitken. J. M. Dent & Co.

FICTION.

A RICH MAN'S DAUGHTER. By Mr. S. J. H. Riddell. F. V. White & Co.

THE CHEVALIER D'AUBIAC. By S. Levett Yeats. Longmans, Green & Co. 6s.

THE MUTABLE MANY. By Robert Barr. Methuen & Co. 6s.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE LOWELL LECTURES ON THE ASCENT OF MAN. Twenty-fifth thousand. By Henry Drummond. Hodder & Stoughton.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE WILD FLOWERS OF SCOTLAND. By J. H. Crawford. John Macqueen.

FAMILIAR WILD FLOWERS. Figured and Described by F. Edward Hulme. First Series. Cassell & Co. 3s. 6d.

TOPOGRAPHICAL.

WHITBY PAST AND PRESENT. By Robert B. Holt. Copas & Co.

EDUCATIONAL.

KEY TO THE GRADUATED COURSE OF TRANSLATION INTO FRENCH PROSE. By Victor Spiers, M.A. J. Tamblyn.

A COURSE OF PRACTICAL CHEMISTRY. By M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A. Part I., ELEMENTARY. Longmans, Green & Co. 4s. 6d.

TEACHING AND ORGANISATION. Edited by P. A. Barnett, M.A. Longmans, Green & Co. 6s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NAVAL GUNNERY. By Captain H. Garbett, R.N. George Bell & Sons. 5s.

THE LAW OF EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY AT HOME AND ABROAD. By Augustine Birrell, M.P. Macmillan & Co.

THE COUNSELS OF WILLIAM DE BRETAGNE. Edited by Herbert H. Sturmer. F. E. Robinson.

DURHAM CATHEDRAL: AN ADDRESS. By William Greenwell. Fifth edition. Andrews & Co. (Durham).

FRUITS AND FARINACEA: THE PROPER FOOD OF MAN. By John Smith. Ideal Publishing Union.

A HANDY BOOK OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. By Rev. Edward L. Cutts, D.D. New edition. S.P.C.K.

HISTORY OF THE OLDHAM LYCEUM (1839-1897). By Arthur Taft. Henry C. Lee.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IT has lately come to the knowledge of Mr. Charles Baxter, sole executor of the late R. L. Stevenson, that a translation of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde has been running gaily through the pages of Le Temps, under the title of Dr. Jancourt, signed with the name of a French writer. Mr. Baxter has asked for an explanation from the proprietors of Le Temps. Here is a translation of their reply:

"Le Temps, 5, Boulevard des Italiens, Paris.
July 17, 1897.

"We have been deceived by the author who delivered to us, as unpublished, the story entitled Dr. Jancourt. When this deception was made known to us, we announced that Dr. Jancourt was taken from R. L. Stevenson, and, further, we requested M. Flotron, the writer in question, to explain his conduct to MM. Plon Nourrit, the publishers and the owners of the rights of translation of the original story [Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde]. That was done. Pending these negotiations we ceased the publication of Dr. Jancourt, as you may convince yourself by the series of Le Temps that I am sending you.

"We have, then, after becoming the victim of a deception equally prejudicial to ourselves, done our best to safeguard the rights of the publishers and translators as well as the reputation of R. L. Stevenson.

"It is quite understood that we shall not reproduce Dr. Jancourt in any form whatever.

"Accept, Sir, the assurance of our highest consideration.

"C. PARISSET,

"Le Directeur-Général de la Société du Journal Le Temps."

And there the matter rests for the present.

WITH the instalment in the August Pall Mall Magazine Robert Louis Stevenson's romance "St. Ives" comes to its abrupt end. According to the editor's announcement: "At this point the story breaks off, having been laid aside by the author some weeks before his death. At the request of the executors of the author, Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch has undertaken to complete the story from notes furnished by Mrs. Strong, step-daughter and amanuensis of the late Robert Louis Stevenson. The story will be completed in six chapters, the first instalment appearing in the Pall Mall Magazine for September." On reading Stevenson's last chapters, less and less do we envy Mr. Quiller-Couch his task. The state of the story is now crucial—the style richer than ever in Stevensonian inevitabilities, the atmosphere electric. It will require all "Q.'s" ingenuity to "jine the flats."

MR. KIPLING's silence at the time of the Diamond Jubilee celebrations was commented upon, near and far. While the Poet Laureate, Sir Lewis Morris, Prof. Courthope, and a number of other singers gave voice to the national joy and satisfaction, Mr. Kipling said nothing. It was considered odd, because it is known that no one loves England and England's greatness more jealously than he. But Mr. Kipling had his own reasons. He is not merely a literary man concerned with the fittingness of syllables: he is a traveller, an unerring observer of men and nations; in short, an imperialist who knows his subject and feels strongly. Hence the very remarkable poem which he has contributed to the Times.

THE other singers gave us "Processionals": Mr. Kipling's contribution is called "Recessional." It is grave and sonorous as the warning of an oracle, and, above all, it is timely. Mr. Kipling knows both how and when to strike.

We observe that Mr. Kipling's poem has met with some hostility. The Chronicle, for example, considers his present position of national admonisher to "beat cock-fighting," and charges him with insincerity. We know very little of cock-fighting, but we do know that an author is capable of development, and that the patriotic poems in The Seven Seas are the direct precursors of such an utterance as this Recessional. "When we want admonishment," says the Chronicle—"as we often do—we turn to the great names of Milton and Wordsworth. But when we think of Mr. Kipling there arises the vision of certain immortal (but not impeccable) 'Tommies,' not of a prophet of 'fate, foreknowledge, free-will absolute.'" But to regard Mr. Kipling in this limited way is to take no account of his astounding variety and vigour. No man has done more to deserve more generous treatment. We should call the "Recessional" as sincere an expression of the more serious political Kipling as the Barrack-Room Ballads are of the other.

MR. KIPLING's poem is to be set to music by Sir Arthur Sullivan with the author's consent.

IN the current number of The Sketch, a reviewer claims to give the final, flawless estimate of the work entitled Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign which Messrs. Hurst & Blackett have recently published. This he has been led to do by what he considers the mistaken views of other papers, from a number of which, under the pretext of seeing "what the critics have to say," he quotes detached lines. With the Sketch reviewer's own remarks on the book we are not concerned, but we do object most strongly to a single line from our review being cited as showing what the ACADEMY's critic "has to say" of the book. The ACADEMY critic wrote at length, deliberately, and with an admixture of praise and blame. To pick out six words from his three-column article and print them as what he "has to say" is unjust. Nothing less than his complete article shows what he "has to say."

WE can understand publishers, for obvious business reasons, detaching favourable lines from reviews of books, and calling them the opinions of critics, but it is not a practice that critics themselves should resort to. Had the Sketch reviewer given his extracts merely as a reproduction of the publisher's advertisement we should have nothing to remark. It is when he adds his own comment that this is the opinion of the critics that we object.

THE announcement made by a contemporary that the biography of Prof. Huxley would be issued by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. simultaneously with the life of Lord Tennyson was incorrect. Prof. Huxley's biography will not be seen until the autumn of 1898. We may add that it is being written by the late Prof. Huxley's son, Mr. Leonard Huxley, and that this is the one fact concerning the book that can be given to the public at present.

THE life of Lord Tennyson, written by his son, the present Lord Tennyson, will appear on October 6, and will be contained in two volumes. Some fears have been expressed that this biography might prove to be too severely edited from a family point of view. We shall know the truth of this when the book appears; but in writing the life Lord Tennyson has obtained the advice of many friends of the late Poet Laureate. The biography will contain a number of unpublished poems by the late Laureate.

IT is not probable that any startling development in the discount struggle will take place just yet. But there is no mistake about the reality of the struggle. The publishers are unanimously in favour of the 2d. discount, and they will render effectual aid to the Booksellers' Association. In conversation with a leading publisher the other day we gathered that the difficulties of the question and the strength of the opposition are fully realised by the party of reform.

IN connexion with the revived popularity of the poems of Col. John Hay, the American Ambassador, a correspondent sends a parody of "Jim Bludso," cut by him some two or three years ago from the columns of the Globe, that treasury of parodies. It should, he thinks, amuse Col. Hay's new readers. The circumstance that called forth the parody (which, by the way, purports to be written by Col. Jack Straw) was a fire in Whitechapel, from which a number of girls were rescued by means of an omnibus backed by its driver against the building:

TIM WHIPSO,

Of the Pirate 'Bus.

He weren't no saint—they driver blokes
Is all of a piece, you know,
One wife in Highgate, top of the hill,
And another one here, at Bow.
While this is all the religion he had—
To treat his hosses well,
Never be passed by a rival 'bus,
And mind the conductor's bell.

But as full of grit as you like was Tim,
With an awkward tongue in a block:
Why, I've heard him reproving a Pickford
Till the hoss went lame from the shock.
And he worried the slops—but on Court days
I'd run my chance with Tim,
For there ain't a beak as could come down hard
On a man who could joke like him.

All shops has their day in Whitechapel,
And Goldstein's come at last;
The flames was licking the Milky Way
When Tim went driving past.
He saw a face at a window,
And backed his 'bus and roared,
'I'll hold the staircase agin' the kerb
Till the last girl out's on board!'

Through the hot black breath of the burning house
Tim Whipso's voice was heard,
And they all had trust in his cussedness
And knowed he would keep his word.
And Tim's conductor caught her
As she jumped for it then and there,
And, true to his pirate principles,
He charged her double fare!

A REVIEWER in the Chronicle, writing of a work on polo, mentions Mr. Kipling's story, "The Maltese Cat," as the only reference to the game in fiction. To what extent the game may have been treated by novelists we cannot say, but certainly there is a fine and exciting polo match in Mr. Crawford's novel, Mr. Isaacs.

SOME few weeks ago, in anticipation of the tourist season, orders went forth that Custom House officers were to be strict in confiscating Tauchnitz volumes. Possibly with a view to the encouragement of literary smugglers, Messrs. Heinemann & Balestier's Library, which sprang into existence half-a-dozen years ago and suddenly ceased its activities, has now recommenced. Since January, Mr. Kipling's Jungle Book and Anthony Hope's Prisoner of Zenda have been added to the list. It remains to be seen whether the rules concerning Tauchnitz volumes extend also to the rival series.

MR. ANTHONY HOPE will visit America in the autumn for the purpose of delivering fifty readings from his books.

THE latest book-collecting story is not bad. A book-lover, who is also a tobacco-lover, walked into an East-end tobacconist's shop just in time to see the proprietress calmly tearing pages from a black-letter book to make wrappers for half ounces of shag. The book was an Elizabethan volume called The Good Housewife's Jewell. He bought it for a shilling. But three leaves had already been basely used and were gone from the shop. The collector offered a reward for each of the missing pages, not a large one—he did the whole thing frugally—but the promise of a pint of beer to each of the three purchasers who had a page in his possession was quite enough. The missing three pages were all recovered, though one was literally plucked from the burning, a navy having twisted it up to light his pipe with it.

A SCHOOLMASTER having read, with pain and surprise, the Spectator's recent article on "The Illiterate Undergraduate," to which we have already alluded, set fifteen boys in the upper school sixth form a literary examination paper to test the soundness of the Granta's pessimistic views, these boys being fairly representative of the average undergraduate. In the result eleven boys "showed at least a fair, some a very good, knowledge of David Copperfield. The two best papers, which were really admirable examples of literary criticism, did not attempt this question, I cannot suppose from ignorance, but from want of time. Nine showed a good knowledge of Kingsley. Eight gave me a good account of one out of the three of Sir Walter Scott's greater novels to which I limited them. Ten showed an admirable knowledge of either Esmond, Vanity Fair, or The Newcomes, one or two of these answers being particularly excellent. The average number of Stevenson's works which these boys had read was four. The average number of George Eliot's was one. Three only, I regret to say, knew anything about Mrs. Proudie, but though Trollope is my favourite novelist, he has unaccountably declined in public favour."

So much for the upper school. The schoolmaster continues: "Hardly a boy in the fifth and middle forms was in the state described by the Granta, though I regret to say most of the 'moderns' were. Yet some even of these were not so."

It is stated that Mark Twain will spend the winter in Vienna, where his daughter, who intends to become a public singer, will take lessons.

A new edition of the late Prof. Drummond's Ascent of Man has just been published, bringing the work to its twenty-fifth thousand. In the August number of Wee Willie Winkie, a bright little magazine for "bairns," which is controlled by Lady Aberdeen and her daughter, a humorous story for children from Prof. Drummond's pen will be published under the title "The Monkey That Would Not Kill."

THE first volume of a new scientific series will be published in the autumn called "The Progressive Science Series." The title, which is intended to be indicative of the character and scope of the volumes as opposed to a series whose object were merely historical or expository. In other words, the volumes, although not in any way neglecting history or exposition, will endeavour to indicate the line of future discoveries in each particular branch, and save investigators trouble by going over ground that has recently been trodden without result. Among the authors and volumes already in preparation are the following: Prof. Cope will write on Vertebrate Palaeontology, Mr. Geikie on Earth Structure, Mr. St. George Mivart on the Groundwork of Science, Mr. Bonney on Volcanoes. Other volumes are in contemplation on Heredity in Relation to Crime, in both its legal and scientific aspects, on the Relation between Science and Religion, upon the Animal Ovum, upon Theories of Matter, and possibly a volume upon Marriage and Divorce. The series in its entirety will comprise volumes on every branch of science, some half-dozen or more being published in each year at first. Mr. Beddard is the general editor of the series, which will be issued by Messrs. Bliss, Sands & Co.

Captain Cuellar's Adventures in Ireland in 1688 is the title of a new work on the Spanish Armada to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock immediately. The first part is by Mr. Hugh Allingham, who gives a history from contemporary sources of the destruction of part of the Armada on the Irish coast, and of Captain Cuellar's adventures after being cast ashore. The second part contains a complete translation from the Spanish by Mr. Robert Crawford, and Cuellar's own narrative of the Armada and his travels in Connacht and Ulster.

MESSRS. BLISS, SANDS & Co. will publish on October 15 a large art work under the title Christ and His Mother in Italian Art. The work is edited by the Rev. Canon Eyton and Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady). It consists of fifty examples of Madonnas, holy families, nativities, crucifixions, and other subjects portraying the various incidents in the life of Jesus Christ. A portfolio of India proofs of these plates for the purpose of framing will accompany the volume.

THE second edition of Mr. Henry Dunning MacLeod's Theory of Credit, vol. ii., part ii., will be published next week.

THE forthcoming number of Macmillan's Magazine will contain a short poem to the memory of Mrs. Oliphant by the Rev. J. H. Skrine, author of Joan the Maid. It will also include a description of a famine camp in Burmah, by a writer well known in the East by the name of "H. Fielding." The fiction will comprise a further instalment of Mrs. Fraser's novel, "A Chapter of Accidents," and a short story called "A Village Sovereign."

A BUNDLE OF EPITAPHS.

IT is wonderful, considering how self-conscious is the race of bards, that so few poets have composed their own epitaphs. One would have thought that, with the essential morbidness of the poetic temperament, most, if not all, of them would have devoted some melancholy hour to the pleasing task of thinking out a verse for their tombstones. Yet how few there are who have done it! Keats, of course, one of the youngest and consequently most self-conscious of poets, did so, and every one knows the celebrated line which he ordered to be placed upon his grave:

"Here lies one whose name was writ in water."

Surely an epitaph as pathetic as any that has been made for early death and genius, and one that must have touched an answering chord in such a man as Byron, despite the contemptuous couplet in Don Juan:

"'Tis strange the mind, that very fiery particle, Should let itself be snuffed out by an article."

Few poets, however, have been so happy in their self-composed epitaphs as Keats. Coleridge wrote two, one in Latin and one in English, both bad. Prior one, which may be quoted rather for its brevity than for any particular merit:

"To me 'twas given to die, to thee 'tis given
To live: alas! one moment sets us even,
Mark! How impartial is the will of Heaven."

Yes, it is certainly bad! Herrick's two are better, but still not good. One is of the ordinary commonplace order. The other may be quoted, if only for its extraordinary metre:

"Thus I
Pass by,
And die,
As one Unknown
And gone:
I'm made
A shade,
And laid
I' th' grave,
There have
My cave;
Where till
I dwell,
Fare well."

Its merit is not conspicuous. There is, of course, the famous one of Shakespeare, though some are hardy enough to deny that Shakespeare wrote it:

"Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here!
Blest be the man that spares these stones,
And curst be he that moves my bones."

Villon made "an epitaph in the form of a ballade" for himself and his companions, expecting to be hanged along with them, but it is too long to give here, and is strictly speaking more ballade than epitaph. He also made a quatrain on himself when he was condemned to death.

Horace in one of his most celebrated Odes writes a couple of lines which, if they were not intended for an epitaph, have been plentifully used as such:

"Non omnis moriar multaque pars me Vitabit Libitinam—"

which the old cynic in Mr. Mallock's New

Republic adapted to himself sufficiently neatly as:

"Omnis moriar nullaue pars mei Vitabit Libitinam."

It is in the New Republic, too, that that other extract from Horace is made to do duty as an epitaph for a courtesan:

"Lusisti satis, edisti satis, atque bibisti Tempus abire tibi est."

"You have wantoned enough with me; you have eaten enough of my substance; you have drunk enough of my champagne; 'tis high time for you to go"—as he translates it.

Swift, as one would expect, composed his own epitaph, and a fine one it is:

"Hic depositum est Corpus
Jonathan Swift, S.T.P.
Hujus ecclesie Cathedralis
Decani
Ubi sæva indignatio
Uterius cor lacerare nequit.
Abi Viator
Et imitare, si poteris,
Strenuum pro virili libertatis vindicem."

Nothing could be finer nor more apt than the sæva indignatio of the fifth line, and nothing more characteristic of Swift than the trumpeting of his patriotism in lines eight and nine. Poor Swift was never tired of recalling to his readers his share in the rather ignoble Irish squabble with what seems to have been a tolerably harmless measure of currency, Wood's halfpence.

The great storehouse of epitaphs either made by the persons buried beneath them, or at least written as if so made, is, of course, the Greek Anthology. These epitaphs have the simple, lucid, unstrained style which is to be found only in Ben Jonson's epitaphs among English poets. The ability to tell the plain story of the dead man plainly and yet poetically is his alone among the moderns. Among the Greeks it was more common. There is no straining after effect, no attempt at wit, nothing that could be called in the modern sense epigrammatic. Very often the couplet or quatrain contains merely a brief, simple statement of how the deceased lived and died, without a word either of comment or criticism. There are, of course, exceptions. The following, for example, has undeniably the epigrammatic touch:

Ἐξηκοτοῦτης Διονύσιος ἐνθάδε κείμεναι
Τάρσευς, μὴ γήμας· αἶθε δὲ μήδ' ὁ πατήρ.

"Here lie I, Dionysius of Tarsus, dead at sixty. I never married. Would my father had not!"

A more splendid epitaph for a true cynic it would be impossible to conceive. Even that single word "Miserrimus" over an unknown grave at Westminster is not more impressive. There are epitaphs on shipwrecked sailors without number in the Anthology, and most of them are very happy.

Ναυήγου τάρφος εἶμι· οὐ δὲ πλέε· καὶ γὰρ δὲ ἡμεῖς ἄλουμεθ', αἱ λοιπαὶ νῆες ἐποντοπόρου.

"I am the tomb of one shipwrecked, but sail thou on. For when we sank, others were safe on sea."

It is, of course, impossible to give the neatness and delicacy of the Greek, but even in English the effect is not wholly lost. Here is one of the simplest and most characteristic. Ben Jonson might have written it, but surely no other English poet:

Δωδεκατῇ τὸν παῖδα πάτερ ἀπέθηκε Φίλιππος ἐνθάδε, τὴν πόλιν ἐλπίδα, Νικοτέλες.

"His father Philip buried here his twelve-year old boy, his darling hope, Nicoteles."

There are besides two admirable epitaphs on seamen by Plato which are perhaps too well known to quote. This of Simonides, however, may be given for the sake of the grim irony in its last line:

Κρήε γενεάν Βροτάχου Γορτύσιος ἐνθάδε κείμεναι
Οὐ κατὰ τοῦτ' ἐλθέειν, ἀλλὰ κατὰ ἐμπορίας.

"A Cretan by birth, I, Brotachus, of Gortyna, lie here, who came not hither for this, but for traffic."

The humour of the man who did not set out to find a tomb but only to sell merchandise could hardly be more delicately suggested. There is a neat one by Fleming, which is worth quoting, though flippancy is rather out of place in an epitaph:

"What thou art reading o'er my bones
I've often read on other stones;
And others soon shall read of thee
What thou art reading now of me."

The following by S. A. is a neat translation of one of Plato's:

"That is a farmer's, this a sailor's grave:
One end awaits the land, and one the wave."

The difficulty being that it is the same end which awaits them, whereas the English might mean a different one. Another translation, from the same hand, is better:

"In holy slumber here reposing lies Timocritus: ne'er say the good man dies."

It is a pity that a collection of what might be called self-made epitaphs is not made. They would make an interesting book, and though some of them would no doubt be difficult to authenticate, it would surely be possible to obtain enough to fill a small volume.

JEAN INGELow.

SOME admirers of Miss Jean Ingelow may be surprised, others perhaps grieved, that her death has not been the occasion of more important biographical notices. One morning paper gives her a brief paragraph to which the importance of a head-line is denied. Another evades the duty of giving any dates or other landmarks of her career. A third (and this the Chronicle), giving the date of her first signed book of poems, antedates it by twenty years. The list of inadequacies might be prolonged; yet the newspapers are not to be blamed for any intention of neglect. Miss Ingelow herself is responsible; for she had never scattered about her any biographical materials. Very deliberate in all she did—she waited till she was forty-three before she published her first acknowledged book of verse—she did not anticipate her death by any details for publication about her life. She was old-fashioned in most things, even to primness, in her dress, in her speech, in her notions—one of which was that women should not tell their ages to the public of strangers. Born "about" such and such a year is, therefore, the nearest guess that books of biographical reference supply of her. These are the reticences which led to a certain barrenness of biographical notice at the time of her death; not any failure in admiration for the writer of Brothers and a Sermon, of Divided, of High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire, of Gladys and her Island, and of all those other songs and poems of sea and land and sky, varied in their human interest, sometimes dramatic and sometimes lyrical, but always brave and clean and smiling, with which she delighted her readers in the sixties, winning a place in popular favour second only to that of Tennyson. Her first series of "Poems" has reached by now a twenty-third edition. There is no regret for that. There is no critic to grudge to work such as hers that great success. Or if there is the ghost of a regret, it is one bred of comparison only. "Imagine my feelings of envy and humiliation!" cried out Miss Christina Rossetti on receiving a copy of only the eighth edition of Miss Ingelow.

Jean Ingelow (the Jean came from her Scottish mother, and the g in the surname is a soft one) was born in 1820 at Boston, in Lincolnshire. She has made music out of Boston bells; more uniformly than Tennyson does Lincolnshire and the East Coast appear and reappear in her poetry. Her father was a banker, and afterwards moved to Ipswich. Banking and Evangelicalism have conspicuously run together in certain well-known families; and they did in hers. Almost Quakerlike some of her likings and aversions might be called. She had no sympathy, for instance, with the war-note which nearly every modern poet has awakened. Even Tennyson, for whom she had an intense admiration, had no message for her there; and the younger poets, who took Tommy Atkins for their hero, could never be hers. In all her many poems not one line, not one word, will be found in justification, still less in praise, of war. In Kismet the story of a boy's longing for freedom and the sea is given; and somebody once suggested to her that she had helped perhaps to recruit the Navy. This suggestion meant only horror for her, and she gave the verses a careful re-reading, intending, if she thought that interpretation a possible one, to cancel the offending stanza, or, if necessary, the whole poem. She not only hated evil, she loved to do good. Her charities to the poor were unceasing.

Miss Ingelow's first volume, A Rhyming Chronicle of Incidents and Feelings, appeared anonymously in 1850. Then in 1863 came the Poems by Jean Ingelow, which never paused till fourteen editions had been sold, and which are selling, but less resolutely, to this day. Her fame was made in a month. She was set to music, she was recited, she was parodied by Calverley, and brought out in an illustrated édition de luxe. From Boston, not indeed in Lincolnshire, but in New England, she had hundreds of letters and two newspaper notices to tell her that in America, even more quickly than in England, she had made her mark on contemporary sentiment. James Russell Lowell and Oliver Wendell Holmes were her admirers. Even Tennyson was generous in his encomiums. Mr. Ruskin, whose praise has always been precious to women, was at her feet. So that the critic and the casual reader for once agreed together in their appreciation. Of this quick and keen popularity there has been some failure, no doubt, in later days. Her Story of Doom, and Other Poems, had a welcome only second to its predecessor; but the third series of Poems had to make its way among a crowd of new competitors. Time, however, will always right the slight injustice of reaction; and even at this hour there is a sort of remorse of reconsideration among those who have left Miss Ingelow's poems neglected on their shelves these last ten or twenty years. Their old beauty comes as a new surprise. Never hungry for fame, she did not mourn over any signs of its decline.

She did a vast amount of prose writing in the seventies—Off the Skelligs, Fated to be Free, Don John, and Sarah de Berenger. Other books of hers were: Stories Told to a Child, Studies for Stories, and Mopsa the Fairy. She wrote with great facility; and she did not alter or polish much in either prose or verse. Though influenced in style by Coleridge, by Tennyson, by Wordsworth, she had her own definite note, distinguishable by its simple freshness. She thought she was meant to be "more original than the creature afterwards became"; but that saying she applied, we imagine, to her life more than to her literature. Among her intimate friends was Mr. Mundella, who survived her only one day.

Very conventional were her surroundings when, after her mother's death, she moved from Holland-street to Holland Villas-road, Kensington. The little house had a little garden; and, perhaps, the greatest excitement in her later life was a garden-party of her own giving. One of the last appearances of Mr. Locker-Lampson was in that very garden one summer afternoon; and in that guest and hostess have passed away types that are rapidly becoming extinct, delightful in old-world courtesy, indulgent to the errors of days gone by, if a little impatient to the moods of a generation younger than their own.

In accounting for the great popularity obtained by Miss Ingelow, one has only to remember how often and how well she sang of the sea: not the sea on which our warships and our mercantile navies ride gloriously, but the sea we have known best in childhood, on which the herring fleet puts forth in the evening. We think, indeed, that Miss Ingelow will be longest remembered as the fisherman's poet. No poet has been more haunted by the roar of winter seas beneath the cliffs on which the lights of the fishing village flit and flicker. No poet has so persistently sung the dirges of those whom the sea has claimed. Take the verses from the "Requiescat in Pace":

"It was three months and over since the dear lad had started:
On the green downs at Cromer I sat to see the view;
In an open space of herbage, where the ling
and fern had parted,
Betwixt the tall white lighthouse towers,
the old and the new.

"Below me lay the wide sea, the scarlet sun was stooping,
And he dyed the waste water, as with a scarlet dye;
And he dyed the lighthouse towers; every bird with white wing swooping Took his colours, and the cliffs did, and the yawning sky.

"Over grass came that strange flush, and over ling and heather,
Over flocks and sheep and lambs, and over
Cromer town;
And each filmy cloudlet crossing drifted like a scarlet feather
Torn from the folded wings of clouds, while he settled down."

It is significant that the one of the very sweetest lyrical passages in Miss Ingelow's poetry has a terrible context. For the milking-song that "my sonne's wife, Elizabeth," sings in The High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire is the last her lips make before the tide, deaf to the mad ringing of Boston church bells, sweeps over the pasture. This is how Elizabeth sung:

"'Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!' calling,
Ere the early dews were falling,
Farre away I heard her song.
'Cusha! Cusha!' all along
Where the reedy Lindis floweth,
Floweth, floweth;
From the meads where melick groweth,
Faintly came her milking song—

"'Cusha! Cusha! Cusha!' calling
'For the dews will soon be falling;
Leave your meadow grasses mellow,
Mellow, mellow;
Quit your cowlips, cowlips yellow;
Come uppe Whitefoot, come uppe Lightfoot,
Quit the stalks of parsley hollow,
Hollow, hollow;
Come up Jetty, rise and follow,
From the clovers lift your head;
Come uppe Whitefoot, come uppe Lightfoot,
Come uppe Jetty, rise and follow,
Jetty, to the milking shed.'"

Such verse is not great, but it is pleasant. Much of Miss Ingelow's poetry speaks from the heart; particularly is this true of the verse which we will quote in conclusion:

"O my lost love, and my own, own love,
And my love that loved me so!
Is there never a chink in the world above
Where they listen for words from below?
Nay, I spoke once, and I grieved thee sore,
I remember all that I said,
And now thou wilt hear me no more—no more Till the sea gives up her dead."

"SHIRLEY."

THE Blackwood group of writers has suffered another loss in the death of Sir John Skelton ("Shirley"), who had long been a contributor to Blackwood's Magazines. Sir John Skelton's later literary work was done in the leisure left to him after discharging the duties as Vice-President of the Local Government Board for Scotland, to which post he was presented by Sir George Trevelyan. In March last he resigned his office, which he had held by special license beyond the age limit. Sir John Skelton received one of the recent Jubilee knight-hoods, although he had not been actually invested with the honour. His favourite subject of study was Mary Queen of Scots, whom he ardently defended in a work which was the first of the series of sumptuous Lives of the Queens of England, which included the Bishop of London's Queen Elizabeth and the forthcoming Life of Queen Victoria by Mr. Holmes. In earlier life Sir John Skelton wrote a clever political novel, in which the hero was a blend of Canning and Disraeli. He also attempted to save Noctes Ambrosianæ from the neglect that had overtaken it by abridging it, an attempt which he had to admit was unsuccessful. An early number of the ACADEMY contained a very sympathetic review of Sir John's abridgment of Christopher North's book by the late Mr. Stevenson. Undoubtedly, Sir John Skelton's most popular book was his Table-Talk of Shirley, in which he gave his reminiscences of Mr. Froude, and many interesting letters that he had received from the historian. Sir John Skelton was an intimate friend of the late Mrs. Oliphant.

THE BOOK MARKET.

A LIBRARY FOR JOURNALISTS.

LONDON is full of a number of things, and every day one hears of a new one—new, that is, to one's circumscribed and ignorant self. The other day I became aware of the St. Bride's Foundation Institute, where, I was given to understand, there was a Library for Journalists. I put on my hat and went out to find that Foundation Institute and that Library for Journalists. Entering an imposing building in St. Bride's-lane, Fleet-street, some folding glazed doors attracted me, and I peeped through them. They opened on a swimming bath! Even while I gazed the long lean fin of a penny-a-liner went silently past me in the water, or so I deemed it; and beyond I saw what might be a school of sub-editors churning the green wave into copy—I mean foam. Amazed, I passed on to another door marked "Library," and entered. "Mr. Lange," I said, "I seem to perceive that I am in an Institution. Here I see hundreds of books, and I infer this is a Library. Talk to me at large till my surprise abates. Why are you here? and what niche in the universal scheme do you think you are filling?"

"I think," said Mr. Lange, "that I ought to refer you to the Secretary of the Institute for a full answer to your question, but I can tell you all about the Library. I may mention, however, that this Institute is one of those established in pursuance of a scheme under the City of London Parochial Charities Act of 1883. This scheme was approved by the Privy Council in 1883, and its practical outcome so far has been the erection of large institutes in Bishopsgate Without, Cripplegate, and here. The idea in building this particular Institute, which has been open a year and a half, was to establish technical classes in connexion with the printing trades."

"Now I understand. And the Library?"

"Well, to begin with, you should say libraries, not library. There are three distinct collections of books here, and I will name them in the order in which they were acquired. At the time when the technical classes were mooted Mr. William Blades's valuable library of books relating to the printing trades was found to be in the market. It would infallibly have been shortly dispersed, but a number of newspaper proprietors and other leading men in the Fleet-street neighbourhood had the spirit to buy it and lodge it here. I must now explain that the Blades books are mainly historical; they relate, that is to say, to past developments of printing and bookbinding. It was quickly seen, therefore, that they did not meet the whole requirements of the technical schools. To cut the story short, Mr. Passmore Edwards put down £500 for the purchase of the best modern text-books, and these, when obtained, were added to the Blades collection. We now make a point of securing every new and practical work on printing, bookbinding, lithography, colour-printing, and the allied arts, and also copies of all the trade journals."

"Then you claim to have a very good library of books about the making of books, and printing generally?"

"Yes, our collection is very large, and will disappoint very few people who wish to use it for reference. I have still to name our third collection. This is the general Lending and Reference Library which you see around you."

"How many books does it contain, Mr. Lange?"

"Over 4,000."

"Now will you give me an idea of the kind of reading that is popular here? Do you classify the books used?"

"Oh, yes; here is the tabular statement which I included in our last report. You will see that Fiction reigns here, as everywhere. The statement refers to the year 1896."

Mr. Lange handed me the following document, which I think sufficiently interesting to quote in its entirety:

ST. BRIDE FOUNDATION INSTITUTE LIBRARIES.

Total Issues from Jan. 1 to December 31, 1896.

A Religion and Philosophy . . .	710
B Biography . . .	1,059
C History and Archaeology . . .	1,147
D Law, Politics, and Sociology . . .	568
E Industrial Arts . . .	137
F Fine Arts . . .	485
G Science . . .	1,403
H Fiction . . .	47,101
J Poetry and Essays . . .	1,280
K Travel and Topography . . .	1,610
L Linguistics . . .	320
M Miscellaneous and Collected . . .	317
General Reference Department . . .	535
Technical Library . . .	94

Total 56,766

"The total," said Mr. Lange, commenting on this list, "works out an average of 189 books lent per day."

"And how many borrowers had you in 1896—your first year, was it not?"

"Yes, our first complete year. We had something over 500 on our lists in January; by the end of the year there were nearly 2,500 persons to whom we were lending books."

"Well, now, reverting to your list, will you tell me what kind of Fiction is most popular with your borrowers? Are the standard novelists—Scott, Dickens, Thackeray—much read?"

"Yes, the demand for these writers is very fair, especially for Dickens, whose popularity, I cannot help thinking, is on the increase. We have two sets of his works, and I believe that not a single volume of either set is on the shelves."

"Well, then, about modern writers?"

"Anthony Hope and Conan Doyle are very popular; so also is Stanley Weyman. During the run of 'Under the Red Robe' at the Haymarket Theatre we were asked for Weyman's novel dozens of times a day. Grant Allen's novels are popular with young clerks, and so are the novels of James Grant. Then the demand for Hall Caine's books is good."

"And Miss Marie Corelli?"

"Well, I needn't tell you."

"Excuse me, but you need. Are her works much in request?"

"Oh, dear, yes."

"Among men?"

"Yes; they want her books continually."

"By the way, who are your readers?"

"They belong to all classes, from printers' devils to bank managers. We have many Salvationists, many Post Office employés, especially from the Savings Banks. However, on the opening of the Cripplegate Institute we transferred fifteen hundred of our borrowers to it. Formerly we served the whole western portion of the City, but now we share this area with Cripplegate."

"I see you point out the usefulness of the Library to journalists."

"Yes; we refer especially to the six hundred or so books of reference which can be consulted here, but not taken away. These include all the usual works, not omitting the Dictionary of National Biography."

"And do journalists, as a matter of fact, make use of the Reference Library?"

"Not to anything like the extent that they might. The fact is, we have scarcely had time to make the Library fully known. Although we have some 4,400 books, exclusive of some 4,000 books in the technical collections, we regard the Library as still in its infancy."

"What is the qualification for borrowing?"

"A borrower must live or be employed in the district, and supply the signature of his employer or manager. We only require that it shall be possible to trace him. It is our policy to make borrowing extremely easy, and we have had no cause to alter it. In fact, we never lose a book."

"Have you a printed Catalogue of the books in the Library?"

"Oh, yes; here it is."

Mr. Lange put into my hands a well-arranged and neatly bound Catalogue of nearly 400 pages. The Library hours, I learned, are from 12 noon to 3 p.m., and from 5 p.m. till 9 p.m., and these hours apply to all departments.

WHAT AMERICA READS.

THE American Bookman again publishes interesting lists of the books which are now most in demand in the great towns of the States and Canada. In each list the books are named in order of demand. A partial analysis of the thirty lists shows that The Choir Invisible, by James Lane Allen, is the most popular volume of fiction in America just now. It heads ten lists. The next most popular book is still Sienkiewicz' Quo Vadis, no newer book having ousted it from the second place. It appears in nearly every list. Richard Harding Davis's Soldiers of Fortune is very popular; it heads four lists, and is named in fourteen. Other books that stand out prominently are The Green Book, by Maurus Jókai; The Great K. and A. Train Robbery, by Paul Leicester Ford; Miss Archer Archer, by Clara Louise Burnham; and there is fair demand for Ziska, Hilda Strafford, Lads' Love, and On the Face of the Waters. Mr. Le Gallienne's Quest of the Golden Gir is first favourite in Atlanta, while in Salt Lake City it will be seen that Mr. Gilbert Parker is most read. The proportion of American books now in favour with American readers seems to be larger than we have known it before, and this, of course, is as it should be, though we rejoice that English writers find both laurels and profits in the States. The following five lists show what books are most in favour in New York, Chicago, Boston, Salt Lake City, and Montreal:

NEW YORK.

1. The Choir Invisible. By James Lane Allen.
2. Soldiers of Fortune. By Richard Harding Davis.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. The Green Book. By Maurus Jókai.
5. The Hon. Peter Stirling. By Paul Leicester Ford.
6. The Great K. & A. Train Robbery. By P. L. Ford.

CHICAGO.

1. The Choir Invisible. By James Lane Allen.
2. Soldiers of Fortune. By Richard Harding Davis.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. On the Red Staircase. By Taylor.
5. The Pursuit of the House-Boat. By J. K. Bangs.
6. Miss Archer Archer. By Clara Louise Burnham.

BOSTON.

1. The Choir Invisible. By James Lane Allen.
2. Farthest North. By Dr. Nansen.
3. Quo Vadis. By Sienkiewicz.
4. Miss Archer Archer. By Clara Louise Burnham.
5. The Wisdom of Fools. By Margaret Deland.
6. Hilda Strafford. By Beatrice Harraden.

SALT LAKE CITY.

1. The Choir Invisible. By James Lane Allen.
2. Pierre and his People. By Gilbert Parker.
3. An Adventurer in the North. By Gilbert Parker.
4. Romany Snows. By Gilbert Parker.
5. King Noanett. By F. J. Stimson.
6. Checkers. By Blossom.

MONTREAL.

1. Lads' Love. By S. R. Crockett.
2. A Story-Teller's Pack. By Frank R. Stockton.
3. Hilda Strafford. By Beatrice Harraden.
4. Ziska. By Marie Corelli.
5. Odd. By the Author of Probable Sons.
6. On the Face of the Waters. By Flora Annie Steel.

MUSIC.

THE OPERA SEASON.

IT is easy to read the signs of the times: classical opera is not dead; novelties, unless very interesting, are dangerous; Wagner reigns all supreme. Those signs being well studied, a manager or syndicate ought to find little difficulty in framing a scheme which shall prove successful. By this I mean commercially successful. It would, of course, be a good thing if directors of an opera-house could first consider the claims of high art, but this will only be the case when the State grants an annual subsidy. Rent is dear, salaries are high, and current expenses are heavy; all this practical music has to be faced, and the taste of the public has, therefore, to be taken into consideration. And then the opera season is so short: there is no time for a really representative series of performances.

Why, it may be asked, does not the State offer to support a national opera-house? And again. Why does not the public agitate until such is granted? Of these two questions the second is the easier, and it shall therefore be answered first. There is a great public which never frequents the opera, and it is not at all likely that it will become sanguine about a thing of which it does not feel the need. And even the small public—for, as at concerts so at the opera, the same faces are to be seen over and over again—which does take interest in dramatic music is more or less satisfied with what is, and does not trouble itself about what ought to be. Public taste must be guided; it will not improve of itself. But statesmen, one might think, would see how much good would result from a national opera-house at which the best of every school could be heard. No doubt there are some in favour of such a scheme; however, the greater number, I fear, look upon stage performances as amusement; and past history, with few exceptions, accounts only too well for such an opinion. Properly conducted, however, the stage would prove a mighty factor in civilisation. Has not the three-volume novel, with its sentimental, sensational, or humorous story, made way for works of a higher stamp, in which social, political, nay even religious, subjects are treated! In like manner the stage has become more serious. But it takes a long time to eradicate old ideas, and the majority of statesmen cannot probably understand the importance of dramatic representations, and their usefulness in improving and refining the public. I speak only of a national opera-house, but, of course, a national theatre is equally necessary.

For the moment, however, such things are castles in the air. Let us, then, only consider present conditions. The season at Covent Garden almost brought to a close has made a feature, if not a very strong one, of classical opera. Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" and "Don Juan" have been performed with considerable success. But there are operas of Gluck, such as "Alceste," "Armide," not to mention "Orfeo," which might be profitably revived. And why should Beethoven's "Fidelio" be so neglected? And in addition to these masterpieces there is many an old opera which ought not to be consigned to oblivion.

The question of novelties is a difficult one. It is well that we should know what is being done in our day. The two novelties this season were interesting; and yet I cannot help thinking two others by foreigners, and of greater interest, could have been selected. Native art, too, might have been represented.

Chief place has been assigned to Wagner, and this is, of course, most natural. Apart from the power of his music-dramas to draw large audiences, they are of commanding interest. But owing to the shortness of the season there is no means of doing justice to other men and other schools. Wagner has not killed classical opera; for the present, however, the one has thrown the other into the shade. Place ought to be found for both.

MR. SCHULTZ-CURTIS takes time by the forelock. He announces three concerts at Queen's Hall in the autumn (November 9, 16, and December 7), and three in the spring of 1898 (April 26, May 17, and June 16). The conductors announced are: MM. Felix Mottl, Hermann Levi, Richard Strauss, and Felix Weingartner. The programmes will be announced in due course. M. Strauss will conduct some of his own compositions.

SCIENCE.

A BRIEF and unsatisfying note in Nature this week calls attention to an essay just published by E. Hahn, entitled "Baubo und Demeter, Versuch einer Theorie der Entstehung unseres Ackerbaus," which deals with the question of man's earliest efforts in agriculture and their relation to primitive religion. Having not yet received the pamphlet, I know nothing about the author's views on this last point beyond that he "is greatly impressed with the effect of religion on the progress of early culture"—not a very luminous observation—and that "he holds the waggon to have been originally employed for the transport of effigies of the goddess of fertility, probably the moon, and that later it became a secular vehicle."

THESES on the relation of religion to early field culture continue to multiply since Mannhardt first gave a decided impetus to the subject. I have recently come across two, which serve to illustrate the divergent nature of its treatment. One is by Prof. Karl Pearson, a noted folk-lorist, and is contained in the essay on "Woman as Witch," which begins the second volume of his recently published papers. The other is embodied in an "afterword" to Mr. Grant Allen's translation of the Attis, and represents some early reflections of that ingenious thinker matured by Mr. Frazer's Golden Bough. Prof. Pearson traces the beginnings of agriculture in that crepuscular epoch known as the "mother-age." According to him woman was responsible for it. The witch, or wise woman, first differentiated out for worship, survives in the word "hag," probably a relic of Hagen or Gehag, "a staked enclosure," and signifying the priestess or the goddess who presided over man's first protected community. Numberless ceremonies, from our own may-pole dances to the wilder orgies of the Kermesse and the Walpurgismacht, still typify the periodical honour paid to a female divinity who encouraged fertility, blessed crops, and whose worship was associated with the earliest of all inventions—the distaff, the broom, and the pitchfork.

"Since agriculture in its elements is essentially due to women, hunting and the chase characteristic of man," says Prof. Pearson, "the emblems of early agriculture would be closely associated with the primitive goddess. The smaller domestic animals—the goat, the boar, the goose, and the cock and hen—would be connected with her worship. The earth, as a symbol of fertility, would be brought into close relationship with the mother deity. She would be a goddess of agriculture and child-birth, of reproductivity in the soil, of fecundity in animals," and so on. Her shrine might be the hearth, or it might be the clearing in the forest. Often it survives as the hill-top, where originally would have stood the palisaded dwelling of a group, and where cultivation first appeared.

I HAVE said enough to indicate generally Prof. Pearson's line of argument, but in too limited a space to do full justice to the interest of his treatment or to the remarkable range of incident and survival by means of which he illustrates it. He evidently believes that while man was hunting woman was employed in developing the first implements and the earliest rudiments of field culture. The knowledge gained in this pursuit soon made her weatherwise, and thus she gained an ascendancy which culminated in "mother-right" or descent from the female side, one of the earliest stages of civilisation in most communities. Why man, with his hunting proclivities and constant open-air life, did not become even more weather-wise does not appear. Nor do I feel entirely convinced that the dawn of agriculture was as Prof. Pearson puts it. A more reasonable origin, it seems to me, is that propounded by Mr. Grant Allen, from whose excursus on the Attis I again extract the barest fragment.

THE first god, says Mr. Allen, was the ancestral ghost, whose assistance man invoked, whose resentment he appeased. The seat of the ghost would be the ancestral barrow, barrows being traced to the earliest of all known ages, the hunter period. Upon the barrow would be offered sacrifices of seeds and animals. Inside, at all events in certain ages, would be a hecatomb of slaughtered wives and animals. The mere fact of the tumulus being built of freshly turned earth would render it more fertile than the surrounding soil, and with the contributory causes just mentioned the barrow might be expected to show signs of fertility and cultivation sufficient to open the eyes of even primitive man to the advantages of digging, sowing, and suitable manure. Hence might have arisen the science of agriculture. Like Prof. Pearson, Mr. Grant Allen supports his hypothesis with a learned array of instances and survivals, not the least interesting of which is the habit which prevailed until recent times in Ireland of pouring new milk upon the "fairy knows," which from this kindly treatment stood out like emerald bosses. It is not the woman here, but the god represented by the ancestral ghost within the barrow, who would be credited with this power of fecundity. Out of this grew that vast network of myth and legend dealing with gods who died and came to life again, representing in their own acts the transformation of the seasons. This is another story altogether, and is narrated at length in that marvellous work The Golden Bough. I suppose we shall have a good deal of it also in Mr. Grant Allen's forthcoming book with the impossible name, The Evolution of God.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DISCOUNT ON BOOKS.

London: July 21.

I have read with interest your interviews on the Discount Question in the ACADEMY of July 17—the one pro and the one con. The gentleman interviewed in the latter alludes to the proposed reduction of the discount from 3d. to 2d. as an interference with "Free Trade," and I suppose it was inevitable that the fetish should be dragged in. Of all economists there is none so ignorant as your determined Free Trader, because, although he pins his faith to them, he knows not the first elements of Richard Cobden's doctrines. For his benefit, and once and for all to get rid of this ignorant misunderstanding of a great principle of trade, may I quote the following words of Cobden, delivered in London on February 8, 1884, in which he explained his theory of Free Trade?

"What is Free Trade? By Free Trade we mean the abolition of all protective duties. It is very possible that our children, or, at all events, their offspring, may be wise enough to dispense with Custom-house duties altogether. They may think it prudent and economical to raise their revenues by direct taxation, without circumventing their foreign trade. We do not propose to do that; but there are a class of men who have taken possession of the Custom-house, and have installed their clerks there, to collect revenue for their own particular benefit, and we intend to remove them out of the Custom-house."

The intended reduction of discount is as much an interference with Free Trade (i.e., "the abolition of all protective duties") as is a police order to prevent costers' carts from lingering too long in crowded thoroughfares, or organ-grinders from plying their trade to the annoyance of the neighbourhood. To saddle the discount movement with the stigma of prejudicing Free Trade is on the silly old principle of using a big word rather than a small one if you want to make your abuse irresistible. Irresponsible vagrants must learn that every community is governed by the most determined rules of self-preservation, and that the common weal is always of greater importance than any individual advantage.

COBDENITE.

"MR. W. H." AND THE "DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY."

London: July 16.

I cannot hope that the Editor of the ACADEMY would give me space to discuss in general either Mr. Lee's article or even the review in your issue of July 10. My observations must be confined to matters with respect to which I have perhaps some sort of claim to be regarded as a "specialist," as numerous communications in previous numbers of this journal may show. With your reviewer I entirely agree that the "love-story" embodied in the Sonnets, or at least its commencement, cannot be placed later than Shakespeare's thirty-fifth year. So, also, I agree in rejecting Mr. Lee's date for the completed Sonnets (1594). I am satisfied, too, that Willobie's Avia of that year has nothing whatever to do with these Poems.

If Mr. Lee now "makes short work of the view that Mr. W. H. was William Herbert," it is a remarkable fact that, when he wrote his article on that nobleman in the Dictionary, he said:

"Shakespeare's young friend was doubtless Pembroke himself, and 'the dark lady' in all probability was Pembroke's mistress, Mary Fitton. Nothing in the Sonnets directly contradicts the identification of W. H., their hero and 'onlie begetter,' with William Herbert, and many minute internal details confirm it (cf. T. Tyler, Shakespeare's Sonnets, 1890, passim, and especially pp. 44-73)."

The candid expression of a changed opinion would be, no doubt, entirely commendable if justified by the presentation of new and valid evidence. But Mr. Lee will, I am sure, pardon me if I say that I cannot find in his article the slightest trace of such evidence, while the "many minute internal details" which, in 1891, confirmed the identification of W. H. with William Herbert are now entirely disregarded. The facts with respect to the Passionate Pilgrim ("Two loves I have of comfort and despair," &c.) were as well known six years ago as they are now, and still admit the same explanation. Jaggard's publication was piratical. How he got hold of two of Shakespeare's Sonnets in MS. we cannot tell. He seems, not unnaturally perhaps, to have been anxious to print new poems; and it is not unlikely that he gave Shakespeare's two Sonnets the first place as being the newest things he had to present. He was indebted to Barnfield's Poems in Divers Humors, of 1598, and to Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost of the same year. There is no evidence that the two Sonnets were written before this date; and, as is well attested, poems in MS. were freely copied, and so passed from hand to hand. According to Mr. Lee, the allusion cannot be to the intrigue between Herbert and Mary Fitton, as this occurred late in 1600—a date for which he gives no evidence whatever, and which is obviously contradicted by the fact that the child whose paternity was imputed to Herbert was born before March 25 following.

One of the most remarkable facts in connexion with the chronology of the Sonnets is, that 1598 having been previously fixed on as the date of Sonnets i.-xvii., with their exhortation to marriage, the late Rev. W. A. Harrison was able to point to correspondence at the Record Office, dated 1597 (not 1598, as stated by Mr. Lee), with regard to a proposed marriage of Herbert with Bridget, granddaughter of the great Lord Burleigh. The proposal was resultless. Probably Herbert backed out of the affair.

As to the improbability that Thorpe would have "dubbed the influential Earl of Pembroke 'Mr. W. H.,'" I have had occasion previously to show (ACADEMY, June 14, 1890, p. 408) that Thorpe's dedications to Pembroke are such as to allow little weight to attach to any incongruities which they may contain. Besides, it should be always recollected that the contention is, that the designation "Mr. W. H." was adopted (quite possibly at Shakespeare's suggestion) as furnishing at least some slight disguise. If Southampton was the person with whom the Sonnets are mainly concerned, the dedication presents difficulties which can scarcely be regarded as other than insuperable. But it has been justly said that the Southampton theory is dead; and I am pretty firmly persuaded that neither Mr. Lee nor even Mr. Gollancz (in his very attractive "Temple" edition of the Sonnets) will be able to effect a resuscitation. Mr. Gollancz says: "At the present moment the star of William Herbert is in the ascendant," and I should say that, unless arguments are forthcoming a good deal more cogent than those which have just been adduced, there is no probability of a speedy declension.

THOMAS TYLER.

"BILLY AND HANS."

12, Campden-hill-gardens: July 16.

The suggestion contained in your most kind notice of my Billy and Hans—that it could be circulated free of charge by the R.S.P.C.A.—is a form of praise which I cordially appreciate. But I have no other book or other means which I could devote to the "Violet Home," a young institution destined, I hope, to do a peculiar service, social as well as curative, if it can be made to prosper, and in which I take an intense interest. And the reception of the history as it appeared in the Century made me hope that no one who loves animals would begrudge for a charitable work the shilling Billy and Hans costs. If the R.S.P.C.A. had, before separate publication, expressed the desire to have it I should not have hesitated to give it; but, if you will permit me the observation, it is hardly a book to appeal to the classes that need to have it thrown into their hands. It was intended especially to appeal to the owners of the great estates on which, I am persuaded, more through the ignorance and killing propensities of the keepers than the indifference of the proprietors, the squirrels are shot and trapped as vermin. I have for their benefit tried to combat the belief that they do the harm asserted to forest plantations, and to excite a sympathy which would protect them completely in the great parks. But I do not see how the masses can persecute the squirrels if the park owners do their duty. Except in such a case as the, I hope, unique instance of the Richmond Park authorities, who had the squirrels shot to prevent the ragamuffins from hunting them, instead of arresting the hunters, it is hardly in the power of the masses to worry the poor little creatures, and it is always in the power of the land owners to prevent their doing so.

I have, it is perhaps needless to say, published the book at my own expense, and for a charity, for I could not possibly turn my pets to any pecuniary profit, and I only desire that it may carry its lessons widely; but I have not the means to give it a wide gratuitous circulation. I have already offered an edition to a reading union at the cost of production; and if it should later be found that a gratuitous distribution in a cheaper form by the R.S.P.C.A. should promise to extend its sphere of influence for good, I will consider it favourably.

W. J. STILLMAN.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Mr. Morley's
"Machiavelli."
(Macmillan.)

"If we are not moved or impressed," writes the Saturday Review, "it is not because the author is too stately or too rigid; it is because he appears to be so much bored with his own lucubrations that he can scarcely finish the hour. This is the Nemesis of Mr. Morley's long unfaithfulness to the profession which Nature intended him to adorn. . . . We know not for whom this Romanes address was composed. If for the undergraduates and the ladies, it presupposes too large acquaintance with facts; if for scholars, the timidity of its judgments and the uncertainty of its direction will have caused, surely, not a little polite bewilderment. . . . There is not a single sentence, not an adjective . . . which makes the figure of Machiavelli live before us. . . . It was hardly worth while for Mr. Morley to take the trouble to go to Oxford to tell us in this roundabout way and in this patchwork style that he disapproves of the Government, and that he has lost the habit of literary composition." The Spectator is of opinion that in his "brilliant lecture" Mr. Morley "unconsciously exaggerates Machiavelli's mental force. . . . He seems to us essentially a man with but limited insight into the true nature of mankind, and therefore into the springs of enduring power. . . . Machiavelli's Prince, when all is said, is nothing but a supremely shifty man; and we feel unable to recognise in the creation of a supremely shifty man a grand intellectual feat." "The important fact about Mr. Morley's treatment of history and literature," writes the Chronicle, "is that he always seeks out the permanent and human fact, and presents it to us in language of a lofty seriousness, and not seldom in luminous phrases which his own favourite Burke might not have disdained to call his own. Such a piece of work is this monograph on Machiavelli, which, not content with a mere critical exposition of the problems of Italian politics in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, pierces down into the very moral core of the doctrine for ever associated with the name of Machiavelli."

Mrs. Oliphant's
"The Ways of Life."
(Smith, Elder.)

Of this last work of Mrs. Oliphant's diligent pen the Chronicle writes: "It has the poignancy, the pathos, of something like a sad personal confidence. . . . It has the importance of an utterance by a distinguished and sensitive artist, of great experience, upon a problem . . . that concerns all artists." But Mrs. Oliphant is entreated not to confuse her own case with that of her hero, the artist who has lost his vogue, for her work possesses "the principle of vitality—the authenticity which is the very first and most essential element of the principle of vitality in art. . . . So long as any one may care to read of what has been fairest and sweetest in English life during our half century Mrs. Oliphant will be read with pleasure and admiration and gratitude." "Was it," the Speaker wonders,

"some vague foreboding of approaching death that steeped the novelist's pen in such pathetic tenderness of sympathy as this book discloses? For Mrs. Oliphant's ever-present sense of the irony of life and the pathos of human endeavour seems here intensified into a very passion of pity, and her two stories . . . are almost painful in their truthfulness." "With consummate skill," writes the Spectator, "with the tenderest and most delicate sympathy, Mrs. Oliphant has brought home to her readers the tragedy of the brain-worker who, . . . once he loses his power or popularity, is condemned to the intolerable anguish of a living death. . . . As a work of art we can praise the story [of Mr. Sandford] without reserve. But no journalist can read it without being chilled to the heart by the situation it depicts."

"The Plattner Story," &c. By H. G. Wells.
(Methuen.)

THE Spectator finds it "impossible not to feel a certain complacency when one contemplates the achievements of our short-story writers; . . . and of all the workers in this field none strikes a more individual or resonant note than Mr. H. G. Wells. In his audacious and imaginative insight into the romantic possibilities underlying the discoveries or the suggestions of modern science he stands unrivalled. The circumstantial quality of his narrative often reminds one of Swift"; the story of the flying-machine recalls "the best work of Poe in its accent of sincerity, and surpasses it in felicity and sobriety of style." The Standard laments that culture and observation are taking the place of imagination in literature: "Mr. Wells has been in danger of yielding to one of these baneful influences, but in his new volume he . . . has wholly recovered himself. . . . His style is clear, firm, and direct, though occasionally he lets his grip of language carry him away." "The versatility of his mind in all directions is truly astonishing," writes the Telegraph, "but his power evidently lies mainly in the description of things weird and terrible." But "no small part of Mr. Wells's power lies in the vagueness of his descriptions. He knows exactly how much to leave unsaid; for though he sets out with an appearance of much minute and scientific accuracy, we soon find that, after all, we are not really being let into the secret." So also the Chronicle says: "He tells us just so much as enables us to persuade ourselves that we know all about it, and when once he has got us into that comfortable frame of mind we are prepared to believe anything. . . . Perhaps the most absolutely convincing piece of work in the volume is 'The Sea Raiders.'"

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the

BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL, CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1317.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 51 SEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1449 lots.)
.. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (762, 782 lots.)
.. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (540 lots.)

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General
Literature (No. 116, for AUGUST), at reduced prices, post free.
Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street
East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
33, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
1, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK & Co.
MSS. considered for Publication. (Established 1819.)

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 34, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated and other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 36-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager

LAST WEEK.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS in WATER-
COLOURS, 54, Pall Mall East, S.W.
126th EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. Admission, 1s. 10 to 6.
SIGFRIED H. HERKOMER, JUN., Secretary (pro tem.).

MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

I.—PROFESSORSHIP OF MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY,
AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.

II.—PROFESSORSHIP OF METALLURGY.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above PROFESSOR-
SHIPS.
Applications, accompanied by thirty-five copies of Testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 15th of September.

The Candidates elected will be required to enter upon their duties as soon after the 1st of October 1897, as possible.

Further particulars may be obtained from
Geo. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SHEFFIELD.

LECTURER IN PHILOSOPHY AND ECONOMICS.

The Council will proceed to the ELECTION of a LECTURER in PHILOSOPHY and ECONOMICS in September. Duties to commence in October next. Salary £300 at least, together with half the fees of the Lecturer's Classes.—For particulars apply to the Registrar.

BRITISH INSTITUTION SCHOLARSHIP
FUND.—At a Meeting of the Trustees held on July 28, SCHOLARSHIPS of £50 a year, tenable for two years, were AWARDED:

In PAINTING.
Fred Appleyard, Royal College of Art.
Maurice Bernardin, Royal Academy Schools.
Sydney Carter, Royal College of Art.
Philip Connard, Royal College of Art.

In SCULPTURE.
Stanley Nicholson Babb, Royal College of Art.
Alfred Turner, Royal Academy Schools.

In ENGRAVING.
Gertrude Ellen Hayes, Royal College of Art.
The competition works can be seen in the main building of the Imperial Institute, Imperial Institute Road, South Kensington, on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, July 31 and August 2, 3, from ten a.m. to six p.m.
By order of the Trustees.

TO THE WEALTHY PATRONS OF ART AND BELLES
LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT
WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout
the civilised world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent.
The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition—
Apply by letter (Principal or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs
Steadman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 28, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.
(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

BOOKS FOR SALE.
(Advertisements are inserted under this heading at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

H. PAGE, 33, High Street, Broadstairs.—
Nansen's "Farthest North." 2 vols. As new. Offers.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSS., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating,
Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses
E. & J. PUTZ, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO.,
ART REPRODUCERS.
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.,
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich.

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.
Offices: 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, LONDON.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF
FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

The Company offer their services for the Reproduction by their Permanent Processes of Works of Art, for the Collector's Portfolio, Book Illustrations of the highest class, Wall Decoration, &c. Examples of Work and Estimates submitted on application.

CATALOGUE AND LISTS FREE.
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
FINE ART GALLERY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST
ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum. LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the house of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.	COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum. N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.
---	---

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.
Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT
Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.
The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)
Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

MODERN MYTHOLOGY: a Reply to Professor Max Müller. By ANDREW LANG, M.A., LL.D., St. Andrews, Hon. Fellow of Merton College, sometime Gifford Lecturer in the University of St. Andrews. 8vo, 9s.

SECOND EDITION.

THE THEORY of CREDIT. By HENRY DUNNING MACLEOD, M.A., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law, selected by the Royal Commissioners for the Digest of the Law to prepare the Digest of the Law of Bills of Exchange, Bank Notes, &c. Vol. I., 8vo, 10s. net. Vol. II., Part I., 10s. net. Vol. II., Part II., 10s. net.

* An Index has been added to this Edition.

Lord HATFIELD.—"Mr. H. D. Macleod was selected by the Commissioners for the Digest of the Law to prepare a Digest of the Law in relation to Bills of Exchange. He performed his task in a manner which showed that he had an extensive and very intelligent knowledge of the Law."

WHAT GUNPOWDER PLOT WAS: a Reply to Father Gerard. By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, D.C.L. With 8 Illustrations and Plans. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Father Gerard's theory of the Gunpowder Plot, as set forth in his recently published book, is demolished once and for all by Dr. Gardiner. Never has the story of that famous plot been so thoroughly examined in the light of historical evidence as in this new work."—Daily News.

CHILDREN'S WAYS: being Selections from the Author's "Studies of Childhood," with some Additional Matter. By JAMES SULLY, M.A., LL.D., Grote Professor of Philosophy of Mind and Logic, University College, London. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

NEW NOVELS AND STORIES.

THE CHEVALIER D'AURIAO: a Historical Romance. By S. LEVETT-YEATS, Author of "The Honour of Savelli," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE PROFESSOR'S CHILDREN: a Story of Child Life. By EDITH H. FOWLER, Author of "The Young Pretender." With 24 Illustrations by Ethel Kate Burgess. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A delightful children's story. The author seems to have caught the daring incoherence and persistency in hammering out an idea which characterise untrammelled conversation in the nursery very cleverly. For its dialogue alone the amusing little book is better reading than a good many more pretentious works of fiction."—Pall Mall Gazette.

KALLISTRATUS: an Autobiography. A Story of Hannibal and the Second Punic War. By A. H. GILKES, M.A., Master of Dulwich College. With 3 Illustrations by Maurice Greiffenhagen. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SILVER LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE MEMOIRS of BARON DE MARBOT. Translated from the French by ARTHUR JOHN BUTLER. With Portrait. New Edition. 2 vols., crown 8vo, 7s.

JOAN HASTE. By H. Rider Haggard. With 20 Illustrations by F. S. Wilson. New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

HISTORY of the INDIAN MUTINY, 1857-1858. By Sir JOHN W. KAYE, and Colonel J. B. MALLESON. With Analytical Index and Maps and Plans. New Edition. 6 vols., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each. (Vols. I.-III., ready. Vols. IV.-VI., in the autumn.)

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

AUGUST, 1897. Price 6d

THE CHEVALIER D'AURIAO. By S. LEVETT-YEATS, Author of "The Honour of Savelli." Chaps. 19-20. (Concluded.)

GEORGE MASON. By Mrs. HARRY COGNILL.

IN AUGUST. By DUNCAN J. ROBERTSON.

THE CLOUD that PASSED. By AMELIA HUTCHINSON STIELING.

A RETROSPECT and a FORECAST. By Miss BEALE.

TWO SOLDIERS. By MAY KENDALL.

WOLMER FOREST. By W. H. HUDSON.

A SMOKING CONCERT. By Mrs. MURRAY HICKSON.

AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

Notice.—The First Edition
of OUIDA'S New Novel, AN ALTRUIST,
having been exhausted
before publication, a
SECOND EDITION
is being prepared, and
will shortly be ready.
In cloth binding, price
2s. 6d. At all Book- sellers' and Libraries.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

SECOND EDITION.

TWELVE BAD WOMEN. Edited by ARTHUR VINCENT. Illustrated. Cloth, 18s.

Graphic.—"This always interesting, and sometimes even fascinating, book."

LOUIS BECKE'S NEW VOLUME.

PACIFIC TALES. By Louis Becke, Author of "His Native Wife," "By Reef and Palm," &c. With Portrait of the Author. Cloth, gilt top, 6s.

Colonies and India.—"Most entertaining stories; vividly written, and full of humour and pathos."

FROM the FOUR WINDS. By John SINJOHN. Cloth, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"Stories each one of which is a masterpiece of pathetic or humorous narrative.....These admirable tales."

NEW EDITION.

MRS. KEITH'S CRIME. By Mrs W. K. CLIFFORD. With Frontispiece by the Hon. John Collier. Cloth, 6s.

World.—"Is certainly the strongest book that Mrs. W. K. Clifford has given to the public. It is probably, too, the most popular."

THE PARLIAMENT of GLADSTONE and DISRAELI.
THE INNER LIFE of the HOUSE of COMMONS. From the Writings of WILLIAM WHITE. Introduction by JUSTIN MCCARTHY, M.P. 2 vols., cloth, 18s.

H. W. Lucy in the Daily News.—"We have here preserved precious photographs of historic scenes and memorable persons. Having spent his days and nights with Addison and other classics in the old bookshop, the Doorkeeper brought to his new task an excellent literary style, with a pleasant dash of the old fashion.....His records have the inestimable advantage of being edited by Mr. Justin McCarthy, who, with long experience and close sympathy with the House of Commons and its history, was the very man for the task of dealing with a mass of memoranda extending over ten years. I do not know what he may have left out; he has certainly known what to preserve."

Mr. T. FISHER UNWIN'S ILLUSTRATED SPRING LIST will be sent post free to any address on application.

LONDON:

T. FISHER UNWIN PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

Vol. III. and Part XI. now ready for delivery to Subscribers.

LIFE of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE By Professor WILLIAM MILLIGAN SLOANE, Ph.D., LL.D. Illustrated.

In 20 Parts at 4s. net each, or in 4 vols. at 24s. net each. Supplied only in Sets. Also ready, Vols. I. and II., and Parts 1-10.

Subscriptions (sent through a Bookseller) will be received at any time, and the Volumes or Parts delivered at such intervals as may be convenient to the subscriber.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.—New Vol. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back, and edges, 5s.

THE PIRATE and the THREE CUTTERS. By Captain MARRYAT. With Illustrations by Edmund J. Sullivan, and an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

FOUR NOVELS WORTH READING.

Price 6s. each.

By the AUTHOR of "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS." Seventh Thousand.

MY RUN HOME. By Rolf Boldrewood.

ATHENÆUM.—"Rolf Boldrewood's last story is a racy volume. It has many of the best qualities of Whyte Melville, the breezy freshness and vigour of Frank Smedley, with the dash and something of the abandon of Lever..... His last volume is one of his best."

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.
Sixth Thousand.

A ROSE of YESTERDAY.

DAILY NEWS.—"Whether we agree or disagree with Mr. Crawford's thesis, we cannot but admire this poignant and beautiful story."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

TAQUISARA. By F. Marion Crawford.

SPECTATOR.—"Another of his brilliant and entrancing studies of modern Italian manners."

BY THE AUTHOR of "MORRICE BUCKLER."
Fourth Thousand.

THE PHILANDERERS. By A. E. W. MASON.

WORLD.—"One of the most interesting novels we have met for a long time."

EVERESLEY SERIES.—New Vols.

Globe 8vo, 5s. each.

THE POETICAL WORKS of WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. Edited by WILLIAM KNIGHT. Vol. VIII.

THE MAKING of ENGLAND. By JOHN RICHARD GREEN, M.A., LL.D., Honorary Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. In 2 vols., with Maps.

Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THEORY of ELECTRICITY and MAGNETISM. By CHARLES EMERSON CURRY, Ph.D., with a Preface by LUDWIG BOLTZMANN, Ph.D., D.C.L. (Oxon.), Professor of Theoretical Physics in the University at Vienna.

AUGUST NUMBER. Price 1s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

1. IN MEMORIAM: MARGARET OLIPHANT. By the Rev. J. H. SEARLE.
2. ON a FAMINE-CAMP in BURMAH. By H. FIELDING.
3. THE GUARDS under QUEEN ANNE. By the Honble. J. W. FORTESCUE.
4. A VILLAGE SOVEREIGN.
5. THE PATRIOTIC HISTORIANS of SCOTLAND. By V. V. BEANFORD.
6. A NINE DAYS' KING.
7. AS OTHERS SEE US.
8. THE SENTIMENT of CHIVALRY: BURKE and SCOTT. By T. E. K. REEL.
9. A CHAPTER of ACCIDENTS. By Mrs. FRASER. Chaps. 12-14.

AUGUST NUMBER NOW READY.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d.

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—
LONDON at "PLAY"—ON MARGARET SANDS. By ELIZABETH ROBIN FENNEL. With Pictures by Joseph Fennell.
A JOURNEY in THESSALY. By T. D. GOODALL.
THE ARGONAUTS. By W. P. FORSTER.

AUGUST NUMBER NOW READY.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s.

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—
"PETER SPOTS," FIREMAN. By C. T. HILL.
MY MUSICAL MOUSE. By B. PAINE.
SOME COMMON BEES and HOW they LIVE. By A. H. VERR.

MACMILLAN & CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Extra-Canonical Scriptures ... ..	83
Scientific Immortality ... ..	84
Gunpowder Plot Again ... ..	84
Oxford and its Colleges ... ..	85
A Book about Birds ... ..	86
Italian Architecture ... ..	87
A National Transformation ... ..	88
A Question of Style ... ..	88
English Song ... ..	88
Some Educational Books ... ..	89
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	89
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	91
New Books Received ... ..	91
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	92
AUTHORS AND A PUBLISHER ... ..	94
A PORT OF THE NARROW SEAS ... ..	94
PARIS LETTER ... ..	95
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	96
DRAMA ... ..	96
SCIENCE ... ..	97
CORRESPONDENCE ... ..	98
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..	98
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	41-44

REVIEWS.

EXTRA-CANONICAL SCRIPTURES.

Sayings of Our Lord. Discovered and Edited by B. P. Grenfell, M.A., and A. S. Hunt, M.A. (Henry Frowde.)

THE systematic exploration of Egypt in search of Greek MSS. has led to one more find, highly interesting, but of tantalising brevity and incompleteness. In the course of last winter's excavations Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt turned up among the rubbish-heaps of Oxyrhynchus, on the edge of the Libyan Desert, large quantities of papyri, among which was a single leaf apparently detached from "a book containing a collection of Logia, or Sayings of our Lord." They have hastened to publish the precious fragment, and it now lies before us in an excellent and convenient edition, containing a facsimile of the original document, a reprint of the Greek text in uncial characters, a second reprint in ordinary Greek type accompanied by a translation and a most useful commentary, and followed by a few pages of general remarks. We may trust German scholarship to restore it before long to the condition in which it was discovered at Oxyrhynchus.

The papyrus leaf originally contained eight sayings attributed to Jesus Christ, but of these two are defaced beyond hope of recovery. One agrees verbatim with Luke vi. 42; another agrees partially with Luke iv. 24; and a third recalls Matt. v. 14 and vii. 24, 25, but cannot, according to the editors, be a "mere conflation of the two passages" referred to. The three remaining Logia are entirely new, not being traceable to our canonical Gospels nor to any other extant source; and certain fragmentary indications seem to show that the two indecipherable sayings are also new. The sense of those which can be read is rather obscure, a fact that may possibly account for their exclusion from the canonical Gospels. The editors do not discuss the question of their authenticity, but attribute to them in their present form a date not later than the end of the first century. One embodies a warning which seems, if taken literally, to contravene the whole spirit of evangelical teaching, although no canonical saying of Jesus has ever been so faithfully observed by the self-styled evangelical party. According to the papyrus He declares that "except ye keep the Sabbath ye shall not see the Father." But it is possible that to keep the Sabbath may here mean to renounce the world.

Another saying, equally enigmatical, declares that Jesus will be found by lifting the stone or cleaving the wood. Even the Fourth Gospel contains no utterance so mystical as this. The editors suggest that the presence of Christ in all things may be implied; or, much less probably, that the words are "intended to teach the effort required in order to find Christ" (p. 14). One thinks of the proverbial references to "oak and rock" among the Greeks as sources of things that come up unexpectedly, unaccountably, nobody can tell whence. Another parallel is supplied by the theophany of the burning bush and by the water that gushed from the rock in the desert, which has been also interpreted as a manifestation of Christ. Were the saying canonical it would doubtless be adduced by those who identify Christ with the Word by whom all things were made as an irrefragable argument for their theology. All will agree that trees, rocks, and other equally material objects were employed in a very human way by Jesus to illustrate the coming kingdom of heaven; and from the kingdom to the King is no very difficult transition.

Our papyrus repeats the saying about the prophet who is not received in his own country, and adds to it another which is quite new, that a physician cannot cure those who know him. Whether genuine or not these last words evidently refer to the rejection of the Gospel by the Jews, and therefore add nothing to the old points of view. It would be interesting to know whether the Palestinian practitioners were really only successful in dealing with strangers. If so, their experience differed widely from that of the modern faculty, among whom a close acquaintance with the constitution and habits of the patient derived from long personal intimacy counts for much in making the diagnosis and in prescribing the remedy.

Finally, we may mention a saying which, although not placed last in this little collection, stands at the furthest remove from the tone of the Synoptic Gospels, and for bitterness of disappointment exceeds any utterance of the Johannine Jesus. The Redeemer says, or is made to say, that He stood in the midst of the world, and to His soul's distress met with no recognition from the sons of men. Clearly our fragmentist (or the source which he copies) represents no particular sect or doctrinal tendency. His interest, apparently, was to collect sayings of Jesus from every quarter, and to transcribe them for the edification of believers.

After all, the real value of these Logia will probably be found to be not so much in their more or less doubtful, more or less enigmatic additions to the recorded words of Christ, as in the light which they may be expected to throw on certain vexed questions of New Testament criticism. For example, it is a moot point whether the original Matthew wrote our First Gospel, or, indeed, whether he wrote what we should call a gospel at all. Papias, our earliest authority on the subject, speaks of Matthew as having made a collection of Logia or discourses of the Lord, not as having written a narrative of his life. Now, as the editors justly observe, we have got in this papyrus

"for the first time a concrete example of what was meant by the Logia which Papias tells us were compiled by St. Matthew and the ἀδελφοὶ κυρίου upon which Papias himself wrote a commentary. . . . It is not, of course, at all likely that our fragment has any actual connexion either with the Hebrew Logia of St. Matthew or the ἀδελφοὶ κυρίου of Papias . . . [but] the discovery strongly supports the view that in speaking of ἀδελφοὶ Papias and Eusebius intended some similar collection" (p. 18).

But this is not all. Modern criticism has shown strong reasons for doubting that the rich collection of discourses contained in our "Matthew" faithfully reproduce the contents of the precious document ascribed by Papias to the Apostle himself. For a comparison with the text of our third Evangelist—Luke or another—shows serious discrepancies in their respective reports of what was evidently the same discourse, especially in the case of the Sermon on the Mount; and the much less artificial arrangement adopted by "Luke" suggests that his is the more faithful transcript from the original source—probably the Logia of the true Matthew. It becomes, therefore, a matter of importance to note with which Evangelist our papyrus exhibits the more marked agreement. There is no doubt about it. The editors point out that in the saying about the unhonoured prophet the word δεκτός (acceptable) which is employed by the papyrus is also that used by Luke, whereas Matthew has a quite different phrase. It also seems quite clear that the new source is not copied from Luke. Thus each receives an independent support from the other as regards antiquity and nearness to the primordial source. It may be said that this is building too much on one word. But in the absence of more copious evidence we cannot afford to neglect any, even the slightest, indication. The judicious use of such trifling hints constitutes the method of Zadig, which, as Huxley as shown, is the method of science.

With regard to the Johannine problem, the new fragment unfortunately has nothing to help us. It contains, indeed, a couple of Johannine phrases, but these are evidently not quotations; and those who impugn the apostolic origin of the Fourth Gospel would not now deny that it represents a line of thought extending back to the first century.

But we must not trespass any further on the privilege which the editors of this most interesting pamphlet may justly claim of telling their own story in their own way, especially as a cheap edition of the Logia has been issued at a price which leaves those interested in the subject—that is, all who care about religion—without an excuse for not procuring themselves a copy.

SCIENTIFIC IMMORTALITY.

The Place of Death in Evolution. By Newman Smyth. (Fisher Unwin.)

THIS is the latest attempt to bridge over the gap that still yawns between the conclusions of science and the aspirations of religious faith. Mr. Newman Smyth thinks that the time has come for a vital reconstruction of Christian theology, as the result of "a deeper knowledge and a truer interpretation of the Sacred Scripture of Life which the hand of God has written in nature. The coming theologian, therefore," our author opines—"the next successful defender of the faith once given to the saints—will be a trained and accomplished biologist." Mr. Newman Smyth is not himself a trained and accomplished biologist, but, as a diligent student of the German school of biologists, he has some thought of undertaking the task to which he refers. What is needed, in his opinion, is

"a thorough and comprehensive demonstration of the fact, which the disciple of old perceived, that the life was manifested in the Christ, and that His essential words meet and match the great principles of life which have been hidden in nature's heart from the beginning."

The present volume is a first step towards the realisation of the author's dream. Difficulties, of course, there are in the way.

"The science of biology itself has been far too crude, and its theories are still too tentative, and even conflicting at many points, to warrant us as yet in building upon them, over-confidently, the higher conclusions of the Christian reason. Nevertheless, within the past thirty years, and since Darwin, some sure ground has been gained by evolutionary science, and biology in particular is opening fields of knowledge which invite fresh inquiry on the part of thoughtful believers."

Mr. Newman Smyth is careful in all cases to write "nature" with a small "n," which at once differentiates him from the merely scientific investigator; his capitals are reserved for theological names and abstractions. This will inspire confidence in a class of reader who is not greatly interested in the labours of Weismann, Bütschli, Maupas, Nussbaum, and other investigators of the germ-cell; but Mr. Newman Smyth must be credited with more than a smattering of his subject on its scientific side. In an appendix to the volume he gives an excellent summary of the present state of our knowledge with regard to unicellular and other primitive organisms, among which the problem of life and death is first presented. It is to be feared that his theology is not quite so comprehensive or satisfactory as his biology, since he ignores completely the questions of sin and salvation, which are surely the fundamentals of Christianity. Perhaps these are the doctrines that are destined to go by the board when the next "vital reconstruction" of Christian theology is effected; but if so, one may be pardoned for inquiring how much of the existing edifice of Christianity will then remain, and whether it is worth while, in Mr. Newman Smyth's system, to keep up the familiar series of sacred names and symbols with capitals. If capitals mean anything to the unbending utilitarians, why not god and Germ-plasm? Or genesis and Geology?

The basis of Mr. Newman Smyth's speculations as to the future of humanity is Prof. Weismann's fascinating contention that the unicellular organisms multiplying themselves by fission are immortal, no such thing as death occurring among them, and that death is a secondary development in the scale of life, the concomitant of sexuality, and useful as the cause of variation. "Death," says Weismann, "and the longer or shorter duration of life, both depend entirely on adaptation. It is not an essential attribute of living matter, it is neither necessarily associated with reproduction nor a necessary consequence of it." Using this statement as a sort of spring-board, Mr. Newman Smyth takes a bold leap into space:

"Death has a selective and adaptive function to fulfil so long as sex continues to reproduce, to elevate, to enhance, and beautify life. But shall there come a time," he inquires, "is there a pitch and perfection of spiritual organisation to be reached, when neither of these first friends and helpmeets of life shall be longer needed? Shall life at last attain a freedom and perfection where the constant attendance of these two servants, sex and death, shall be no longer useful, and may, therefore, be dispensed with?"

Gathering courage as he proceeds with a series of interrogations in this strain, the author finally asks whether the climax indicated in our development is not already reached:

"Has not the evolution of life, through sex and death among other means, reached in our spiritual being and possibility, that point of perfection intended from the beginning in which it has become capable of surviving a body no longer fitted to its use, and of persisting afterwards in some other form and relationship in which it shall no longer need death or regeneration to help it further on. . . . Death as the means of disentangling this body in which the old order ends, from the spiritual in which the new order begins, remains a mortal necessity for us all, but after the dissolution of this mortality it will have no more dominion over us. There shall be for the perfected life of spirits no need of an endless series of births and re-births. . . . The connexion throughout nature between death and sex is so intimate, so constant, so mutually serviceable that it is not going too far to say that the one probably could not have existed without the other. As nature announces the entrance of both at the same time into the world, so the gospel of the resurrection announces the departure of both together from the heavenly life: 'For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as angels in heaven.'"

This is the highest point to which the author in his speculation soars. He does not long maintain this strength of pinion. Apparently he is haunted by the idea that he has been assuming a little too much; for almost immediately he descends from his higher flight to inquire whether the expulsion of death from the limits of human experience may not, after all, be "a process requiring a whole world-age for its completion, as nature always takes time to render any organ functionless and rudimentary." We certainly think that nature (albeit she may be put off with a small "n") is entitled to some consideration in this matter.

In fact, the author's admission that the sublimation of human nature for which he contends may not even yet be begun, suggests a fatal line of criticism with regard to this too ingenious work. If the process of sublimation is not yet begun what reason have we for assuming that it ever will be? At what point in our development does death become superfluous? Is the life of Europe better fitted for an apotheosis than that of Central Africa? Upon these vital questions Mr. Newman Smyth throws no light. He appeals to the scientific method of investigation respecting a question which lies wholly outside the sphere of evidence. The biologists deal with such evidence as comes within the range of their microscopes. But the moment the author of this book leaves the solid ground of microscopic investigation (which does not in the slightest degree affect human destinies) he works in vacuo. Belief or hope is one thing; evidence is another. All religions require the exercise of faith, and their domain begins where evidence in the scientific sense ends. Christianity offers no evidence in support of the existence of the soul; nor is it called upon to do so. The question of the soul, and of all that may befall it, is one of faith alone.

All that Mr. Newman Smyth deduces from the simple and compound cell with regard to human destinies is the emptiest hypothesis, and the more devout the Christian reader of this book, the more decisively he will reject the author's abstract reasoning, which is calculated to land him in the purest theism. If death is merely useful as a factor in evolution, enabling the human race to rise on stepping-stones of their dead selves to higher things; and if by dint of evolution the soul becomes finally detached from the body, to lead an independent existence here or in outer space, the question naturally arises: Where does Christianity come in? Perhaps if Mr. Newman Smyth were a more consistent biologist he would be a better theologian. The precise method of his elevation of humanity from the corporeal to the spiritual condition it is difficult to grasp. Sometimes it is represented as the ultimate end of evolution not yet reached, sometimes as a process actually going on, with the earth as a sort of forcing-house for souls which are turned out in successive batches on the most expeditious and economical principles. This book is altogether a strange product of a scientific age. Both biology and theology, perhaps, will be sorry to learn that the author contemplates publishing a bigger work on the same theme.

GUNPOWDER PLOT AGAIN.

What Gunpowder Plot Was. By Samuel Rawson Gardiner, D.C.L., LL.D. (Longmans.)

IN a volume published last autumn, and entitled What Was Gunpowder Plot? Father Gerard, a well-known member of the Society of Jesus, made a vigorous and, as it seemed to many critics, a successful effort to overturn the traditional account of the drama upon which is based the national feast of November 5. His principal conclusion was that the traditional account was certainly unworthy of credence; he claimed also to have established probable grounds for the opinion that the Minister of the day, Cecil, nursed the plot for purposes of his own. Dr. Gardiner, who acknowledges cordially the ability with which the case against the Minister is developed, and the serious nature of some of the difficulties involved in the traditional tale, now comes forward to maintain its substantial accuracy.

By way of preamble, he rules out of court the whole of Father Gerard's third chapter, on "The Opinions of Contemporaries and Historians," as being of such a hearsay, vague, and unauthentic character as, according to the canons of modern historical criticism, it is safer totally to disregard. "To ask," he writes, "Mr. Spedding's question, 'What means had they of knowing?' is quite sufficient to condemn the so-called evidence." We may accept this dictum; it is applicable to much of the gossip which, in the adroit hands of the learned Jesuit, if not sufficient absolutely to build up a presumption of duplicity against the minister Cecil, served at least to envelop him in a sinister atmosphere of suspicion; but in his objection to the "purely negative character" of Father Gerard's criticism we do not perfectly follow Dr. Gardiner. By means of a metaphor that seems rather to have cumbered him, he thus explains the nature of the defect:

"When a door-key is missing the householder does not lose time in deploring the intricacy of the lock; he tries every key at his disposal to see if it will fit the wards, and only sends for the locksmith when he finds that his own keys are useless. So it is with historical inquiry. . . . Try, if need be, one hypothesis after another—Salisbury's guilt, his connivance, his innocence, or what you please. Apply them to the evidence, and when one fails to unlock the secret, try another."

But such a testing of one hypothesis at least forms an essential part of Father Gerard's work, not less than of Dr. Gardiner's, to wit, of the traditional story. Only the results are different: Father Gerard, after testing this key, dropped it back into the basket as serviceless; Dr. Gardiner, having twisted it for a while delicately this way and that among the wards, cries out that, allowing for an insignificant occasional roughness ("of course, there must be some ragged ends of the story"), it is a beautiful fit. Father Gerard's examination was not exhaustive, but, so far as he went, his method is not easily to be distinguished from that of his critic.

Father Gerard's verdict against the current version of the story is based upon evidence which, if we omit the items comprised in his third chapter mentioned above, is mainly threefold. First, he examines the authentic documents relating to the matter, throwing a strong light upon their discrepancies and inconsistencies; he endeavours, in the second place, by plans and pictures to demonstrate topographically that the conditions of space and locality admit no such incidents as those included in the official narratives; thirdly, he would convince us that Cecil was in a tight place, and that the discovery of Powder Treason, under such circumstances as in fact did wait upon its discovery, was excellently adapted to secure his position. Dr. Gardiner has considered these points with careful pains, and answers them courteously, concisely, lucidly, and, we cannot but think, finally.

The Catholic writer has made much of the discrepancies, for instance, between the five or six confessions attributed to Fawkes. Certainly such discrepancies there are, says the Oxford man, but they are evidence of genuineness. Fawkes was no coward; he was loyal to his oath of secrecy so long as human endurance could hold out; admission after admission was forced from him, and at each examination he was obliged to answer with an eye queries which he had previously answered no, so that these very differences shape better with the theory that the Government was really in the dark than with the supposition that their story was cut and dried beforehand. Again, from the fact that the date of Winter's confession shows 23, corrected to 25—as Father Gerard says, in the man's own handwriting—he concludes that the confession was extracted by torture. A close examination of the document, Dr. Gardiner alleges in reply, shows the correction to be not in Winter's hand, but in Cole's; and for such a correction he is at no loss to suggest a technical reason; at the same time, as an explanation of the phrase "Thomas Winter doth find his hand so strong as after dinner he will settle himself to write . . . to your Lordship," upon which is based the theory that he was submitted to torture, he demonstrates that at Holbeche Winter received a ball in the shoulder.

The topographical and mechanical department of the controversy is too intricate to be taken to pieces. We can only say that, having risen from Father Gerard's book filled with assurance that, whatever did actually happen, the general course of the traditional narrative at any rate was henceforth incredible, we leave his adversary's reply with our uprooted notions once more upright and hearty. Father Gerard, for example, poured ridicule upon the notion that "these light-hearted adventurers" had been able to drive a tunnel through soft earth and to perform the ticklish operation of interfering with foundations without causing either crack or settlement. And it does seem absurd, till Dr. Gardiner reminds us, that the wars in the Low Countries had offered to Fawkes "the most complete school of military mining in the world." Cecil's motives for complicity, the theory that his position in the King's grace required a prop, will hardly stand before the fact that "he had just achieved a triumph of no common order," and in February had been raised to the earldom of Salisbury.

With such succinctness and effectiveness has one of the greatest of our living authorities answered the sprightly monograph of last autumn, and his slender volume—its dimensions are less than those of the book to which it replies—contains in addition a perfectly modelled little essay upon the relations between the Government and the Papal Church, in which the theory that the opposition of statesmen was based mainly upon national considerations is strongly defended. A curious and, it may be hoped, to Father Gerard a consoling feature in the case is that his antagonist has come away from his task filled with a sort of reverence for the misguided men whose wild wicked scheme gained for the religion in whose interest it was conceived two hundred years of bitter distrust and ill-usage. This notice may be fitly concluded with a passage in which this sentiment is conveyed:

" . . . No candid person can, I imagine, rise from the perusal of these sentences [Winter's confession] without having his estimate of the character of the conspirators raised. There is no conscious assumption of high qualities, but each touch as it comes strengthens the belief that the men concerned in the plot were patient and loyal, brave beyond the limits of ordinary bravery, and utterly without selfish aims."

A GUIDE TO OXFORD.

Oxford and its Colleges. By J. Wells. Illustrated by E. H. New. (Methuen & Co.)

MESSRS. METHUEN are to be heartily congratulated on the success of their dainty little guide to Oxford and its colleges. It is in every way a charming book, pleasant to hold in the hand, admirably printed on good paper, and as admirably illustrated. Mr. Wells has performed his part of the work most excellently. He sets down his facts with a brevity and conciseness which are as rare in guide-books as they are desirable, while he relieves his narrative from time to time with sly touches of humour, which are very refreshing in the midst of such a mass of historical, architectural, and biographical details. The arrangement of the book strikes us as well-planned. Each college is treated in a separate chapter, which varies in length according to the amount of interesting matter which its history provides, while each chapter again is divided into two parts, the first and shorter part dealing only with the architecture and the buildings, the second with the general history of the college and the various men of note who have been educated at it. With great wisdom Mr. Wells has not attempted any elaborate survey of the Oxford of to-day in his book, or any account of its living worthies. His subject is the Oxford of the past and the history of its gradual evolution into the Oxford of the present, and the present is only touched upon in the light of that past. We are thus spared unprofitable speculations as to the results of modern educational movements, or the possibilities of future developments. The book, in fact, is essentially businesslike. Its author set before himself a definite programme, and refused to be diverted from it to any matters not strictly within its scope. There is only one point on which we think the arrangement of the matter might have been improved, and in some future edition it might be found possible to alter this. We should like to see the date of the foundation of every college placed at the head of the chapter devoted to it. It is true that the date is generally to be found somewhere in the text (though in the case, for example, of Trinity no date is given for Sir Thomas Pope's foundation), but for purposes of reference it is always more convenient to have a definite place in which information of this kind may be found.

One other curious omission in the book may be noted in passing—namely, that whereas in the accounts of all the other colleges which possess gardens any points of interest relating to these are given, in the case of New College, whose gardens are perhaps the most beautiful in Oxford, nothing is to be found beyond a casual reference under the general heading of "Oxford" in the first chapter. Anyone reading through the account of that college would go away with the impression that, unlike Merton, Trinity, Exeter, and the rest, it had no garden. Another curious omission may be found in the chapter on Magdalen, where no mention whatever is made of the beautiful Deer Park. But these are small points, and the wonder is, not that such things have been omitted, but that room has been found for so much, considering the small size of the book.

The tone of Mr. Wells's strictures on the sins of modern Oxford architects is conscientiously moderate. Even Keble does not bring forth a railing accusation from him. Of the Brasenose buildings in the High-street he merely remarks that "it is a pity that so good a building is so over-loaded with ornament," while few will consider him unduly severe when he describes the Holywell-street front of New College as "the most terrible of all the outrages on modern Oxford." The book is full of curious and interesting bits of information about the University in all the various phases of its history, and contains many pleasant old world academic stories of dead and gone worthies—and unworthies. He quotes, by the way, Trapp's epigram on the two Universities:

"The king observing with judicious eyes
The state of both his universities,
To Oxford sent a troop of horse; and why?
That learned body wanted loyalty.
To Cambridge books he sent, as well discerning
How much that loyal body wanted learning."

But he does not quote the original epigram to which, we believe, this was only a rejoinder:

"The king to Oxford sent a troop of horse,
For Tories own no argument but force.
On the other hand to Cambridge books he sent,
For Whigs allow no force but argument."

In the chapter on the Bodleian he tells an interesting old story which is worth repeating:

"Charles I. visited the library on more than one occasion, and is said to have here consulted the Sortes Virgilianæ with the most unhappy results; he had been persuaded by Lord Falkland to try his luck, and opened on the passage—

'Let him for succour sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace.

And when at length the cruel war shall cease,
On hard conditions may he buy his peace."

Lord Falkland only made matters worse when, hoping to remove the bad effect of the unlucky omen, he, too, opened Virgil; his passage was that on the untimely death of Pallas:

"Oh, curst essay of arms, disastrous doom, Prelude of bloody fields and fights to come."

The epitaph on the Non-Juror Rawlinson in the Chapel of St. John's is worth quoting for its gentle irony. He had left the bulk of his estate to his college, and requested that his heart should be buried in the chapel to the north of the altar with the inscription "Ubi Thesaurus ibi cor," which gives a new and subtle meaning to the text, "Where your treasure is there will your heart be also."

Altogether Mr. Wells's guide to Oxford is an excellent piece of work. Our only regret is that space could not be found for some account of the many interesting old churches in the city. But these are outside the subject of the book which deals only with the University. Perhaps Messrs. Methuen will be tempted to follow it up with another volume dealing with these?

A BOOK ABOUT BIRDS.

The Migration of Birds. By Charles Dixon.
(Horace Cox.)

IN 1895 Mr. Dixon published The Migration of British Birds, as a contribution towards the study of the geographical distribution and movements of birds and of insular faunas. More reading and observation have led him further afield, and the present book is an enlarged and corrected view of his theories on bird-life. It is marked by a thoroughness and knowledge of the subject which must render it a valuable compendium to all who are interested in the migration of birds: a fascinating study in itself, and one that touches many fields of biological and geological lore. Every variety of migration—vertical, local, nomadic and irruptive—is carefully investigated. Tables of species supposed to pass over from one to ten thousand miles during migration, and of species with a base in the intertropical realm which breed both in the northern and southern hemispheres, are appended. An Appendix also appears on the bibliography of Mr. Dixon's subject, in which, however, no mention is made of Pliny. The volume is equipped with maps, and contains forms in which modern Whites of Selborne can note the appearance and departure of migratory birds. Indeed, Mr. Dixon has taken the utmost pains to set forth his subject worthily, and, to do him justice, he has succeeded fairly well; but there is an ungracious savour throughout the book. No greater authority upon migration can be named than the late Herr Gätke, who enjoyed unique facilities for studying the flight of birds at Heligoland. He collected a large body of statistics, but is remarkably cautious in drawing deductions from them. Ornithologists value Gätke's book on Migration on account of the sobriety of his judgments. He never presses evidence too far, never assumes a point which is not amply established by observation. Yet Mr. Dixon says:

"Profound as is our admiration for this grand old naturalist's labours, we cannot help regretting this reticence, and we feel that many of his remarks upon the question of avine migration will tend to increase rather than to dispel the great amount of unnecessary mystery with which time and sentiment have surrounded it."

But Mr. Dixon's vials of wrath overflow when he comments on the estimates of rapidity with which birds fly as laid down by Herr Gätke. Surely half a century of observation and experience in Heligoland ought to count for something. What does our author say to Ruskin's view of the rapidity of the swallow's flight?

"Taking Michelet's estimate—eighty French leagues, roughly two hundred and fifty miles, an hour—we have a thousand miles in four hours. That is to say, leaving Devonshire after an early breakfast, he could be in Africa to lunch."

Perhaps higher estimates than these might be accepted, when it is borne in mind that a migrating bird of great powers of flight ordinarily flies frequently at a great height, where the wind hurries it on at an enormous pace, like an arrow shot from a bow.

Had Gätke lived till the present day he might have retaliated upon Mr. Dixon by attacking the latter's strange hankering for the hibernation of the Hirundines and other birds. The evidence for it in Great Britain is almost entirely hearsay. It is true that Mr. Dixon adduces some instances which, however (including the famous instance of hibernation said to have occurred in Yorkshire in the winter of 1895), are all more or less doubtful. Swallows have admittedly been noticed in every month of the year excepting February. At the risk of being deemed a "mud-and-torpor-despising-bruiser critic," as Mr. Dixon says, we must needs wonder at the author's evident liking for the theory, although his scientific attitude is well-balanced. "I neither accept nor deny it, having personally seen nothing to refute or confirm it."

Much of Mr. Dixon's book is hypothetical, and will require to be very carefully supported by future observations. Such, for instance, is his "law" that "species in the northern hemisphere never increase their range in a southern direction; they may do so north, north-east, or north-west, east or west. Species in the southern hemisphere never increase their range in a northern direction." We know too little of the phenomena of migration in the southern hemisphere to attempt at present to draw conclusions upon it. The author, it seems to us, would be more successful were he to confine his studies to positive instances of migration instead of mixing up this study with physico-geological questions on the Ice Age, possible prehistoric movements of land and water, alteration of climate, sinking of the land, and the like. He will find a powerfully in this exclusive study of bird-migration apart from geological theories, in the report which is being compiled by a very competent naturalist on the enormous mass of figures on bird-migration collected from the different lighthouse keepers by the committee appointed by the British Association. Bird-migration is a more hopeful subject when elucidated from itself than when complicated with theories on old coast lines and the dispersal of species.

Mr. Dixon pours contempt upon instinct as being the motive for migration, upholding rather habit and experience. Instinct, however, is but a serviceable name for what is at present unknown. More abundant food, a better climate, and, above all, the imperious claims of love are the chief factors in the normal migration of birds. Abnormal migration is at present too little understood to be scientifically treated. It is only certain that perhaps the majority of our common birds (not regular migrants), do apparently, from some reasons as yet unknown, fly to distant quarters on the Continent while their places are filled by European birds of the same kind. Migration is in itself a sufficiently wonderful question to require no further complications from Darwinism or geology. While differing in many points from Mr. Dixon's views, we cannot help doing full justice to his industry and learning. The Migration of Birds is full of curious facts and knowledge, and will please all lovers of these creatures. The like can hardly be affirmed of all ornithologists.

ITALIAN ARCHITECTURE.

The Architecture of the Renaissance in Italy.

A General View for the Use of Students and Others. By William J. Anderson, Architect; Lecturer at the Glasgow School of Art. With 54 colotype and other plates, and 74 smaller illustrations in the text. (B. T. Batsford.)

MR. ANDERSON has accomplished a great deal in a small space. His 150 lavishly illustrated pages give a more connected and artistic account of his difficult subject than has ever been published before in so portable a form. Dissenting boldly from both Fergusson and Ruskin, he refuses to consider Italian Renaissance architecture either as a plague and pestilence, or as a copy and resuscitation of dead and unmeaning forms. He takes a more reasonable attitude—the purely historical one—which sees in the architecture the most definite expression of the genius of the nation, the most faithful embodiment of its history.

But the chief value of the book lies in the way in which the many Italian buildings are grouped and treated. To this treatment two sentences in Mr. Anderson's introduction give the key:

"The Renaissance (p. 2) was, in fact, a reversion to type, if a biological expression may be applied in this connection without confusion; and this recurrence, rather than permanence of type, appears to be characteristic of European civilisation, so far as we have had experience of it in two thousand years. In the Italy of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries we find the clearest and most emphatic expression of this European type, which is a variety as distinct as the Egyptian or the Arabian, and in a corresponding degree a racial expression. . . . Regarded (p. 3) as the history of the period and the people, written in stone for present and future ages, the architecture of the Italian Renaissance is one of the most luminous of all histories. By the operation of the universal law of natural selection, it has registered the awakened enthusiasm of the time for what was glorious and beautiful in the ancient world . . . while it records on the very face of it . . . the habits of the people . . . and the character and varying power of the governments of the Peninsula."

Mr. Anderson, in fact, deliberately sets out to provide an historical record of motive, to give instances of underlying principles and resulting architectural effects. His divisions are organic, not merely geographical, nor merely chronological. He catalogues the buildings neither of a century nor of a district; but he follows out a tendency from its beginning to its fall wherever he can find examples of it. This is infinitely more instructive in proportion as it is infinitely more difficult, than previous architectural discourses. And while this comparative treatment may best be followed in detail in Mr. Anderson's own pages, it also leads him into a few general statements which may be indicated here. "Venice," he remarks, for instance (page 40), "is the only centre which presents important examples of all three periods," namely, the early Renaissance of Milan and Florence, the later, found in Rome, and the Palladian epoch of Vicenza. He points out, also, that while the early Renaissance of Florence ends about 1500, it extends in Venice until 1525, thus overlapping the beginnings of a new development in Florence and Rome. From which it follows that some idea of the partition of the country at the time under review is absolutely necessary. Without a clear conception of the elements of its political geography, the variations of the architecture of Italy become inexplicable. And there are many other factors which have to be taken into consideration in discussing this complicated problem; such as the predominance of the Christian Religion in the form of the Roman Catholic Church; the literary tendency towards the study of classical authors; the preservation in Italy of many monuments with which those authors were indissolubly connected; the highly organised and independent political activity of the towns; the prosperous conditions of commerce, and, therefore, of the arts; and, finally, the rapid decay of pointed architecture, which had been introduced from without, and was unsuited to the soil of Italy. The importance of the last of these factors may easily be exaggerated; but as a whole they made up a sum-total of environment, a combination of exciting causes, which only needed the personality of genius to rouse them into living force and beauty. And when the time was ripe the personality arose in Brunelleschi. His resolution to acquire the Roman principles and to build upon them was fraught with as much uncertainty as the first voyage of Columbus. Both were successful in the discovery of a new world.

Yet with this early Renaissance in Florence, Venice, and Milan, there were still intermingled many of the old Romanesque and Gothic and Byzantine elements. There was very little slavish imitation, very slight bondage even to classical principles. But from the first years of the sixteenth century these Gothic and Romanesque elements very quickly disappear; and it is therefore generally believed that the Italians of the fifteenth century took up architecture at the point where the ancients laid it down. This they did eventually; but any such view of the origin of Renaissance art is not only incomplete, but wrong. So much is our author impressed with the truth of this that he insists almost too strongly on his objection to Palladio and Vignola, and to the highly ornate palaces of Genoa or Venice. But for his description of the first and of the second or culminating period we have nothing but praise. His careful measurements and accurate descriptions of the Palazzo Massimi at Rome would alone almost give this part of the work the value of a monograph. His conclusions (p. 123), after describing these two periods, are as follows:

"If they are regarded as a whole, it is not too much to claim that this series of remarkable buildings proves that this culminating period of the Renaissance was a great fact in architectural history, quite worthy of comparison with the Periclean Age in Greece, the Augustan era of Imperial Rome, or the climax of mediæval art in France and England. It would be altogether unreasonable to claim that it was superior to Greek or Gothic, except in certain particulars; but in its comparative amenability to modern requirements it touches us more nearly to-day than either."

From this high standard Mr. Anderson indicates the fall, in a sentence which is startling enough without its context, but which we may leave our readers to justify for themselves from his pages:

"The loss of conformity [page 128] to constructive principle was the decisive cause of the decay of Renaissance architecture, and if the responsibility can be attached to one man, that man was Michelangelo, the greatest genius of all."

One more point may be worth mentioning before we close the considerations suggested by Mr. Anderson's accurate and clever work. It is that Prof. W. H. Goodyear has gradually been elaborating the theory of horizontal curves which he first discovered in the Maison Carrée at Nîmes. These curves have for long been known in the Parthenon. Prof. Goodyear has since 1895 been carefully studying their presence in various Italian buildings. The full results of his investigations (some of which are already published) will be awaited with keen interest. They will affect not only ancient Greek and mediæval Italian architectural theories, but they will, no doubt, offer some very interesting problems for solution in many of those buildings modelled from the Roman which Mr. Anderson has so admirably described.

A NATIONAL TRANSFORMATION.

Social Transformations of the Victorian Age.
By T. H. S. Escott. (Seeley.)

To get over the disagreeable duty of finding fault it may at once be said that this book calls aloud for revision. It abounds in odd little mistakes, the majority of which appear to be printers' blunders, though a considerable number are the slips of a hasty pen. As an example take the following reference to Mr. Asquith, who, we are told, "belonged to a slightly older generation than Lord Randolph Churchill. Before he took his degree in 1863 [sic] he had established the same sort of reputation for himself in the Union as had been won two or three generations earlier by Mr. Gladstone, and as seventeen years afterwards was to be won in the same arena by Mr. G. N. Curzon, in 1897 Foreign Under Secretary."

In point of fact, Mr. Asquith was born in 1852, and took his degree in 1874. Mr. Curzon, on the other hand, took his M.A. in 1886, and was born in 1859, so that it is impossible to account for Mr. Escott's mistake, except by the plea of hasty writing and hasty revision. The same inaccuracy of statement informs us that the agricultural gang system prevailed mostly in the North, whereas it should have been East and South. It is needless to bring forward more errors; the reader will find them but too plentiful. A sentence must also be devoted to the index, which is nearly the worst we know. While it refers us to facts so trivial as that Dilke, C. W., reduced the price of the Daily News, it does not contain any mention of names so important as Balfour, Asquith, Churchill, Salisbury, and Harcourt.

Apart from these blemishes, which it would not be honest to pass over, Mr. Escott has written a solid and laborious volume on the changes that have occurred during the last sixty years. It is not very sprightly or amusing, but the facts in themselves possess so dramatic an interest that merely to enumerate them is to hold the attention. He is valuable and useful on all matters that admit of explanation by an array of definite and concrete facts chiefly for the reason that he has called to his aid the most trustworthy authorities. When judgment has to be exercised he is not so convincing. We cannot help thinking, for instance, that he enormously exaggerates the importance of the part played in politics by Sir Charles Dilke, and scarcely does justice to leaders of far greater weight. In the domain of literature, too much space is allotted to Lord Lytton, and it sounds odd to hear anyone eulogising "the gentle and gracious offices" performed by Martin Tupper and Hain Friswell. Again, it is doubtful whether Macaulay was "the father of the leading" article—the style of the Times was formed before his day. Curious, too, is his endeavour to trace "the terse impressionist style" of the new journalist to George Borrow, Kinglake, Laurence Oliphant, and Grenville Murray.

There are many themes into which it would be pleasant to follow Mr. Escott, and agree or disagree with him as the case might be. But we shall be content to make a generalisation. People are accustomed to talk lightly of the time-saving appliances of our era without quite realising what they mean. Here, however, Mr. Escott works out subject after subject, and proves that in every department of human industry men are more active and more industrious than ever; and yet how vastly extended is the taste for pleasure, how much more cricket and football is played in the fields, how much more chess and billiards in the house. We go more to theatre and concert room, we tour and travel and holiday it more than our forefathers, and yet we get through such heaps of labour as would have dismayed them. That is the most astonishing characteristic of the generation.

A QUESTION OF STYLE.

The Woodland Life. By Edward Thomas.
(Blackwood.)

THIS book consists of twelve essays and a diary—all treating of country life. The theme is a pleasant one, and is rendered still more so by the attractive binding in which the publishers have sent out the volume. Yet, to write quite frankly, despite a warm sympathy with the author's intention and a long-standing interest in his subject, we find the thing unreadable. Our business is to try and explain why this is so not only in the case of Mr. Thomas, but in that of numbers who have made a similar failure. To describe familiar outdoor objects in a way to secure attention seems easy, but is really a test of style. The classic examples of success are, of course, White, Thoreau, and Jefferies. Mr. Thomas would do well to give his days and nights to the first mentioned. White of Selborne was simple even to baldness, and gets his effect by sheer faithfulness to nature. Mr. Thomas has not yet advanced so far in his literary studies as to know that there is an ornament which enriches style, but twenty that impoverish it. We take his first page to illustrate our meaning. It has only eighty-eight words altogether, and, nevertheless, contains the following worn-out mock felicities of phrase: "a myriad stars of stitchwort," "purple spires of orchis"—the stars and spires "join hands" by the by—"elm-branches swathed deep in the lush growths of spring," "spangled blossoms," "lofty columnar boles," and that trade mark of the open-airist, "a bank of galley oars."

Let us examine another sentence to prove the unwisdom of overloading style. On p. 61 it is written: "A crowded woodland of varied hues, ledge beyond ledge climbs the hill's slow ascent, and in this dazzling dawn the sunlight plays upon the dewed leaves with gorgeous effect." White's imagination would not have soared to a woodland climbing a hill, and you may be sure his austere taste would have rejected the phrases we have italicised. A wooded hill at dawn with sunshine falling on the tree-leaves—state it so, and the reader will picture the effect for himself. The very next sentence reads: "Mellow limes contrast with sea-green chestnuts, now flaming with pinnacles of waxen bloom; the reddened foliage of the oak seems to burn in the fierce light, while the pale tasselled birches are all a-quiver," &c. Until he can use, without abusing, a useful gift of language, Mr. Thomas should enter into a vow of total abstinence from adjectives.

In the sort of Shepherd's Calendar that takes up half the volume we have this same profusion of epithet, only more glaringly out of place. A diary ought to be as simple and unaffected as a letter, and absolutely definite in statement. "April 20. Meadows rare with cowslips: deep purple later, with lush early orchis." One does not wish to write against Keats, but his popularisation of the word "lush" and its kindred was little short of a crime. It is unnecessary to pursue the matter further, as it will now be understood why Mr. Thomas is so difficult to read. At the same time, it was worth doing this much because he seems to possess some of the stuff out of which writers are made. Let him discard second-hand finery of expression and trust for effect to his imagination and simplicity and he will write a better book than The Woodland Life.

Undoubtedly the one interesting bit in the diary is that which deals with the author's walking tour to Marlborough, and his visit to Swindon, Coate, the reservoir and meadows of which Jefferies wrote so much, the downs with their kestrels, and other scenes rendered familiar to most of us by the Gamekeeper at Home and Wild Life in a Southern County. He adds nothing to our knowledge of Richard Jefferies, although he met old people who remember his birth. But the truth is that Richard was a prophet never much honoured in his own county, the family has long been removed from the neighbourhood, and there is little to be gleaned. Yet somehow the slight description of, and references to, Coate and its surroundings are more attractive than anything else in the volume.

ENGLISH SONG.

English Minstrelsy: a National Monument of English Song. Collated and Edited by S. Baring-Gould, M.A. Vol. VII. (Edinburgh: T. C. & E. C. Jack.)

IN his introductory Essay on English Folk-Music to this seventh volume, Mr. Baring-Gould "sighs over the ruins of our folk-music," and wishes "that men in England had been as patriotic as those of Scotland, Wales, and Ireland" in preserving traditional airs. Mr. Gould, however, does not merely sigh and utter vain regrets; his "National Monument of English Song" shows that he is doing his best to seek them out and gather them together. Our author reminds us that a collector "must be furnished with infinite patience, and put up with much disappointment"; and the truth of this statement is fully confirmed by the Essay in question. We read how he mixed with the peasantry, with stone-cutters, farm labourers, fiddlers, and others—sometimes in their homes, sometimes in taverns—and thus heard songs which had been handed down from father to son, and of which there was no written record. He was, of course, specially anxious to meet with very old folk who would sing to him songs which they had learnt in early youth; it was, indeed, principally from old inhabitants that he obtained some of his greatest treasures. Many, nay most of them, could neither read nor write; and living a quiet, simple, country life, there was little or nothing, except the vagaries of memory, to induce them to alter either words or music. People who read and write and who lead a busy life, mixing and exchanging thoughts with many men, may have a fuller-stored memory, yet, except perhaps in special cases, one less vivid, so far as regards the exact words of a poem or notes of a song. Mr. Gould tells of a stone-cutter who, when nearly eighty years of age, had not forgotten any of the old ballads taught to him by an "aged" widow when he was a little urchin. He used to carry milk for her every day, and as she was not rich enough to pay him in coin, she sang or recited to him.

It might, indeed, be doubted whether airs and poems thus acquired are of any real value; whether, in fact, the memory of these aged inhabitants was to be trusted. That doubt might possibly exist if Mr. Gould had accepted all the songs which he heard. But before including any one in his collection he would carefully compare many versions of the same melody as noted down in many places, often widely removed, so as to discover the mother-form. It may often have been difficult to discover which was the best version, but at times, no doubt, the very variety may have proved a help in forming a decision. Mr. Gould was able to "prick down" any song which he heard, with the aid of a piano. Such an instrument, however, was not always available, so that he called to his aid the Rev. H. Fleetwood Sheppard and other skilled musicians. The Rev. F. W. Bussell, Vice-Principal of Brazenose, Oxford, it appears, was remarkable "for the extreme accuracy with which he noted every twist and flourish of the singer."

It is indeed unfortunate that only within recent years attempts should have been made to collect folk-airs now "trembling on the verge of oblivion." Better late, however, than not at all; and the patient labours of Mr. Gould and his associates deserve every encouragement. The volume under notice contains not only traditional airs, but also those of well-known composers, such as Dr. Pepusch, William Shield, J. L. Hatton, and others.

The writing of accompaniments to old songs has always been a difficult matter. Attempts to reproduce the past are always more or less imperfect, and in many, probably most cases, folk-melodies had no accompaniment. The aim, says Mr. Gould, has been to avoid "unsuitable elaboration on the one hand, and bald simplicity on the other." There may be places in which the juste milieu has not been strictly adhered to, but the writing always shows skill and taste, and, for the most part, enhances the charm of the melodies. The airs are given in tonic sol-fa, as well as in the ordinary notation. The publishers may be congratulated on the get-up of the volume.

SOME EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

Arnold of Rugby. By J. J. Findlay. (Cambridge University Press.)

THIS is a dull and a disappointing book. That a concise exposition of what permanent services exactly were rendered by Thomas Arnold to English education was uncalled for or unseasonable we are very far from saying. At such a time as this in particular it were well that the views and the achievements of the leading educational reformers of the present century should be put before the public. Thus an account of Arnold in a succinct form, such as would be read not only by professional educationists, but also by others who may be called upon to assist in carrying out the provisions of the coming Secondary Education Act, would have had a distinct value. But this is just what Mr. Findlay has not given us. His volume is a farrago compounded of hashed-up extracts from Stanley's Life of Dr. Arnold (a book familiar or accessible to every schoolmaster), and selections from Arnold's sermons and from essays by him on sundry scholastic topics, for the most part of no present interest or importance. The chunks carved out of Stanley are served up still laden with all the old-world theological jargon that cumbers the original work: a garnish which perhaps was well enough in the age of our grandmothers, but which only serves to repel the modern reader. We doubt whether many of those who do not know and who wish to know something about Arnold will suffer themselves to be bored to the extent involved in toiling through Mr. Findlay's 260 pages. He has appended to his compilation a "Bibliography" of publications relating to Arnold and to public school education, and apologises for any incompleteness there may be in this list. The apology was needed. We cannot but think that a teacher of teachers, as Mr. Findlay is, might reasonably have been expected, at least, to know the titles of a very much larger number of works on pedagogics, or if he knew them to have taken the trouble to set them down. Nor is his scanty catalogue up to date in point of criticism, for a perusal of Mr. Leach's English Schools at the Reformation would have caused him to modify his estimate of the authority of Carlisle, whom, by the way, he calls an "antiquarian." In fine, some fifty or so very useful pages might have been written about Arnold's place in the history of education, and the subject fairly exhausted therein. Such fifty pages would have been read.

Thirty Years of Teaching. By L. C. Miall. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS is a very different stamp of book. For this bright and sensible little work we have nothing but praise. If what Mr. Miall has to tell us is not always fresh, though it often is, it is generally freshly put, and, like Mr. Arthur Sidgwick, he possesses the rare art of writing about education in an attractive manner. We heartily commend his book to the attention of the parent as well as of the teacher.

Flosculorum Fasciculus. Selected Translations into Latin and Greek Verse by C. S. Jerram, M.A. (Oxford: George Sheppard.)

THE making of Latin and Greek verses is an elegant exercise which a utilitarian age has discarded as useless; and the Oxford man may now pass through a scholarship to a first in "Greats" without knowing more than enough to distinguish between hexameters and sapphics. Nevertheless, the elegance of the exercise appeals to the genuine scholar, who will welcome the modest paper-covered volume in which Mr. Jerram has put forth his renderings of selected passages from English poets. Mr. Jerram has been very judicious in his choice of subject, and has taken only passages which have something of the spirit of the language into which he translates. He does not attempt, with forced jocularity, to turn a bill of lading into Greek elegiacs. On the contrary, he takes such a passage as Matthew Arnold's description of the funeral in "Balder Dead," which breathes the very spirit of Homer:

"The mast they fixed, and hoisted up the sails,
Then they put fire to the wood."

At once comes the Greek without effort, or with the skill that conceals effort:

Ἰστίον δὲ στήσαντες, ἀπὸ δ' ἰστία νηὸς ἵσαντες
Τείναν δελφάντες, ἀπὸ δὲ ξύλα δανάεσσιν ἔκαιον.

You will find among these excellent renderings an occasional lapse into a tour de force—as a eulogy of a notorious soap and a translation of Gilbert's "Titwillow." But these are concessions. As a fair specimen we may give the rendering of Herrick's well-known stanza:

"Fat be my hind, unlearned be my wife,
Peaceful my night, my day devoid of strife;
To these a comely offspring I desire,
Singing about my everlasting fire."

Thus runs the Latin:

"Nupta indocta domi, pinguis sit vilicus agris,
Sint placidae noctes, et sine lite dies;
Hic super accedat proles formosa, perennem
Quae cantu celebret, laeta corona, focum."

Nothing could be better of its kind. And in this little book of selected translations you will find more than forty of equal excellence, the fruit of a third of a century of learned leisure.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Professor's Children. By E. H. Fowler. (Longmans & Co.)

ALTHOUGH we cannot quite determine the object of the author of this little book—whether, as the form suggests, it is to please children, or to poke a little gentle fun at Prof. Sully and his fellow psychologists who study the young mind, or to interest parents—we still can give it hearty commendation. The Professor's children may not perhaps do enough to satisfy real nurseries (children who read of other children want deeds before speech), but their talk is a delight. Miss Fowler has evidently observed very closely and appreciatively. She gives us not only the broad outline of children's conversation—a little above par, as it should be in a book—but also the delicate shades. Here, for example, is a story, with typical interruptions:

"'I have thought of a new story,' said Roger, beginning to jump about. Roger always jumped about wildly during his flights of imagination, which made him a little difficult to hear at times, owing to his breathlessness.

'Once upon a time there was a woodcutter,' he began, 'and he was very poor.'

Peggy sat clasping her legs and resting her chin on her knees, and the baby lay flat on his back and waved his boots in the air.

'Werry poor?' asked Oliver.

'Awfully poor. His name was Mr. Jenkins, and he suffered many things because of his poorness.'

'How werry poor was he?' persisted Oliver, who always would sift the matter thoroughly, and there was no possibility of putting him off.

'So poor that he never had anything to eat,' continued Roger, standing still for a moment to get his breath.

'How horrid!' Peggy softly observed.

'And he lived in a wood 'cause of being a woodcutter. One day the cat —'

'What cat?' Oliver wanted to know.

'The Jenkins' cat, of course—jumped into the larder and quickly ate up all the food that was there.'

'A bitin' cat!' remarked the baby, suddenly sitting upright and listening attentively.

'And Mr. Jenkins began to beat the cat, and he beat it and beat it till all its bones was broken! when suddenly—here Roger paused, and his small pale face fairly glowed with excitement—the wolf rushed in and killed Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins quite dead and ate them all up in a minute.'

'He bited them!' murmured the baby.

'After Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins was dead and buried —'

'But the wolf swallowed them, you know,' corrected Peggy, 'so they couldn't be buried as well.'

'It's my story, and they was buried,' said Roger with dignity. 'In course the wolf didn't swallow quite all of them. So their heads and their boots, and,' reverting to his own toilet, 'their braces was buried, and, when the funeral was finished, the cat married the wolf.'

'But the Jenkins' was werry poor—too poor to have things to eat—so why was there any food in the larder?' began Oliver, who had been meditating on the opening part of the story.

'Don't bother so!' said Peggy impatiently.

'But I want to know,' persisted her little brother. 'If they was too poor to have any food, they was too poor to have a larder to keep it in.'

The children are studied for psychological purposes by the Professor, their father, who is the customary professor of such books. What children will make of his remarks we cannot imagine; but parents should be amused. Miss Fowler, we fancy, made a slip when she wrote the baby's age as two. He must have been older.

Norfolk Songs, Stories and Sayings. By Walter Rye. (S.P.O.K.)

From his great store of Norfolk lore Mr. Rye has here put together a scrappy and hurried but very readable and interesting collection of gossip. His chapters cover a wide area; ballads, songs, and rhymes, dialect, duels and murders, elections, ghosts, eating and drinking, marvels and myths, genealogy, strange characters, sport. The dialect chapter is most pleasing to us. Some of the Norfolk sayings are very precious. Thus "Tangle-leg," for strong beer, could not be beaten; and, "He don't like working between meals," is a perfect description of a lazy man. "Very apt," says Mr. Rye, "is the native at repartee. Once at Thorpe Gardens, years ago, when a comic singer who was chaunting at a water frolic, was rudely interrupted by a drunken man from Ber Street, he stopped and said, 'One fule at a time, sir, if you please,' which has always struck me as one of the best and most self-denying repartees I ever heard." But there are occasions, even in Norfolk, of want of ready wit. It is told of a man of Lynn, who was not good at improvisation, that being induced to take the chair at a Bible Society meeting, he could say, by way of introductory speech, nothing but, "The Society is a good Society, a very good Society, in fact, ladies and gentlemen, it is a d— good Society." In the eating and drinking chapter, Mr. Rye gives this proof of Norfolk capacity:

"I remember, myself, one night, that at the 'Angel,' at North Walsham, a commercial traveller said that no man could eat a whole goose—upon which bets were laid, and the host sent out for a certain local gorgier to come at once and eat it. A message was brought that he couldn't because he had just eaten twenty 'white' (fresh) herrings for his supper. But on pressure being put on him he came and did eat it."

Mr. Rye gives in this chapter two recipes for cooking swans. He also affirms that the air of Norfolk nullifies the evil effects of alcohol, which may account for the enormous consumption of liquor by parties on the Broads. The chapter in which Mr. Rye expresses his scorn for the pedigree myth and the people who support it, is likely to bring him some unpopularity in the county. "Woodman, spare that (family) tree!" will be their plaint. At the end of his book, by way of appendix, Mr. Rye reprints from an old ACADEMY his reasons for believing Chaucer to be a Norfolk man, and also a bibliography of the Broads.

Whitby Past and Present. By Robert B. Holt. (Whitby: Horne & Son.)

PROVINCIAL publishing is much to be encouraged. A book like this—written, printed, bound, and published locally—may come to us with all its faults thick upon it, but it comes recommended by the fact that it is a local production. Messrs. Horne & Son have turned out this book partly well and partly ill. The cover is good because perfectly simple: a dark green cloth with the title and author's name printed on the front cover in honest Roman capitals, and the Whitby arms in gold in the centre. The half title-page maintains the dignity and simplicity of Roman capitals; but with the title-page comes delirium. For the title is set up in a strange printing-office old English type, the author's name is in Roman capitals, and the escutcheon is described in a crazy type that no man may describe.

The body of the book is quite well printed; but why will provincial publishers insist on printing illustrations in many colours? This book is illustrated with process blocks from views taken by a local photographer, taken very well too; but why are they printed in green, in vivid red, in mauve, and in black? Surely this loss of style between London and Whitby need not have been. In London books are produced with a nice regard to style, and hundreds of perfectly turned out books must reach Whitby every year. Why, then, ignore good models? In so simple a matter as the placing of illustrations the right way on the page this book is defective. We do not wish to unduly criticise Messrs. Horne & Son, whose book will compare favourably with many that reach us from the country; but if provincial publishing is to be encouraged it must also be chastened.

Mr. Holt's subject-matter is distinctly interesting, for his memory is long and his knowledge of the Whitby neighbourhood must, we think, be unrivalled.

"Seventy years ago," Mr. Holt tells us, "there were many quaint old customs still surviving in Whitby, at least in memory. One of them was that of counting fish in triplets. 'Thoo's yan! but thoo's not yan! but thoo's yan! thoo's twa! but thoo's not twa! but thoo's twa!' Or, as an old fisherman gave it me, 'One to pay! one to give away, and one to tally there' was once the ordinary mode of counting herrings, &c. A publican was called an ale draper, a spirit merchant a brandy spinner. A huckster was termed a badger; he used to go about the country with an ass and panniers to barter needles, threads, and other small articles, for butter, eggs, and fruit; these he sold in the market towns. A cadger was a man who collected the corn of small farmers and took it to be ground."

In addition to giving his own piquant recollections of Whitby, Mr. Hall sketches the rise of St. Hilda's great abbey that still crowns the Whitby cliff, and surveys the history of the town from the earliest days to those of his own childhood.

Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden. By Mrs. C. W. Earle. (Smith Elder & Co.)

Mrs. EARLE, allowing her pen to wander where it will, has produced a quiet, leisurely book of great interest to women. Her principal subjects are gardening, cookery, and the education of sons and daughters; but she keeps an intelligent and appreciative glance for much else besides. The remarks concerning books on gardening are perhaps the strength of Mrs. Earle's work. The quotation which precedes these pleasant pages of advice is happy: "Often-times he would make it his prayer that he should not be accounted as an hypocrite by reason that his life sorted not with his teaching; insisting that there is a duality in unity in most of us, and that to a writer it hath still been permitted (not for his own behoof, since what true profit is there to a man in seeming that he is not?) to put his better mind in his books." Mrs. Earle may like to know that the poem which she quotes on page 21—"John Frost"—is by "Gabriel Setoun."

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

The Chevalier D'Auriac. By S. Levett-Yeats.
(Longmans & Co.)

Referring to the anachronism in his story, the author of The Chevalier D'Auriac remarks in his preface: "The only excuse the writer has for not making the correction is that his object is simply to enable a reader to pass away a dull hour." That is the right spirit: an author of romance cannot have a better ambition. Mr. Levett-Yeats, in so far as I am concerned, has succeeded. My one wish is that he had not employed the first-person-singular. A story told in this manner is bereft of a certain element of surprise. One learns at the outset that no combat in which the hero is involved will for the hero have a fatal issue. The Chevalier D'Auriac is so bloodthirsty a young gentleman, and his narrative is so packed with encounters, that I have found myself regretting the first-person-singular more than usual. Another objection is that the hero who fights and does not write about it afterwards is more admirable than the hero who does. It is true that the Chevalier D'Auriac abjures the pen until he is old and forlorn, but I should prefer that his history had been told by another. For his mighty romances of duel, battle, and intrigue Dumas found the third-person a practicable enough method. Why should not his pupil, Mr. Levett-Yeats? This, however, is the only objection which, as a reader, I have to The Chevalier D'Auriac. As a story it bustles along nobly. The clash of steel sounds from start to finish, and I love the clash of steel. In the first chapter there is an affair by moonlight:

"It took but a half-minute to make myself ready, and borrowing a poniard from Nicholas to help me to parry, for De Gomeron held one in his left hand, and I was determined to give him no further advantage—he already had the light—I took my position. Then there was an angry little clash and our blades met, looking for all the world like two thin streaks of fire in the moonlight. I began the attack at once in the lower lines, but soon found that my adversary was a master of his weapon, and his defence was complete. We were both sober enough now, besides being in deadly earnest, and De Gomeron began to change his tactics and attack in his turn. He was more than cunning of fence, thrusting high at my throat to get as much of the reflection of the moon as possible on his blade, and so dazzle my eyes; but this was a game I had played before, and seeing this he disengaged, and making a beautiful feint, thrust low in tierce. The parry was just in time, but the point of his blade ripped me exactly over the heart, and dyed my shirt red with the blood of a flesh wound. The discipline of Nicholas and his men went to shreds at the sight of this, and there was a shout: 'Croix Dieu!' 'He is lost!'

"But a man's knowledge is not to be counted by his years, and Maître Touchet had himself placed a foil in my hand before I was seven. The hair that stood between me and death as De Gomeron's point touched me cooled me to ice, and knowing that in a long-continued contest youth must tell, I began to feign retreat, and give back slowly, meaning to wind my opponent, and work him round to get a little of the moon in his eyes."

This De Gomeron is the bad genius of the Chevalier. He dogs him continually, and at the end almost robs him of his lady. But of course nothing so terrible quite takes place. Mr. Levett-Yeats has been far too mindful of the way in which dull hours should be passed away to let that happen. In addition to the love-story of the Chevalier we find ourselves in the midst of plot and counter-plot of State. The central figure is Henri of Navarre, now King of France, and it is the pleasant but arduous task of the Chevalier to frustrate the treachery of traitorous ministers. The king himself assists the Chevalier in his last great exposure, after having pretended to discredit that loyal youth's tale of warning. The following scene, in quite the grand manner, is the outcome of such a partnership:

"When we got back I helped him to dress. He did not, however, resume his roquelaure or hat, but stood playing with the hilt of his sword, letting his eye run backward and forward over the vacant space in my room. At last he turned to me:

'Monsieur, you have not answered the question I put to you a moment before.'

'Sire,' I answered boldly, 'is it my fault?'

He began to pull at his moustache, keeping his eyes to the ground and saying to himself, 'Sully will not be here for a little; there is time.' As for me, I took my courage in both hands and waited. So a half-minute must have passed before he spoke again.

'Monsieur, if a gentleman has wronged another, there is only one course open. There is room enough here—take your sword, your place.'

'I—I—,' I stammered. 'Your Majesty, I do not understand.'

'I never heard that Monsieur le Chevalier was dense in these matters. Come, sir, time presses—your place.'

'May my hand wither if I do,' I burst out. 'I will never stand so before the king.'

'Not before the king, monsieur, but before a man who considers himself a little wronged too. What! is D'Auriac so high that he cannot stoop to cross a blade with plain Henri de Bourbon?'

And then it was as if God Himself took the scales from my eyes, and I fell on my knees before my king.

He raised me gently. 'Monsieur, I thank you. Had I for one moment led a soul to suspect that I believed in you from the first, this nest of traitors had never been found. St. Gris—even Sully was blinded. So far so good. It is much for a king to have gained a friend; and hark! if I am not mistaken, here is De Vitry.'

Henry of Navarre is a safe card for the romance-writer to play. Dumas sowed the seed, and all who follow partake the harvest. It is difficult to go wrong when Henri blusters through the pages. Mr. Levett-Yeats knows this well. I have never read a story when so much of the machinery of Dumas was employed with such success. The narrative style of Mr. Levett-Yeats is admirable. He is not a great writer, but, for the purpose he set himself at the beginning of this work, he is adequate. The dull hour is finely averted. The first extract showed our hero and De Gomeron in conflict. Here is the passage, from the last chapter, showing De Gomeron's death:

"Messieurs, you who may read this, those at least of you who have stood sword in hand and face to face with a bitter foe, when the fight is to the last, will know that there are moments when it is as if God Himself nerves the arm and steels the wrist. And so it was then with me. I swear it that I forestalled each movement of the twinkling blade before me, that each artifice and trick the skilful swordsman who was fighting for his life employed was felt by something that guided my sword, now high, now low, and ever and again wet its point against the broad breast of the Camarguer."

"So, too, with him—he was lost, and he knew it. But he was a brave man, if ever there was one, and he pulled himself together as we reached the upper landing for one last turn with the death that dogged him. So fierce was the attack he now made, that had he done so but a moment before, when the advantage of position was his, I know not what had happened. But now it was different. He was my man. I was carried away by the fire within me, or else in pity I might have spared him; but there is no need to speak of this more. He thrust too high. I parried and returned, so that the cross hilt of my rapier struck dully over his heart, and he died where he fell."

Of the interest of Mr. Levett-Yeats's excellent story there cannot be two opinions among readers who like the days of lackeys and rapiers, galloping steeds and flagons of D'Arbois, pistoles and Capuchins, "Ventre St. Gris!" and "Morbleu!" In such a hot-tempered and slaughterous society one wonders that any one was left alive at all, and I recommend the Chevalier D'Auriac to all readers of this kind, but particularly to those persons who have found the reports of the recent meeting between M. Catulle Mendès and M. Lugné Poë too tiresome.

ETHICS OF THE SURFACE.

The Rudeness of the Honourable Mr. Leatherhead.
A Homburg Story. By Gordon Seymour.
 (Grant Richards.)

Although the former of these two stories has already been noticed in these columns, I cannot, in fairness to the author, consider them apart. For Mr. Gordon Seymour is a novelist with a theory, and in the preface to the first of the "Ethics of the Surface" series he sets out his theory, which he forthwith proceeds to put into practice. In a word, Mr. Gordon Seymour considers that the novel has hitherto not been superficial enough. "As a rule," he writes, "the novel has not got beyond what might be called the lyrical stage, in which 'love,' and the whole relation of man to woman, is the central topic of interest." And it must be admitted that if we are to believe the statistics of the book trade, the topic continues to be sufficiently interesting. Still, in the course of his journey from primeval barbarism to nineteenth century civilisation the human animal has developed many interests which did not appeal to his remote ancestors. Prehistoric man as he lay at the mouth of his cave was interested in little but prehistoric woman and his prehistoric dinner. The finished human product of to-day takes these things more or less for granted. He does not have to fight his fellow-men for a wife, or even—except at evening parties—scramble for his food. Man no longer lives by bread alone, but is particular as to his liqueurs, and discriminates nicely between the brands of his cigars. "Thousands of years of civilisation and social differentiation," says Mr. Gordon Seymour, "have drawn within the sphere of fundamental necessities what, to the savage and our prehistoric ancestors, was either unfelt, unknown, or a matter of accident and luxury." In a complex social life we have hundreds of needs and desires, the denial of which would make life intolerable. Manners become more immediately important than morals, and the thief who is a good fellow becomes more acceptable as a social factor than the honest man who is a bore.

Now, these considerations are by no means new; they are the commonplaces of philosophy. But they have suggested to Mr. Gordon Seymour a method of novel-writing which appears to suit him admirably. He proposes to write a series of books, of which the motif shall be, not the passions which lie at the root of humanity, but the manners, the delicacies of behaviour, the nuances of deportment, which are the offshoot of centuries of civilisation, and without which Society would be a bear-garden. I almost wish that the author's preface, interesting as it is, had been omitted, and that he had given us his stories without any fussing about theory. One could then have seen what he was driving at. It is not necessary for the novelist, as for the professional entertainer, to "tell his audience what he is going to do, then do it, and then tell them he has done it." Nor is Mr. Seymour's method in any sense a new one or an individual one. We have had the novel of manners with us for many years. With what does Pride and Prejudice deal but with the "ethics of the surface"? Have not Mr. Henry James and Mr. Howells taught us the importance of trivialities? And is not Patience Sparknov solely concerned with those secondary and artificial needs which Mr. Seymour claims as his special province? Mr. Seymour would do better to practise the well-worn maxim which he is somewhat too fond of quoting—ars est celare artem—and write his stories without telling us how and why they are written.

I give this advice in the most friendly spirit, because Mr. Seymour's two little books have afforded me genuine pleasure in the reading. The former and slighter of the two describes how an act of rudeness towards an old lady on the part of Mr. Leatherhead affected that gentleman's career and even his character. The second also deals in manners. "This question of the manner, I see," says the heroine, "is of the greatest importance in social intercourse." It might be called a study in sensitiveness, in which the central figures are three ladies at Homburg who are conscious of a slight social prejudice against themselves. And the moral of the story, which shows throughout the faculty of observation and considerable insight into the delicacies of social life, is that we should "deal lightly with the blows struck at our own pride and sensitiveness," since we cannot, without loss of dignity, resent them. But here again Mr. Seymour thinks too much of pointing his moral and too little of adorning his tale, so that the hero, who is the author's mouthpiece, becomes now and then a bit of a prig. For

Mr. Seymour has also a theory of dialogue. He finds the dialogue of the average novel trivial and scrappy, and not at all like those "delightful and interesting talks which we have had" in real life. Wherefore his hero, when he makes the acquaintance of three pretty women on the Saalburg, and shows them the remains of the Roman Camp, points out the Porta Decumana, draws a plan on the back of an envelope and indicates the Prætorium, the Quæstorium, and the Porta Principalis dextra and sinistra; he sketches rapidly the history and policy of Rome, and then in the person of a Roman officer described the orders and duties of each day. Then he draws an analogy between modern Great Britain and ancient Rome, ending thus—

"On the other hand there was then no effective tribunal of public morality, no spiritual conscience of nations, of which we all have to take account in modern times—thank God, a real power with us, unknown to the ancient world, and to which we Englishmen, I hope, will always pay due tribute, though we shall insist upon advancing, unchecked by any power, because we know that our advance always means the common advance of civilisation."

The ladies, you will be surprised to hear, instead of going to sleep, were delighted, and one of them promptly fell in love with him. I have, I must confess, picked out almost the only ridiculous passage in the book. But that is because I really wish to persuade Mr. Seymour that he is hampering himself by theories which are not in the least novel. If he will only deal a little less "heavily and seriously with things which are not weighty"—as he writes in his preface, if he will cease to worry himself and us with theories, I shall look with eagerness for some more studies in the Philosophy of the Superficial.

* * * *

The Way of a Woman. By Mrs. L. T. Meade.
 (F. V. White & Co.)

Of course I have heard of Mrs. L. T. Meade over and over again. But as I seldom read novels but under compulsion—in the way of business—I had no personal acquaintance with her works until The Way of a Woman turned up on the table whereon I neglect my work, and I read it. Some of it, at least. And Quintin Garstin of the prologue seemed promising. He was engaged to Marjory, he was attached to the diplomatic service in China, he smoked opium, he joined—accidentally—a Chinese secret society, and he was inveigled into a marriage with the passionate and brazen Dolly. Subsequently he appears in Southwark, as a widower and a curate—"translated." Now curates are doubtless necessary; but there is no need to dwell upon them. But Quintin was quite an exceptional curate, and filled his church on week days. Marjory, the jilted, though the daughter of a squire—a peculiarly silly squire—came up continually to town to sit under him. She met him clandestinely in disused churchyards, and visited him at his rooms because she thought she could help him in his extremity. For the curate had a sin on his conscience which I will not divulge. All the same "Mary the shrewd" saw through it. "She may be in love on the high and spiritual plane" said Mary, "but in love she is, and with Quintin Garstin." And she was. So also were several other girls, but on the strictly high and spiritual plane. They took rooms in the house which contained the curate. One night the curate could not sleep for remorse—at what I will not tell you.

"The young daily governess in the room underneath was much disturbed by the curate's footsteps—they awed her. She said to herself, 'He is thinking out one of those wonderful sermons.' It occurred to her that she might help him by prayer. At this time in his career those who looked at Garstin felt that the one thing they could do for him was to pray—to pray that he might be made more of an Evangelist than he was already. The girl slipped out of bed in her white nightdress, and kneeling on the floor, clasped her hands, and prayed to God to help him.

'Dear God, make him preach even more wonderfully,' she prayed. 'Dear God, make him pierce beneath all the darkness and defilements of our hearts, until he reaches our naked souls and rouses them to come to Thee. Help him, Lord, help him mightily.'

She prayed as she had never prayed before, and instinctively the wave of prayer must have risen through the ceiling—"

Well, well—Mrs. Meade should surely know her public and its requirements. I cannot tell you, if I would, what was the subsequent history of the curate; only from a hurried glance forward I have hopes that he is safely buried. I found just one spice of devilry in the story, when two young ladies went on a jaunt to town to hear the curate preach, pretending all the time that they were going to Exeter Hall. But I am no enemy of rational enjoyment, so let that pass. The Way of a Woman is quite the sort of book to buy and give away as a birthday present to any girl who was born just fifteen years ago. It wouldn't hurt a niece.

SHERLOCK HOLMES.

A BELATED CRITICISM.

"My point is that the character, the theories, the position, and the methods, always, and the incidents and phrases often, which have made Sherlock Holmes a household word, are taken directly from Dupin and from Lecoq." This is the clinching sentence of a four-column article on Dr. Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes series of stories, with which Mr. Robert Blatchford has just surprised the readers of the Clarion. Mr. Blatchford, like the rest of us, heartily enjoyed Dr. Doyle's stories when they appeared in the Strand Magazine; but he had his own opinion about Holmes as compared with such detectives as Poe's Dupin or Gaboriau's Lecoq. It will be remembered that Dr. Doyle had his too. In A Study in Scarlet he makes Sherlock Holmes say:

"No doubt you think that you are complimenting me in comparing me to Dupin. Now, in my opinion, Dupin was a very inferior fellow. . . . He had some analytical genius, no doubt; but he was by no means such a phenomenon as Poe appeared to imagine.

Lecoq was a miserable bungler; he had only one thing to recommend him, and that was his energy. That book made me positively ill. The question was how to identify an unknown prisoner. I could have done it in twenty-four hours. Lecoq took six months or so. It might be made a text-book for detectives to teach them what to avoid."

It is clear that this passage has rankled in Mr. Blatchford's mind; indeed, he admits it, and when an attack of influenza suddenly widened his leisure, he began to look into the matter. With this result: "Let us see," says Mr. Blatchford, "how far Mr. Sherlock Holmes's contempt for his masters is justified by the facts"; and he proceeds to give an example of the work of that "very inferior fellow," Dupin:

"A girl was murdered near New York. The case created a great sensation, all the leading papers suggested theories of the crime, and the police were completely baffled.

Then Edgar Allan Poe wrote a story called The Mystery of Marie Roget, in which he set his imaginary detective, Dupin, to work to explain how the murder had been committed. Poe wrote at a distance from the scene of the crime, and with no other data than those found in the Press. He kept closely to the facts of the murder, changing only the names of places and persons, and he made Dupin unravel the whole mystery by a process of pure inductive reason.

Some years afterwards two persons at different places and at different times confessed, and in their confessions confirmed in full 'not only the general conclusion, but absolutely all the chief hypothetical details by which that conclusion was attained.'

That is to say, that Dupin, the trifier, the 'inferior fellow,' actually applied to a real case the methods supposed to be peculiar to Sherlock Holmes, and discovered not only the murderer but all the steps taken in the perpetration of the crime.

Should we be justified now in calling Sherlock Holmes a trifier or an inferior fellow if in one of Conan Doyle's stories he had actually explained, and truly explained, all the mystery of the crimes of Jack the Ripper?"

Mr. Blatchford, who is evidently extremely well versed in Poe and Gaboriau, goes on to give extracts and instances tending to show that Sherlock Holmes's methods of criminal investigation have been anticipated by these writers. The following passage will show Mr. Blatchford's line of criticism:

"Dr. Doyle's second book, The Sign of Four, absorbs a good deal of Poe's Murders in the Rue Morgue.

Thus, in Poe's tale the murders are done by an ape, which has escaped from a sailor. In Conan Doyle's tale the murder is done by a small savage from the Andaman Isles, who is with a sailor. In both cases the murder is done against the sailor's wish. In the one case Dupin deduces the ape from a handprint, in the other Holmes deduces the savage from a footprint.

'I wish you particularly to notice these footmarks,' he said; 'do you observe anything noteworthy about them?'

SELECTED NOVELS

MARIE CORELLI'S ROMANCES.

Uniform Edition, 6s. each.

A ROMANCE OF TWO WORLDS.

VENDETTA.

THELMA.

ARDATH.

THE SOUL OF LILITH.

WORMWOOD.

BARABBAS.

THE SORROWS OF SATAN.

FOUR NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

THE MUTABLE MANY. Robert Barr.

THE PLATTNER STORY. H. G. Wells.

THE WHITE HECATOMB. W. O. Scully.

BY STROKE OF SWORD. Andrew Balfour.

Messrs. METHUEN'S CATALOGUE and BOOK GAZETTE sent to any Address.

METHUEN & CO., 36, ESSEX STREET, W.C.

A NEW AMERICAN NOVEL.

TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND COPIES HAVE ALREADY BEEN
SOLD IN AMERICA.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN.

The SPEAKER says: "We trust that there are few who read it who will fail to regard its perusal as one of the new pleasures of their lives. . . . One of those rare stories which make a direct appeal alike to the taste and the feelings of most men and women, and which afford a gratification that is far greater than that of mere critical approval. It is, in plain English, a beautiful book—beautiful in language and in sentiment, in design and in execution. Its chief merit lies in the fact that Mr. Allen has grasped the true spirit of historical romance, and has shown how fully he understands both the links which unite, and the time-spaces which divide, the different generations of man."

The ACADEMY says: "Mr. Allen's narrative skill is but one of the many qualities of a ripe, vigorous, and sympathetic nature. 'The Choir Invisible' is a fine achievement."

The SATURDAY REVIEW says: "Mr. James Lane Allen is a writer who cannot well put pen to paper without revealing how finely sensitive he is to beauty."

The BOOKMAN says: "The main interest is not the revival of old times, but a love-story which might be of to-day, or any day—a story which reminds one very pleasantly of Harry Esmond and Lady Castlewood."

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "Mr. Allen's power of character-drawing invests the old, old story with renewed and absorbing interest. . . . The fascination of the story lies in great part in Mr. Allen's graceful and vivid style. His beautiful vignettes of forest scenery and the real thoughtfulness of his dialogue raise his story out of the ruck of the commonplace."

The ATLANTIC MONTHLY says: "We think he will be a novelist, perhaps even a great novelist—one of the few who hold large powers of divers sort in solution to be precipitated in some new, unexpected form."

MACMILLAN & CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

'They belong,' I said, 'to a child or a small woman.'
'Apart from their size, though, is there nothing else?'

'They appear to be much as other footmarks.'
'Not at all. Look here! This is the print of a right foot in the dust. Now I make one with my naked foot beside it. What is the chief difference?'

'Your toes are all cramped together. The other print has each toe distinctly divided.'

Now compare Dupin and his hand-print:

"You will perceive," continued my friend, spreading out the paper upon the table before us, 'that this drawing gives the idea of a firm and fixed hold. There is no slipping apparent. Each finger has retained—possibly until the death of the victim—the fearful grasp by which it originally imbedded itself. Attempt now to place all your fingers, at the same time, in the respective impressions as you see them.'

I made the attempt in vain.

'We are possibly not giving this matter a fair trial,' he said. 'The paper's spread out upon a plain surface; but the human throat is cylindrical. Here is a billet of wood, the circumference of which is about that of the throat. Wrap the drawing round it and try the experiment again.'

I did so, but the difficulty was even more obvious than before. 'This,' I said, 'is the mark of no human hand.'

But the resemblance between the methods of Holmes and those of the 'very inferior fellow,' Dupin, does not end there, for in the Rue Morgue Dupin takes up a volume of Cuvier, and shows his friend an account of a large and fierce orang-outang, with special allusion to his hands, and in The Sign of Four Holmes shows Watson in an encyclopædia an account of the savage races of the Andaman Islands, with special allusion to their feet. See Sign of Four, pp. 158-9, and Rue Morgue, pp. 213-14.

'In The Sign of Four the description of the sailor, Jonathan Small, is very like the description of the Maltese sailor in The Rue Morgue. In The Sign of Four Holmes says:

'I argued that the launch must be no great way off in spite of its invisibility. I then put myself in the place of Small, and looked at it as a man of his capacity would.'

Compare the words in italics with Poe's statement in The Purloined Letter.

'Now this mode of reasoning in the schoolboy, whom his fellows termed "lucky," what, in its last analysis, is it?'

'It is merely,' said I, 'an identification of the reasoner's intellect with that of his opponent.'

One cannot read A Scandal in Bohemia and The Purloined Letter together without being struck by the analogy. In one story the thing to be recovered is a letter stolen from the Queen of France. In the other it is a portrait given to a lady by the King of Bohemia. In both cases the detective enters the room of the person holding the desired object; in both cases an emeute is organised by the detective outside the house. In both cases the method of attack and the process of thought employed are identical.

Let anyone with a good knowledge of Sherlock Holmes study the three stories by Poe, and he cannot fail to perceive the indebtedness of Conan Doyle to the American author."

It must not be supposed that Mr. Blatchford is not an admirer and a great admirer, of Dr. Conan Doyle's most famous creation

After examining many other instances of Mr. Sherlock Holmes's feats of detection, and finding in them, as he thinks, traces of indebtedness to the creators of the heroes of Poe's and Gaboriau's stories, Mr. Blatchford says:

"Is there, then, nothing new in the new detective? There is. One of the most fascinating and ingenious characteristics of Sherlock Holmes is his faculty for reading the men and women he meets as though they were books. His deductions from a soiled hat, a scratched watch, a splashed trouser, or a scarred hand, are peculiar to him, and always come upon the reader as a surprise. Mycroft Holmes, also, is a fine character, and I, for one, wish that Dr. Doyle would give us more of him. . . . Dr. Doyle is more 'readable' than Gaboriau or Edgar Allan Poe. His language is simpler, his stories are shorter, his mode of telling is clearer; he uses short sentences, and he judiciously waters down Poe's abstruse philosophy, and avoids Gaboriau's laboured sentiment. But, after all, he is only an industrious and skilful mechanic: Edgar Allan Poe was a genius and an inventor."

We do not know that the keenly scrutinising Sherlock Holmes has been so scrutinised before. But we fancy that the range of invention possible to a writer of detective stories is smaller than is commonly imagined.

The following Obstinate Case of Indigestion of Twenty Years' standing, with Pain after Food, Loss of Appetite, and Loss of Flesh, was completely cured by Guy's Tonic!

"53, Caledonian Street, Leeds.

"I have pleasure in stating the following facts with regard to the great benefit my wife has received from a course of Guy's Tonic.

"I have been married twenty years, and for the greater part of that time she has suffered from Indigestion, and has not been able to eat any other flesh meat except mutton, and that only sparingly. She has tried all sorts of medicines without any lasting results, and one of the leading Doctors in this City told her she would always be Dyspeptic.

"Her Appetite failed her, and she began to lose flesh. I came across one of your Advertisements in which a similar case was mentioned, and I sent out and got a bottle of Guy's Tonic; I then got another, and now have the satisfaction of saying that Guy's Tonic put her all right; and her appetite is such that she can eat a dry crust with relish.

"I think Guy's Tonic only wants to become more widely known to be highly appreciated by all who suffer from Indigestion and kindred Ailments.

"B. W. HORSMAN."

All Chemists and Stores sell Guy's Tonic.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's
SWISS
MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 1897.

No. 1317, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Office: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

THE most interesting arrival of the week is Prof. James Sully's Children's Ways. This is a volume of selections from the author's Studies of Childhood, with additional matter. Prof. Sully explains the book in a short preface, which we quote entire:

"The kindly welcome accorded by the Press to my volume, Studies of Childhood, has suggested to me that there was much in it which might be made attractive to a wider class of readers than that addressed in a psychological work. I have, accordingly, prepared the following selections, cutting out abstruse discussions, dropping as far as possible technical language, and adapting the style to the requirements of the general reader. In order to shorten the work the last two chapters—'Extracts from a Father's Diary' and 'George Sand's Childhood'—have been omitted. The order of treatment has been altered somewhat, and a number of stories has been added. I hope that the result may succeed in recommending what has long been to myself one of the most delightful of subjects to many who would not be disposed to read a larger and more difficult work, and to draw on a few of these, at least, to a closer and more serious inspection of it."

It is curious to be reminded, in these days, when the Empire, as an idea, looms so large in the national mind, of the existence of the Regalia. Mr. Cyril Davenport has produced a handsomely illustrated folio on these royal insignia. By permission of Her Majesty he was allowed to photograph the Regalia out of their cases; as a matter of fact, Mr. Davenport took with him to the Tower an experienced photographer, and in the presence of two successive keepers of the Regalia, General Sir Michael A. S. Biddulph and Lieut.-General Sir Frederick D. Middleton, Mr. Davenport secured the best photographs he could, and the negatives were afterwards worked upon and produced in the correct colours as illustrations to this work. Five hundred copies of the volume have been printed.

To the first volume of "The Library Series," The Free Library: its History and Present Condition, by John J. Ogle, Dr. Richard Garnett contributes a Preface in which he entitles our age the Age of the Books:

"Not merely that there never before were so many books in the world, or that there never was a time when books and newspapers were so widely read—so influential; but that there never before was so much interest and curiosity respecting the makers of books, authors—the emitters of books, publishers—or the custodians of books, librarians. This curiosity, frequently frivolous and annoying, bears testimony, at all events, to the place which literature has taken not merely in fact, but in general apprehension, among the agencies which mould the world. She always has had this place in effect ever since hieroglyphical writing passed into alphabetical; but the man of the world has been singularly unconscious of the agency by which its course was in large measure determined. Alexander has been conspicuous, Aristotle has been overlooked. Now the attention paid to authorship in all its forms shows that mankind has become aware that its destinies may be much affected by what some unknown young man is at the present moment scribbling in a garret."

It is, indeed, remarkable to think how differently the garret of a young author is regarded now as compared with a hundred years ago.

Mr. Ogle's work is concerned with the History of the Free Library Movement, which he divides into three periods; and in a second section he gives brief histories of typical libraries in London, and in provincial towns in the order of their size. The series, of which this is the opening volume, is published by Mr. George Allen, and will include books on Library Construction and Fittings, Library Administration, The Prices of Books, &c.

Opening Sir Edward J. Poynter's, P.R.A., Lectures on Art we read in the Preface: "I come to-day from the 'varnishing day' of the Royal Academy Exhibition with a pleasant conviction that there is on all sides a more decided tendency towards a higher standard in art, both as regards treatment of subject and execution, than I have ever before noticed; and I have no hesitation in attributing this sudden improvement in the main to the stimulus given to us all by the election of our new President, and to the influence of the energy, thoroughness, and nobility of aim which he . . ." We rub our eyes, and discover that this refers not to Sir Edward himself, but to the late Lord Leighton. This is a fourth and enlarged edition of these Lectures. Sir Edward admits that in 1869 he generalised too sweepingly, and dogmatised too daringly, on some points. Concerning the position he assigned to Michael Angelo, Sir Edward Poynter writes in his Preface to the present edition:

"At that time I had recently been in Rome for a second visit after an interval of fourteen years, and was full of the transcendent grandeur of Michael Angelo's great work in the Sistine

Chapel; the appearance of Braun's splendid photographs immediately afterwards enabling me to study its exhaustive variety more in detail than is possible in the chapel itself, my enthusiasm found its expression in the lecture in question. In spite of the broader views and additional knowledge that come with years, that enthusiasm has in no way abated, and from what I then said I would take nothing, though I might add much; and indeed found occasion to do so in a lecture delivered later to the students of the Slade School (No. IX. of the series), and I believe that on this subject, and as impressing on young students the importance of studying the works of the great masters of the past, these lectures may still be helpful to them, in spite of, or rather, I should say, because of, the strange tendency of the day among a certain class of painters to neglect the study of form, in favour of so-called impressions, hastily, and more or less dexterously, thrown on canvas. How much of this is due to a belief that the technique of the brush or palette-knife is the sole end of art, and how much to the convenience of shirking the labour and difficulties of the study of form, would be thought, no doubt, invidious to inquire; but it is a question not altogether irrelevant, though beyond the limits of this brief introduction.

The "Eversley" series continues to gather to itself some of the choicest of modern books. It may be remarked, not for the first time of course, that the format of this series is one of the best that has been produced of late years. The latest addition is Mr. Green's The Making of England, in two volumes. It is printed with the original Preface. In the same series the eighth, and final, volume of Mr. William Knight's definitive edition of Wordsworth's Poetical Works is to hand. It contains English and American bibliographies. We are glad to see that Mr. Knight prints in his Prefatory Note to this volume the interesting communication which appeared in the ACADEMY of January 2 this year from Dr. Garnett. It will be remembered that Dr. Garnett sent us a transcription of a sonnet on Vasco de Gama, which turned up at Messrs. Sotheby's, and which he declared to be "undoubtedly in Wordsworth's hand."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

DE INCARNATIONIS VERBI DEI. By Very Rev. E. A. Hoffman. Riggs' Printing & Publishing Co. (Albany, N.Y.).

A MODERN'S RELIGION. By Ignotus. Henry & Co., Ltd. 1s. STATUTES OF LINCOLN CATHEDRAL. Arranged by the late Henry Bradshaw. Part II. Cambridge University Press.

THE LESSONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. Illustrated by Thoughts in Verse. Compiled by the late Rev. J. H. Wanklyn, M.A. Vol. III. Bemrose & Sons.

BIOGRAPHY AND HISTORY.

HANNIBAL AND THE CRISIS OF THE STRUGGLE BETWEEN CARTHAGE AND ROME. By William O'Connor Morris. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s.

THE LIVES OF THE SAINTS. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould. New edition. Vol. V. John C. Nimmo. 5s.

AMERICAN HISTORY TOLD BY CONTEMPORARIES. Vol. I.: ERA OF COLONISATION, 1492-1689. Edited by Albert Bushnell Hart. The Macmillan Co. (New York).

THE MAKING OF ENGLAND. By John Richard Green. New "Eversley Edition." 2 vols. Macmillan & Co. 10s.

OLD LUDGINGS OF STIRLING. By J. S. Fleming, F.S.A. Ennes Mackay (Stirling). 7s. 6d.

ART, DRAMA, BELLES LETTRES.

LECTURES ON ART. By Sir Edward J. Poynter, P.R.A. Fourth and enlarged edition. Chapman & Hall.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. Vol. VIII. of "Eversley Edition." Edited by William Knight. Macmillan & Co. 5s.

THE DOME. Unicorn Press. 1s.
 CHILDREN'S WAYS. By James Sully, M.A. Longmans, Green & Co.
 A LONDON COMEDY, AND OTHER VANITIES. By Egan Mew. Illustrated by Maurice Greiffenhagen. George Redway.

SCIENCE.

THEORY OF ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM. By Charles Emerson Curry, Ph.D. Macmillan & Co. 8s. 6d.

FICTION.

ALL SORTS AND CONDITIONS OF MEN. By Walter Besant. Chatto & Windus. 6d.
 KALISTRATUS. By A. H. Giles. Longmans & Co. 6s.
 A BRIDE'S MADNESS. By Allen Upward. Arrowsmith. 3s. 6d.
 SWEET SCENTED GRASS. By Neville Marion. Digby, Long. 1s.
 SMALL CONCERNS. By Frances England. Digby, Long. 1s.
 SPORTING ADVENTURES. By Monsieur Lolotte. Digby, Long. 1s.
 THE MASTER OF HULLINGHAM MANOR. By Bernard Wentworth. Digby, Long. 1s.
 THE PIRATE AND THE THREE CUTTERS. By Captain Martynat. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
 THE FASCINATION OF THE KING. By Guy Boothby. Ward, Lock & Co.
 A DAY WITH THE HOUNDS. By "Covertside." Western Mail, Ltd.

NATURAL HISTORY.

THE RAMBLER'S LIBRARY: NATURE-CHAT. By Edward A. Martin. R. E. Taylor & Son. 1s.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

RAMBLES ROUND LONDON—SERIES XVI: OVER THE NORTHERN HEIGHTS. Part II. By Alf. Holliday. R. E. Taylor & Son. 6d.
 PICTORIAL AND DESCRIPTIVE GUIDE TO HARROGATE. Ward, Lock & Co., Ltd. 1s.
 THE GEOGRAPHICAL JOURNAL. Vol. IX.: January to June, 1897. Edward Stanford.
 FRANZENSBAD: AN AUSTRIAN HEALTH RESORT. With illustrations. Ballière, Tindall & Cox.

MEDICINE, &amp;c.

A SYSTEM OF MEDICINE. By many Writers. Vol. III. Edited by Thomas Clifford Allbutt. Macmillan & Co. 25s.
 CONVERGENT STRABISMUS AND ITS TREATMENT. By Edwin Holthouse, M.A. J. & A. Churchill. 6s.

EDUCATIONAL.

ORGANIC CHEMICAL MANIPULATION. By J. T. Hewitt, M.A., D.Sc. Whitaker & Co. 7s. 6d.
 L'AIDE DE CAMP MARBOT: SELECTIONS FROM THE MÉMOIRES DU GÉNÉRAL BARON DE MARBOT. Edited, with Notes, by Granville Sharp, M.A. Longmans, Green & Co. 2s. 6d.
 RIFON GRAMMAR SCHOOL: THE FOUNDATION CHARTER OF 1555. Edited and translated by C. C. Swinton Bland, M.A. William Harrison (Ripon).
 PSYCHOLOGY: AN INTRODUCTORY MANUAL FOR THE USE OF STUDENTS. By F. Ryland, M.A. Seventh edition. George Bell & Sons. 4s. 6d.
 FIRST BOOK OF WRITING ENGLISH. By Edwin Herbert Lewis, Ph.D. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.
 ELEMENTARY CLASSICS: SELECTIONS FROM THE ANECDOTES OF VALERIUS MAXIMUS. Edited by Charles Henry Ward, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 1s. 6d.
 BLACK'S SCHOOL SHAKESPEARE: A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. Edited by L. W. Lyde, M.A. A. & C. Black.

FOREIGN.

EN CONGÉ: ÉGYPTE, CHYLAN, SUD DE L'INDE. Par Georges Noblemaire. Librairie Hachette et Cie.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE ENGLISH REGALIA. By Cyril Davenport, F.S.A. Kegan Paul. 21s.
 SOUVENIR OF MADAME SANS-GÈNE. Presented at the Lyceum Theatre by Henry Irving. 1s.
 NOTES ON THE PAINTED GLASS IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL. With a Preface by the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D. Aberdeen University Press.
 THE ART AND PASTIME OF CYCLING. By R. J. Mccredy and A. J. Wilson. Fourth edition. Archibald Constable & Co. 1s.
 THE FREE LIBRARY: ITS HISTORY AND PRESENT CONDITION. By John J. Ogle. George Allen. 6s.
 ON PAINTING IN WATER-COLOURS. By Hume Nisbet. Reeves & Sons.
 THE THEORY OF CREDIT. By Henry Dunning Macleod, M.A. Longmans, Green & Co. 10s.

NOTES AND NEWS.

WE had thought that the rhyming chronicler was a character of the past. But he survives in Mr. George Norman Hester, who, as we learn from a contemporary, claims to have based his recently published Annals of England upon the "Annales" of Ennius. No doubt rhyme is to facts what jam is to a crust, but we are sorry for children who will carry with them through life such a couplet as:

"Caxton from Flanders brought the press,
 And printing slew the fair MS.";

or whose tender minds are burdened with such shake-down criticism as this:

"Wordsworth hymned Nature. His retreat
 By Coleridge's song was made more sweet.
 Lander had Roman eloquence,
 And Southey ease and eloquence;
 Lamb was felicitous and quaint,
 And Hazlitt's style beyond attainment.
 Utilitarian Bentham taught
 That happiness was to be sought."

Such judgments cannot profitably be imparted to the young in any shape; but to impart them in these jingles is to lay a kind of "Punch, brothers, punch," curse on their future reading.

THE sale of Arab horses at Crabbet Park on Saturday afternoon saw quite a gathering of literary men, women, and ghosts. The host himself, Mr. Wilfrid Blunt, is a poet, the several editions of whose Love Sonnets of Proteus bear witness to its popularity. Then the ghost of Lord Byron could be nowhere on earth if not at Crabbet, where his granddaughter, Lady Anne Blunt, was hostess, and where all his descendants of the fourth generation were gathered—to wit, Miss Judith Blunt, the daughter of the house, and her cousin, Lady Mary Milbanke. The ghosts of Bulwer and of "Owen Meredith" were gathered up in the son of one and the grandson of the other, the present young Earl of Lytton. Mr. Evelyn, of Wotton, was there to be reminded by Mr. Blunt that his ancestor of the Diary had said something to disparage the Arab. The presence of another gentleman at once suggested the Hon. Mrs. Norton, whose verses, "My beautiful, my beautiful, who standest meekly by," ingratiated the Arab with our grandmothers. Other names recalled other memories of authors dead and gone. It was a great Pedigree occasion all round. Nor were living men and women of letters unrepresented where Mr. Lecky, Mrs. Meynell, and Sir Edwin Arnold kept the host company.

THE title of Mr. Grant Allen's forthcoming volume of researches into the origin of religion—its sub-title, by the way—is not The Evolution of God, but The Evolution of the Idea of God, although it is true that the first title was originally contemplated. This is a work on which Mr. Allen has been engaged, on and off, ever since he left Oxford, some twenty-five years ago. It will be published simultaneously in England and America by Mr. Grant Richards and Messrs. Henry Holt & Co.

APROPOS of the eightieth anniversary of the death of Jane Austen, it may be mentioned that the house in Winchester Close in which she died is still standing. It is quite a small house, and bears an inscription to this effect: "This is the house in which Jane Austen spent the latter days of her life, and died July 24, 1817." The house is inhabited.

THE Chap Book has taken to statistics rather amusingly. It finds that out of twenty-six writers in the current Yellow Book eleven are women, ten men, and five unclassified or unsexed. Starting with this discovery, our contemporary becomes philosophic concerning the progress of women in the Victorian age. Sixty years ago, it says, women seldom wrote for the magazines. This is not strictly accurate if we consider the old albums among the magazines. Women (male and female) contributed the bulk of their contents. Lady Blessington set the fashion, and in her train came Mrs. Gore, Mrs. S. C. Hall, and a number of others whose names are unimportant. This is, however, a digression: the Chap Book's statistics hold the field.

AN inspection of the contents of the Yellow Book enables the Chap Book to arrange the data in convenient form for the use of the student. So:

	Number of Articles.	Prose.	Poetry.
Male . . . .	10	5	5
Female . . . .	11	8	3
Unclassified . .	5	1	4

"Thus," says the Chap Book, "it will be seen that, left freely to choose their medium of expression, only about 27 per cent. of the ladies select verse, while of the men exactly 50 per cent., and of the necessarily unclassified 80 per cent. 'lisp,' as the poet says, 'in numbers.'" Making further analysis of the woman's work, we find that the prose is divided as follows: Fiction, 6; prose pastels, 2. In 50 per cent. of the tales death plays an important part. There is one death by heart disease, one by shock and hemorrhage from a bullet-wound, and one by grief. In only 16.6 per cent. of the fiction is marriage indicated." The result of this inquiry is the conviction that the Yellow Book goes far to remove the stain put upon the fair name of England by the surly Senate of Cambridge.

THE new Logia discovered by Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt are having a very mixed reception. The Spectator has been impelled to point out "the danger of false 'sayings of Christ,'" while Dr. Martineau wonders at the importance attached to them. Concerning Messrs. Grenfell and Hunt's pamphlet Dr. Martineau writes:

"It is highly interesting, not, indeed, as adding anything historical to such knowledge of the personal teaching of Jesus as we gather from the synoptical Gospels, but as confirming the most probable judgment previously formed respecting the popular traditional materials out of which those Gospels were brought into their present form. The date assigned by the editors to the papyri now published is too late to have any testimonial value. The text attests only the current conceptions of the Church in the latter half of the second century. It is well to enlarge our knowledge of this by ever so little; but it is a gain simply ecclesiastical, not religious."

It has been pointed out that Mr. Kipling's much-discussed "Recessional" is not the only hymn he has written. There is his "Hymn before Action":

"The earth is full of anger,
The sky is dark with wrath,
The nations in their harness
Come up upon our path.
Before we rank the legions,
Before we draw the blade,
Jehovah of the Thunders,
Lord God of Battles, aid."

WHAT daily papers, we wonder, does Mr. Birrell patronise? In his remarks at Lincoln's Inn Hall, on Saturday last, he confessed his disgust at accounts he read in the Press as to "how a woman wrote her novel, how many years of solemn thought she had devoted to a twopenny-halfpenny tale which ten years hence no one would read, how this and that character was revealed—that, he thought, was vulgarising literature. The aptest answer we have seen to Mr. Birrell's indictment "that the pretensions of our daily Press are ridiculously high, are extravagantly increasing, and ought to be forthwith abated" was in the St. James's Gazette. Said our contemporary: "That Mr. Birrell's pleasantries are painfully feeble, are steadily growing weaker, and ought to be treated with a strong tonic is clear from his attack on the Press on Saturday. He described the newspapers as 'commercial concerns trading in news.' No journalist need object to the definition. But what about second-rate politicians? Are they not advertising individuals trading in views? And what would become of them if they were not reported by the Press?"

THE Providence that watches over book-hunters is the subject of an article in the current number of Chambers's Journal. The article itself has an interesting history, for it was written thirty years ago, and the facts it contains were communicated to the writer by the father of Robert Browning. Out of the many instances of wonderful "finds" given, we select two:

"A work on astrology, believed to be unique, without title-page, but bearing date 1473, and consequently one of the earliest specimens of printing extant, having been brought out twenty years after the discovery of the art, exquisitely printed, with all the capital letters put in by hand, some of them being done in gold and others in colour—was picked up at a London bookstall for fifteen-pence."

Such a "find" is inconceivable nowadays, when the tendency of people ignorant of books is to over-value, not to under-value, any volume that has a quaint appearance.

ANOTHER anecdote, a most remarkable one, is this:

"A London book-hunter of the last generation gave to his son, as the 'nest-egg' of his future library, a translation of The Life and Character of Theophrastus, minus the title-page, but attributed to Coleman. On giving this book to his son, the father wrote his name on the flyleaf. A few years afterwards the son, accompanied by his beloved books, went to Jamaica, where the translation in question was borrowed of him by a military officer on service in that colony. This officer, being unexpectedly transferred with his regiment to another colony, quitted Jamaica very suddenly, inadvertently taking with him the borrowed translation; a circumstance which caused great annoyance and regret to its owner, who prized it very highly as being the gift of his father and containing that parent's handwriting. He made various attempts to learn the whereabouts of the officer who had so carelessly carried off the treasured volume, but could never obtain any tidings of him, and at length relinquished the effort, and gave up the book for lost. Five-and-twenty years afterwards the book-hunter, having returned to London, was one day strolling along the Old Kent-road, and peering about him as usual, when he came to the shop of a dealer in old iron, near the then existent turnpike-gate which formerly stood nearly opposite the burial-ground. As he glanced into the dingy depths of this shop he suddenly espied his lost translation, stowed away upon a shelf. Hastily entering the shop, he bought back his missing treasure for the sum of sixpence, which the man of iron seemed to think himself very lucky in getting in exchange for it. The presence of his father's handwriting on the flyleaf was still as legible as ever, and rendered it certain that the volume, so strangely recovered, was the identical one the loss of which he had so long deplored."

THE least needed and least interesting of the City churches are being slowly weeded out. St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, is, we are told, "threatened with extinction." We presume that this means the extinction of its services, and not the demolition of the church itself. We believe that of all the sixty-four City churches only nine are considered by antiquarians as uninteresting enough to be sacrificed. St. Mary's, Aldermanbury, cannot be one of these, for it was built by Wren, and in it were buried Henry Condell and John Heminge, the editors of the first folio of Shakespeare's plays.

THE eighth summer meeting of University Extension students begins with a lecture by the Bishop of Ripon, on the "Romantic Revival in English Literature." This inaugural lecture also fitly introduces the main course of this year's studies—namely, the History, Literature, Art, and Philosophy of the Revolutionary Epoch, 1789—1848, in which course over eighty lectures will be delivered. The chief of these are a series of twelve on the "French Revolution and the Age of Napoleon," which will be conducted mainly by younger men. Prof. Dicey lectures on the "English Constitution under George III." Mr. Leonard Courtney on "Canning," the Rev. W. H. Hutton on "Wellesley's Rule in India," and Mr. C. R. Beazley on "European Explorers in Africa, 1789—1815." In Literature the chief lecturers are Mr. Arthur Sidgwick, Mr. Birrell, Canon Gore, Mr. F. S. Boas, Prof. R. S. Moulton, Dr. Caird, and Dr. Bonnier, of Paris; in the History and Theory of Education Mr. Churton Collins, Mr. H. J. Mackinder, and Mr. M. E. Sadler; in the English Language

Dr. Henry Sweet; and in Natural Science Mr. J. E. Marsh, Mr. P. Elford, and Mr. P. Groom. Canon Scott Holland will speak on four occasions on St. John's Gospel; and Prof. W. R. Sorley will give six lectures on the "Theory of Virtue and the Virtues." This enumeration gives but a few of the names and subjects of study; there is work for students in all departments of research, and each year sees an increase in facilities afforded and completeness of organisation. The meeting lasts until August 25, when general interest will be turning towards the programme of the British Association.

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS have included All Sorts and Conditions of Men in their sixpenny re-issues of popular novels. We have many novels with a purpose; Sir Walter Besant's story may be called a novel with a result. Referring to the social ideas developed in his story, Sir Walter writes in the new Preface which he supplies to this edition: "I do not claim originality for any of these ideas. The novelist is never, I believe, original: he looks abroad, he observes, he receives, he reflects. That novelist becomes most popular who is best able to catch and to represent the ideas of the day, the forces acting on the present. I think that this story did so present the ideas of the day."

MR. HALL CAINE's novel, The Christian, will be published on August 9, exactly three years after his last book, The Manxman. The first edition, in six-shilling form, will consist of 50,000 copies, exclusive of America and the Colonies. It is believed this is the largest number ever printed in one edition of a novel published at this price.

The Genealogical Magazine for August will contain articles on "The Queen's Irish Ancestors"; "The Earldom of Selkirk"; "The Ancient Commoner Family of Strode"; and "The Pedigree of Shakespeare."

MR. JAMES LANE ALLEN's The Choir Invisible has achieved a striking success among his own countrymen. The last accounts from America are to the effect that upwards of twenty thousand copies have been sold.

MESSRS. METHUEN will publish in a few days With the Greeks in Thessaly, by Mr. W. Kinnaird Rose, who acted as Reuter's correspondent with the Greek Army. The book is illustrated with twenty-four sketches by Mr. Maud, of the Graphic, and it has, moreover, several maps and plans.

MRS. F. A. STEEL will contribute to the August number of Cosmopolis a complete story, entitled "Fire and Ice," and M. Pierre Loti a study of a jeune fille, entitled "Le Mur d'en Face."

IN the letter which we printed last week from "Cobdenite" on the book discount question the date of Cobden's speech from which the writer quoted was given as February 8, 1884. This was obviously a misprint for 1844.

AUTHORS AND A PUBLISHER.

THE sex problem is almost impossible of solution in such a signature as "K. Douglas King." So it happened that when The Scripture Reader of St. Mark's appeared last year (after being summarily refused by one eminent publisher, on the ground that his firm never published works of theology!) critics differed, as critics will, even about the masculine or feminine prefix to the name of the writer of the novel. Some said "Miss" K. Douglas King, and some said "Mr." The character of the book, in which there was nothing womanish, though nothing unwomanly, perhaps favoured the Mr., which has been repeated by many reviewers of Father Hilarion during the past month. For all that, it is a mythic Mr. Miss Katharine Douglas King takes her Katherine Douglas from the lady of history and of Rossetti's ballad:

"I, Katherine, am a Douglas born,
A name to all Scots dear;
And Kate Barlass they've called me now
Through many a waning year.
This old arm's withered now—'twas once
Most deft 'mong maidens all,
To rein the steed, to wing the shaft,
To smite the palm-play ball.
In hall adown the close-linked dance
It has shown most white and fair;
It has been the rest of a true lord's head.
And many a sweet babe's nursing-bed,
And the bar to a king's chambre."

The lady who bolted with her arm the door against murderers of James the First of Scotland was an ancestress of the young novelist, on her mother's side; but she does not need to go back beyond her own parents to illustrate her lineage. She is, in fact, the bearer of a name that both her parents have made familiar; for her father was the founder of the publishing house of Henry S. King & Co., and her mother is therefore Mrs. Hamilton King, whose "Disciples" and other poems have passed through many editions.

The firm of Indian bankers and agents, Henry S. King & Co., of Pall Mall and Cornhill, is carried on by the eldest son of Mr. Henry S. King, Sir Seymour King, M.P. The recreations of eminent men are now registered in biographical dictionaries, and they cover a wide field. But Mr. King is probably the only man who took to publishing as a distraction. First in conjunction with Mr. George Smith, now the head of the firm of Messrs. Smith & Elder, and then on his own account, he became the middleman between those two uncertain and difficult classes, the authors and the readers. He it was who gave Tennyson £4,000 a year for his copyrights, a generous arrangement which is said to have been an advantageous advertisement for a firm it did not otherwise reward. He it was who secured for his "reader" Mr. Kegan Paul, who subsequently arranged to carry on the business under his own name and that of Mr. Trench. That, however, takes us too far ahead. It was still in the "Henry S. King" days of the firm that a parcel of poetry—so we have heard the story—reached the office in Cornhill, very memorably for both the public and the publisher.

That parcel came from Miss Harriet E. Hamilton. Her father was an English Admiral, and her mother a sister of the Duke of Abercorn. It was the "Execution of Felice Orsini" that first stirred the girl's muse. The publisher sought out the poetess, and she became his wife—the problem of publisher and author had in that case a simple solution. "Aspromonte" was published in 1869, and was succeeded by "The Disciples," which passed quickly through ten editions. The Disciples were Mazzini and his friends, and the book was written "by command" of Mazzini, though it reached him in proof-sheet only in time to be laid not within his living hand, but at his dead feet:

"O book of mine which he commanded! Long Waited and worked for, and achieved too late.

Whose first leaves flying over seas, like flights
Of white doves loosened sweeping straight to home,

Were carried unto Pisa, and found there Mourning, and at the dead feet were laid low,

Instead of in the living master's hand;
One day too late, and so came short for all,
And missed the confirmation of his eyes."

The part of the book entitled "Ugo Bassi's Sermon" has been adjudged a popularity even beyond the rest, and has been reprinted as a tract for circulation in hospitals. It was the gospel of renunciation—nay, more: it was the preaching of the proud preference for pain—the ecstasy of agony:

"If any now were bidden rise and come
To either, would he pause to choose between
The rose-warm kisses of a waiting bride
In a shut silken chamber—or the thrill
Of the bared limbs, bound fast for martyrdom?"

Not Friar Ugo Bassi nor his friends! The part played by two English poetesses, Mrs. Hamilton King and Mrs. Browning, in the Young Italy movement can never be ignored. Mrs. Hamilton King's work, broad as it is in its passionate love for all human freedom, has every year its new admirers. And her admirers have included persons the most diverse—for instance, a Roman Cardinal was not likely to be among Mazzinians; yet Cardinal Manning, as those who knew him will remember, never lost an opportunity to praise these poems; and when, at the end of his life, he made the acquaintance of the poetess at the time of the Dockers' Strike, and received her into the Roman Catholic Church, he would not have her alter a line of what, with imperfect knowledge perhaps here and there, but with a perfect enthusiasm for humanity, she had written in her earlier years.

Of Mrs. Hamilton King's high qualities as a poet it is impossible to speak with any adequacy in an allusive article such as this; but a word must be snatched in homage for "The Shade of Chatterton," published in the volume entitled Ballads of the North, a volume otherwise remarkable for "The Haunted Czar." It is in reading such poems as these that one wonders if the world is quite aware of the treasury it possesses.

A POET OF THE NARROW SEAS.

THE sketch of Miss Ingelow's life and work which appeared in these columns last week may, perhaps, be supplemented. Miss Ingelow wrote beautiful and touching things about the sea. She was born near it, and she has told how her nurse, a sailor's widow, would talk of storms and wrecks. Her stories "gave me my first sense of tragedy, and connected it with the sea." This remark goes far to explain why the idea of death at sea haunts Miss Ingelow's poetry. But tragedy did not exclude the brighter side of seafaring life from the child's mind. For "when the tide came up in the river there were certain wooden wharves between it and the granaries. We could walk on them, and the sound of our steps and of the water washing against the piles on which they were built caused me a kind of ecstasy, especially when the sun shone, and the water could be seen glittering through the cracks in them."

The tragedy and the ecstasy of the sea, thus felt by the child on the Lincolnshire coast, were at last sung by the poet. Here, for example, is the ecstasy of the sea as a child feels it; we quote from "Gladys and Her Island":

"The sea
Was filled with light; in clear blue caverns curled
The breakers, and they ran, and seemed to romp,
As playing at some rough and dangerous game,
While all the nearer waves rushed in to help,
And all the farther heaved their heads to peep,
And tossed the fishing boats. Then Gladys laughed,
And said, 'O, happy tide, to be so lost
In sunshine, that one dare not look at it;
And lucky cliffs, to be so brown and warm;
And yet how lucky are the shadows, too,
That lurk between their ledges. It is strange,
That in remembrance though I lay them up,
They are for ever, when I come to them,
Better than I had thought. O, something yet
I had forgotten. Oft I say, 'At least
This picture is imprinted; thus and thus,
The sharpened serried jags run up, run out,
Layer on layer.' And I look—up—up—
High, higher up again, till far aloft
They cut into their æther—brown, and clear,
And perfect. And I, saying, 'This is mine
To keep,' retire; but shortly come again,
And they confound me with a glorious change.
The low sun out of rain-clouds stares at them;
They redden, and their edges drip with—what?
I know not, but 'tis red. It leaves no stain,
For the next morning they stand up like ghosts
In a sea-shroud, and fifty thousand mews
Sit there, in long white files, and chatter on,
Like silly school-girls in their silliest mood."

That is the child's sea-side mind. But it was the tragedy of the sea that came to Jean Ingelow first—so we judge by her narrative—and in her rendering of it she often rose to the height of her powers. Read the following description of a storm, put into the mouth of an old fisherman. The lines occur "In Brothers: a Sermon":

"There was a poor old man
Who sat and listened to the raging sea,
And heard it thunder, lunging at the cliffs
As like to tear them down. He lay at night;
And 'Lord have mercy on the lads,' said he,
That sailed at noon, though they be none of mine!

For when the gale gets up, and when the wind
Flings at the window, when it beats the roof,
And lulls, and stops, and rouses up again,
And cuts the crest clean off the plunging wave,
And scatters it like feathers up the field,
Why, then I think of my two lads: my lads
That would have worked and never let me want,
And never let me take the parish pay.
No, none of mine; my lads were drowned at sea—
My two—before the most of these were born.
I know how sharp that cuts, since my poor wife
Walked up and down, and still walked up and down,
And I walked after, and one could not hear
A word the other said, for wind and sea
That raged and beat and thundered in the night—
The awfulest, the longest, lightest night
That ever parents had to spend—a moon
That shone like daylight on the breaking wave.
Ah, me! and other men have lost their lads,
And other women wiped their poor dead mouths,
And got them home and dried them in the house,
And seen the driftwood lie along the coast,
That was a tidy boat but one day back,
And seen next tide the neighbours gather it
To lay it on their fires."

In "Sailing Beyond Seas" the lover's loss is expressed in a form that one thinks Miss Ingelow owed in part to Coleridge, whose albatross, also, she seems to have remembered when she wrote of "the great white bird" on the lighthouse in "Requiescat in Pace." Here the bird is a dove:

"Methought the stars were blinking bright,
And the old brig's sails unfurled;
I said, 'I will sail to my love this night
At the other side of the world.'
I stepped aboard—we sailed so fast—
The sun shot up from the bourne;
But a dove that perched upon the mast
Did mourn, and mourn, and mourn.
O fair! O fond dove!
And dove with the white breast,
Let me alone, the dream is my own,
And my heart is full of rest."

Truer in its substance is the lament of the mother in "Supper at the Mill," with its passionate stanza, beginning "O my lost love, and my own, own love," and its last stanza:

"We shall walk no more through the sodden plain
With the faded bents o'erspread,
We shall stand no more by the seething main
While the dark wrack drives o'erhead;
We shall part no more in the wind and the rain,
Where thy last farewell was said;
But perhaps I shall meet thee and know thee again
When the sea gives up her dead."

To conclude with the "ecstasy":

"For me the bounding in of tides; for me
The laying bare of sands when they retreat;
The purple flash of calms, the sparkling glee
When waves and sunshine meet."

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE gilded youth of Paris have no reason to love M. Henri Lavedan. He is their portrait-painter-in-ordinary, and no kind one at that. The measure of justice he deals them is ferocious. Les Jeunes is quite the most terrible pronouncement of modern cynicism literature can furnish: witty, light, amusing, but cruelly contemptuous. Are the young men, then, really such very dull and corrupted dogs? The method of M. Lavedan is broad and audacious. Brionze, Montois, and D'Allarège are sitting smoking in the twilight. They understand each other in silence. From time to time they alternatively drop a monosyllable which is a mere affirmation of their absence of thought.

"Brionze: 'Yes.' Montois: 'Yes' (puff, smoke-curl, roll of carriages, Paris hums). Montois: 'Ah; là, là!' D'Allarège: 'Yes, indeed.' Brionze: 'Whom do you say it to? (Blue smoke through the nose, ashes falling into the tray, and time goes by.) D'Allarège: 'And with all that what else?' Montois: 'Nothing much.' The nothingness of all that so overcomes Brionze that he exclaims: "'At times' (he stops). Montois: 'What?' Brionze: 'The idea of putting an end' (makes the gesture of the revolver). Montois: 'Don't do that.' D'Allarège: 'Doesn't improve matters.' Montois: 'You'd be sorry afterwards.' Brionze: 'Think so?' D'Allarège: 'Sure!' Brionze: 'In that case—' (silence; the cigars are finished). One sees the inane group, sees their cigars, feels the twilit silence about them, the depression, hears their broken, exhausted speech, and in the distance the lively roars of the city.

Another animated circle talk of women. Brionze describes his attachment to a corset-maker whom he visits once a week for a few minutes. La Hutte, stupefied by such a waste of time, exclaims: "'You are wild about women. I see that.' Brionze: 'What will you? One is young only for a while.' La Hutte: 'And how long has this continued?' Brionze: 'Augustine? Oh, it is an old affair. Six weeks, my child. It is coming to an end.' La Hutte: 'And have you had many of these violent passions?' Brionze: 'I can't count them.' Whereupon Planteau volunteers his livelier experiences. He reprimands the woman-hater, and adds: "One has a heart after all. One isn't quite a Redskin." He is continually in love, but he never sees the beloved again, once she responds to his passion. The seventy-seventh, a brunette of Melun, falls dead from heart-disease into his arms the first time she cries "I love you." "You wouldn't believe it," he says, "but it touched me a little—just a little, a queer impression, and then—a kind of regret. A fine girl too. Had she come to life again, 'pon my word, I felt I would have been capable—of actually seeing her a second time. A fancy, so! That affair has never since left my head. For at least fifteen days afterwards I felt I had had enough of little friends. That has passed. All the same, it is one of love's sadnesses.

Still, there is more good in it than one imagines. It ripens you like a melon. But let us talk of other things. What do you think of Crete?" La Hutte will not have anything to say to women, "it always ends badly." "But," says Planteau, "it begins so well." Mme. Chailun admits to her son that a certain friend pleases her. "That's enough," cries Pierre. "He pleases you. That's how it begins. And then, one fine day, you will displease him. That's how it ends." The mother reproves him, and he cries: "Ah, it is shocking and scandalous to hint such things to you, my mother, my sainted mother, since it is understood that all mothers are sainted." And Paul, lecturing his father, advises him to dispense with memories. "They are the dirty linen of life." At five years of age he had already left illusions behind him. At four he admits he placed his shoe on the chimney-piece on Christmas Eve, but at five he "smelt humbug," and was not to be taken in twice. His business is to avoid sentiment and emotion, laughter and tears, which he leaves to his naïve elders. He is a wise youth, and thus defines his generation: "At ten we want to be twenty. At twenty we pose for forty; and at forty we must have the Grand Ribbon of the Legion and a funeral at the expense of the State when we smash up, or else we sulk. 'All or nothing' is not our motto, but 'all, all at once,' or else—good evening. This accounts for our hatred of the old ones. Ah, no, we don't love the old ones"; and when the father asks him how it will be when they are old themselves, he replies: "We'll detest the young ones." His father he apostrophises as "a dynastic soul, a man of olden times, of the date of the pyramids." He admits he doesn't know where the generation is going—but that's a detail. They are going all the same, and they'll know where when they arrive. One always ends by arriving somewhere. Another delightful "Jeune" is the orderly rake. He takes a light lady out to dinner. She orders the traditional menu and scandalises him with her slang. He asks for three oysters, two eggs and spinach, a veal cutlet and syphon. His austerity no less stupefies her. "Where are we going afterwards?" she asks. "Nowhere. Only provincials and servants go to the theatre nowadays. The chic people, I mean the young people, go to bed at nine o'clock." June declares her loathing for "the young people," with their early hours, their diet, and their "d—d bi..cy..". She prefers "the old fellows," like her lover's father, who still ride. Musing over his father's primitive tastes, Guy says, "Yes, he rides, and he never misses an opera ball. Quite Gothic."

There are two forms of writers among the "Jeunes." One who says "Production is inevitable decline. All translated thought is wrecked. One is only really strong when one cannot be judged. Real eloquence is silent." The other who succeeds by keeping himself well on view. He goes to every funeral, every marriage, writes to everybody who has an accident, success, or failure. Writes three letters to every author who sends him a presentation copy. The final one, "I have read this delicate, this admirable, &c. I make a friend of the man for life. From dint of incessantly discovering genius in all my comrades, they have recognised a certain talent in me." Another author wants to write an immortal masterpiece called the "Trinity"—not Malbrouck's, which passes, but the study of adultery, which, alas! remains. He appeals to a lady to find him a wife in order to make a study from Nature. Either his wife will betray him, and then he will know exactly how the injured husband feels, or he will betray her, and he will receive an excellent lesson in the sufferings of the injured wife. "What splendid copy," he cries, cheerfully supposing himself the injured one. Under the circumstances his friend admits she would prefer to be the lover. But he is familiar with that side of the question. What he longs for is the other, to know the feelings of a jealous and betrayed husband.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Souvenirs et Impressions. Marquis de Massa.
La Fin de la Vie. Yvanhoë Rambosson.

THE BOOK MARKET.

JANE AUSTEN'S NOVELS.

THE eightieth anniversary of the death of Jane Austen having just passed, it occurred to me to call on Messrs. Bentley, who may be said to be in a sense Jane Austen's publishers. The copyright of her works has long expired, and excellent editions are issued by other large publishing houses. But Messrs. Bentley & Son claim to publish the only absolutely complete set of Jane Austen's novels. This includes the two short stories, Lady Susan and The Watsons, which were discovered some twenty years ago. I learned that Messrs. Bentley & Son bought the copyrights of Jane Austen's works somewhere about 1830 from the original copyright holders. Lady Susan and The Watsons were first issued by them in 1869. The entire set, including Mr. Austen Leigh's Life of the novelist, is composed of six volumes in Messrs. Bentley's "Favourite" series. The works in this series are not illustrated, and it is to other publishing houses that we must look for illustrated editions of the six novels.

Messrs. Macmillan have already included in their series of "Illustrated Standard Novels" three of Jane Austen's stories. These are Pride and Prejudice, by many considered her masterpiece, illustrated by Mr. C. E. Brock; Sense and Sensibility, also illustrated by Mr. Brock; and Emma, illustrated by Mr. Hugh Thompson. I am glad to find that the remaining three novels, Mansfield Park, Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion are to appear in the same series, with illustrations by Mr. Hugh Thompson.

Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co. have also issued a most attractive edition of Jane Austen's novels within the last few years.

Their set forms ten dainty volumes, with charming illustrations, from photogravure plates, by Mr. William C. Cook.

The hold which Jane Austen keeps on the public is thus seen to be a very strong one. And to these recent editions of her novels must be added a significant item: I mean Messrs. Routledge & Co.'s sixpenny reprints of Pride and Prejudice and Sense and Sensibility. A leading publisher remarked to me the other day that it is greatly to the credit of the public that it goes on buying the novels of this quiet, clever writer, who offers them no sensation, but only delicate insight into ordinary human character, and a refined wit.

It would be most interesting if the entire fortunes of Jane Austen's six novels could be set forth in facts and figures. The circumstance that her stories still sell largely in rival editions precludes the hope that this will be done; but the case of Jane Austen's novels would be a particularly easy and suitable one for such an exhaustive analysis of negotiations, sales, prices, and the profits to all concerned. One thing is certain, Jane Austen herself reaped little profit from books which have given keen delight to three generations of readers.

How," says Mr. Goldwin Smith, "did the world receive these works which now charm its highest minds? Pride and Prejudice was offered by the writer's father to a publisher, who declined the offer by return of post. It is due to his shade to say that he evidently did not see the MS. Northanger Abbey was sold in 1805 for ten pounds to a publisher in Bath, who on inspection thought it so unpromising a venture that he let it lie for many years in his drawer, and was then glad to sell it back for the sum which he had given for it."

Jane Austen did better with Sense and Sensibility, for which Mr. Egerton, of the "Military Library," Whitehall, gave her a hundred and fifty pounds. This publisher also put forth Pride and Prejudice and Mansfield Park. Probably Jane Austen began to taste the sweets of fame when she came into contact with Mr. Murray. She asked him to consider the MS. of Emma, and Mr. Murray seems to have sent it to Gifford, together with the volumes of Pride and Prejudice. At any rate, we find Gifford writing to Mr. Murray as follows:

"I have for the first time looked into Pride and Prejudice, and it is really a very pretty thing. No dark passages; no secret chambers; no wind-howlings in long galleries; no drops of blood upon a rusty dagger—things that should now be left to ladies' maids and sentimental washerwomen."

Gifford little knew that in Northanger Abbey, which lay neglected in the desk of a Bath bookseller, Jane Austen had deliberately satirised these very extravagances.

Again, Gifford writes under date September 29, 1815:

"I have read Pride and Prejudice again—'tis very good—wretchedly printed, and so pointed as to be almost unintelligible. Of Emma I have nothing but good to say. I was sure of the writer before you mentioned her. The MS., though plainly written, has some, indeed many, little omissions; and an expression may now and then be amended in passing through the Press. I will readily undertake the revision."

Gifford was not the only one of her contemporaries who was quick to perceive Jane Austen's genius. In Sir Walter Scott's diary is this entry:

"Read again, for the third time at least, Pride and Prejudice. . . . That young lady has a talent for describing the involvements of feeling and character of ordinary life which is to me the most wonderful I ever met with. The big bow-wow strain I can do myself, like any now going; but the exquisite touch which renders ordinary commonplace things and characters interesting from the truth of the description and the sentiment is denied to me. What a pity such a gifted creature died so early."

Those who have praised Jane Austen have invariably praised her handsomely. Lord Tennyson is said to have hinted on one occasion that he ranked her next to Shakespeare in English literature, as a delineator, no doubt, of character. And if it is hard to believe this, what of Macaulay's judgment, about which there can be no dispute: "There are in the world no compositions which approach nearer to perfection." The Prince Regent, afterwards George IV., was charmed with Jane Austen's works, and is said to have always slept with one of her volumes under his pillow. He solicited the dedication of Emma, and, of course, got it. Mr. Goldwin Smith writes of him:

"The figure of poor George IV. has been covered from head to heel with mud flung on it, and, with too good reason, by numberless hands. But let three things be recorded in his favour. He visited Ireland; he fell in love with a very excellent as well as charming woman in the person of Mrs. Fitzherbert, and, if he had been allowed, would have made her his wife; and he liked Jane Austen's novels."

D R A M A.

IT may appear strange that while theatres are closing on every hand the management of the Comedy Theatre should select the present moment for reopening with that amusing farce "The Saucy Sally." But the truth is, that torrid heats are fatal only to the more intellectual forms of the drama. Farce and other frivolous productions, together with melodrama, flourish luxuriantly, or at least sufficiently well to bring interim management into being. The "summer piece" is a speciality of the season. A strange compound it is. If we may take "Four Little Girls," now running at the Criterion, as a fair sample of the genre, it will be seen to be in its general character about twenty years behind the prevailing taste of the day. The key-note of the summer piece is boisterous fun. If only the low comedian can get his coat torn off his back, or sit on a bandbox, or lay himself open to a false charge of bigamy, the success of the piece is assured. The author of "Four Little Girls," Mr. W. S. Craven, has in Mr. James Welch a wonderful Scotch tutor who has to bear the brunt of a deal of misunderstanding of the sort which the summer playgoer delights in. He is tutor to two young fellows who are reading law with him, and who get married without the knowledge of their respective fathers. Consequently when these fathers turn up suddenly at the chambers occupied by the young men, the young wives have each to be passed off as the tutor's. Add to this imbroglia that the fathers themselves, being widowers, are resolved to marry widows, and, what is more, to make their sons marry the daughters of these same widows, and the humour of this typical summer piece will be understood, especially if the reader bears in mind the comic function which the stage widow is always called upon to fulfil. I do not know why the widow should be conventionally regarded as a comic character, but so it has ever been, even when, as in "Money," she is shedding tears for the dear departed. As embodied by Messrs. Barnes and Blakeley, the fathers are conventionally funny too, albeit as far removed from nature as one could well conceive. The piece would probably have no chance at the Criterion under normal circumstances. But it makes an excellent summer bill.

EVIDENTLY summer audiences are derived from a more frivolous-minded section of the community than the regular playgoer. They are probably, to a great extent, provincial and American, these being the chief floating elements of the population in holiday time. It must, indeed, be owing to the increased facilities for travel that any considerable number of West End theatres are able to keep open throughout the season. Forty and fifty years ago the Londoner took his evening's entertainment, in summer, in his tea-gardens, of which there were many in the suburbs, and as there was no touring public to take his place at the theatres, these establishments closed. Nowadays there are always strangers enough in London to keep many theatres going. I have suggested that the taste of summer audiences is at least twenty years behind that of the general playgoing public, and this happens to be so at present. It is twenty or twenty-five years ago since the frenzied tomfooleries of the Hennequin school of farce were in vogue, and these never lose their charm for the unsophisticated playgoer. But a truer definition of the summer piece, perhaps, is that it remains everlastingly on the nonsense plane. Certainly, it is hard to conceive that twenty years hence, when the ordinary public shall have reverted to the broad farce of their childhood, the summer audience will be gravely engaged in spelling out the solution of the social problems which are the favourite theme of the authors of to-day.

"THE SAUCY SALLY," dating back twenty or twenty-five years ago, happens to accord exactly with the tastes of summer audiences. It is a huge practical joke, devised by that master of the hurry-scurry school, Alfred Hennequin, and, although it has but recently seen the light, it lay for many years, I believe, in the pigeon-holes of Mr. Charles Wyndham. Truly, plays no less than books are the sport of fate. Mr. Wyndham must have distrusted the attractions of "La Flamboyante," otherwise he would not have kept it so long. Yet here it is, an unquestionable success, adding to Mr. Charles Hawtrey's reputation in a line of business which was once Mr. Wyndham's own. "The Saucy Sally" is an excellent sample of the dramatic happy thought. Once the cardinal idea is evolved, the play almost writes itself. Motive force is the great desideratum of an idea for the dramatist. Said a well-known playwright to me the other day: "Many men come to me with what they believe to be a first-rate situation for a play, proposing to collaborate. The hero, let me say, is buried up to his neck in sand on the seashore, with the tide rising. How is that for sensation? they ask. I answer that the idea is no good at all; it leads nowhere—it has no motive force." On the other hand, consider the motive of "The Saucy Sally." A gentleman of roving tastes having married and settled down, finds it convenient to have a pretext for leaving home for a month or two at a time. He pretends to be the captain of a vessel, which his wife has never seen, the Saucy Sally. Nothing simpler in appearance. But mark the entrainement! On his return from his periodical voyages the soi-disant captain is obliged to recount his imaginary adventures, which his mother-in-law carefully collects and, to his horror, publishes in book form, compelling him to buy up the whole edition as it leaves the printer's. An old salt, whose life has been saved by the captain of a Saucy Sally, insists upon heaping gratitude upon our hero, who does not know whether the tale is genuine or intended for his undoing. Worse still, the wife and her mother one day insist upon seeing the vessel as she puts to sea, and a fresh series of amiable subterfuges has accordingly to be entered upon. In short, from beginning to end the hero is involved in a network of absurd and inevitable misrepresentations and misunderstandings. The motive force of the piece is enough to carry the author off his legs. Such boisterous fun will never cease to have a place on the stage. At present, however, it is the summer audiences who seek it with most avidity.

MME. SARAH BERNHARDT appears to be harassed by a fear of losing the position of supremacy which she has held for five-and-twenty years in the theatrical world. It is difficult otherwise to explain her anxiety to meet Mme. Duse on the chosen ground of the latter, where she would almost necessarily be seen at a disadvantage, and to top Mme. Réjane's season in London by returning and giving a single performance of "La Dame aux Camélias" at Her Majesty's Theatre, outside the limits of her regular engagement. Her offer of the use of her Paris theatre to Mme. Duse, coupled with conditions which the latter was unable to accept, points in the same direction, and has inspired the Paris critics openly to suggest that "notre grande Sarah" would like to put her rivals "in her pocket." If such should be the great tragedienne's sentiments towards Mme. Duse and Mme. Réjane, they cannot be said to be happily inspired. While Mme. Sarah holds her own, and more, in the modern drama where she comes in contact with both Duse and Réjane, she is supreme in a walk where they have never dared to enter—namely, that of classic tragedy. Some day she will be obliged to recognise that even with such a marvellous vitality as hers on ne peut pas être et avoir été; but in view of her unexampled versatility there seems to be no doubt but that she will rank definitively as the greatest actress not only of her period, but of all periods heretofore.

J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

For some weeks past one has heard little discussed in scientific circles but who was going to Toronto and who was not. After that the most important question has been, "What ship?" It is surprising what an immense number of people seem able to afford the time and expense for a holiday in Canada, and even more so that they should seek a relief from the routine of science by plunging into the sombre vortex of the British Association. There seems to be a mysterious fascination which these votaries know in listening to the sound of one's own voice addressing one's friends, and one's friends' voices addressing oneself. That seems to be the secret of the success of the British Association meetings, that and the simple human interest of meeting once more the people one can see every day.

It is supposed that the Colony has risen to the occasion of this visit, and means to repay the honour by special efforts of hospitality. All sorts of conveniences, from cheap return tickets to free cablegrams, have been arranged for, and on the other side facilities will be provided for some most interesting excursions. The Central Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk have agreed to convey members over their lines at special rates; Niagara may be reached in a few hours from Toronto by the boats of the Ontario Navigation Co.; and another easy expedition will be that to the beautiful Muskoka Lake region. A committee on excursions has also provided for tours to Nova Scotia, Kingston, the Thousand Lakes, Montreal, Ottawa, &c. Then there are the gold mines of British Columbia, and if any are seized that way they may finish up with a fortune at Klondike in the Yukon. The latter, however, is not recommended in the papers at present as a health resort. If the Association meeting is not enough to engage the social energies of members, there will be others in the immediate neighbourhood. The American Association for the Advancement of Science, founded on the model of the British Association, meets a week earlier than the latter at Detroit, to give an opportunity for fusion. There are also the Society of American Naturalists, and the American Psychological Association, both of which have accepted invitations to be present at Toronto. The proceedings begin on August 18, and assuming, as I have said above, a predilection for this kind of symposium, everything augurs well for a highly successful meeting.

ALL who take an interest in the educational influence of London, and who desire to see it placed upon a footing worthy of the greatest city in the world, will wish well to the Bill which has just passed its second reading in the House of Lords, for appointing a new Commission to deal with the University question. The Commission proposed is a strong one, embodying Lord Davey as chairman, the Bishop of London, Lord Lister, Sir Owen Roberts, Sir William Roberts, Prof. Jebb, and Mr. Busk, the chairman of convocation of the present so-called London University. This body is empowered, under the terms of the Bill, to make statutes and regulations for the new teaching University, in accordance generally with the decisions of the Cowper Commission, but only after a full hearing of all the conflicting bodies and persons interested, and with due consideration of the changes which have taken place in London, since the Cowper Commission, in the direction of improved technical instruction. The Commission is prohibited from assigning money for any purposes tending to restrict freedom of belief; and when all is said and done its decrees are not to be regarded as absolute until they have been confirmed by an order of the Queen in Council, before which tribunal any body feeling itself aggrieved can appeal. It is hardly to be wondered at that a measure which provides so many loopholes, and such full opportunities for the ventilation of particular points of view, should obtain the assent of practically all the parties involved. That, indeed, is its great merit, for the mutual antagonisms were so hot that it seemed impossible they should ever be reconciled. Now that they have once been brought down to a common ground, and that a successful compromise has been discovered, it is to be hoped that the struggle will end, and that the various isolated colleges will allow themselves to be amalgamated into a greater University of London, in which their liberties will not be curtailed or their dignities impaired, but in which they may work together with a fuller and ampler usefulness.

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

Whitehall: July 26.

I condole with Mr. Tyler on the desertion of Mr. Sidney Lee from the rapidly thinning ranks of those who believe that the "Mr. W. H." of the Sonnets can be identified with the Earl of Pembroke. Probably Mr. Lee, like many others of us, was at first dazzled by the specious structure of Mr. Tyler's theory, and, like many others of us, has since found that on further analysis the unsubstantial pageant faded into nothingness. Allow me to call attention once again to the damning fact which makes the identity of the Dark Woman with Mary Fitton incredible. The Dark Woman is shown by Sonnet clii.—"in act thy bed-vow broke"—to have been a faithless wife. Now Mr. Tyler has entirely failed to show that Mary Fitton was a married woman at the time of her intrigue with Lord Pembroke; and as there was a question whether Pembroke himself would not marry her, it is surely obvious that she must have been still marriageable.

Further, the Pembroke theory requires that the bulk of the Sonnets should have been written between the years 1598 and 1601. Now I would go to the stake for it, that the language and thought of the Sonnets is not that of the plays written during those three years, and is that of the plays written during the years 1592-1594. If Mr. Tyler doubts this, let me refer him to the very careful study of the point by Hermann Isaac in the German Shakespeare-Jahrbuch for 1884. As to the dedication by T. T., it can readily be made to fit most theories. The meaning preferred by Mr. Tyler is the straightforward one, but I do not think you can make a canon of it, that the least strained interpretation of an Elizabethan document of the kind is necessarily the most correct. And please observe that I content myself with denying that the Sonnets refer to Lord Pembroke: I do not assert that they refer to Lord Southampton. In the present state of the evidence, I conceive that a suspense of judgment is the proper critical attitude. But I must own that I should not be surprised if Willobie's Avisa, which Mr. Tyler dismisses so curtly, were in the end to give us the clue. The authorship and intention of that curious poem are at present an unsolved mystery, but that H. W. and his familiar friend, W. S., both of whom have apparently been in love with Avisa, have something to do with the story of the Sonnets, I feel sure. Can no one throw any light on Henry Willobie?

E. K. CHAMBERS.

PAMELA FITZGERALD.

Paris: July 28.

Allow me to demur to your remark that Pamela was "almost certainly the daughter of the Duke of Orleans by Mme. de Genlis." In the ACADEMY of June 24, 1893, I gave reasons for the belief that she was really, as asserted by Mme. de Genlis, Nancy Sims, of Fogo, Newfoundland. As to her "natural aptitude for intrigue," she seems to me to have had no capacity for being more than a tool in the hands of others. The kind of intellectual hot-house in which she was brought up did not counteract the intellectual mediocrity of her parentage.

J. G. ALGER.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE KLEPHTS."

Aberdeen: July 27.

In a little notice of my book A Daughter of the Klephs, which appeared in your issue of July 23, the reviewer started off with the assertion: "Recent events appear to have stimulated a mushroom crop of novels and other books dealing with modern Greece." He or she may be interested to learn that my book was in the hands of its present publishers for a whole year before its issue, which was accidentally delayed. It was the result of visits to Greece, and of knowledge sufficient at least to foresee what was about to happen. I "claim" for it that anybody who made himself acquainted with the facts and feelings embodied in my story would have understood recent developments better than some of our "leader-writers" seemed to do! I know the book was written for girls: it is as necessary to inform them as any other class of the community, especially nowadays, when many young women scarcely out of their teens blossom into journalists, and, in their turn, instruct the public mind and conscience.

I trust you will publish this letter, as to those who may read the review the value of the book might be destroyed by your reviewer's false premise.

(Mrs.) ISABELLA FVIE MAYO.

THE FRENCHMAN IN ENGLISH FICTION.

London: July 26.

With much that Miss Lynch says in your last issue everyone who has the slightest acquaintance with France must agree entirely. But when she insists upon the impossibility of the attempted seduction of Kitty by Victor Desanges, it is worth noting that the theme of Mlle. de Bovet's last novel, Parole jurée, is the liaison between the hero and an unmarried girl whom he has met socially. It certainly surprised me, as it may surprise Miss Lynch, to see that in Mlle. de Bovet's opinion an unmarried woman may be, notoriously, the mistress of a married man, and yet not forfeit social consideration. In fact, I don't believe a word of it. But if a Frenchwoman asserts that such is the case what is the poor English novelist to do?

A READER.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

MR. BRAM STOKER's book is explained to be a version of the "were-wolf" legend, of which the setting is England of the present day, and the manner the documentary system of many hands favoured by Wilkie Collins. The translation of the monster to English soil is pronounced by the Speaker to be a distinct success; and "it says much for the author's command of his gruesome theme that in spite of being thus handicapped in his methods, he has succeeded in making the story intensely interesting. . . . The supernatural element is managed with . . . an appearance of realism that is extremely ingenious." The Chronicle pronounces that "the impossibilities of the subject are handled with such fertility and ingenuity that Dracula is not likely to leave room for imitators. Mr. Stoker's vampire will remain unique." The story, says the Pall Mall, "is horrid and creepy to the last degree. It is also excellent, and one of the best things in the supernatural line that we have been lucky enough to hit on. . . . Mr. Stoker has mastered the real secrets of a genuine 'creep'; . . . and there is a creep in every dozen pages or so." The Daily News asks, what of the general decay of faith? "Here . . . is Mr. Bram Stoker taking in hand the old-world legend of the were-wolf, or vampire, with all its weird and exciting associations of blood-sucking and human-flesh-devouring, and interweaving it with the threads of a long story with an earnestness, a directness, and a simple good faith which ought to go far to induce readers of fiction to surrender their imaginations into the novelist's hands." "Never," writes Mr. Courtney in the Daily Telegraph, "was so mystical a tale told with such simple verisimilitude." But he finds something opposed to "modern ethical principles" in the idea of the innocent persons who, by the extraneous influence of the monster develop a like unnatural lust. "Mr. Bram Stoker," writes the Saturday, "cannot boast of any elegance of style; but at least he is plain and straightforward, and tells his story without any of the vulgar clap-trap, and magniloquent balderdash with which some writers of this class of fiction disfigure their books."

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE SPANISH ARMADA IN IRELAND.
Now ready, price Two Shillings net, with Map and Illustrations.

CAPTAIN CUELLAR'S ADVENTURES in CONNACHT and ULSTER A.D. 1588. A Picture of the Times, drawn from Contemporary Sources. By HUGH ALLINGHAM, M.B.I.A., Member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries (Ireland), Author of "Ballyshannon: its History and Antiquities," &c., with an Introduction and Complete Translation of Captain Cuellar's Narrative of the Spanish Armada, and his Adventures in Ireland, by ROBERT CRAWFORD, M.A., M.B.I.A., &c.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

DIARY of a TOUR through GREAT BRITAIN in 1795. By the Rev. WILLIAM MACRITCHIE, Minister of the Parish of Clunie, Perthshire. With an Introduction and Notes by DAVID MACRITCHIE, Author of "The Testimony of Tradition," &c.
"The volume gives a pleasant picture of touring a century ago. Throughout its pages there are many delightful passages and touches."—Daily Free Press.

In large demy 8vo, appropriately bound in art linen boards, price 6s.

GEORGE MORLAND'S PICTURES. Their Present Possessors, with Details of the Collections, by RALPH RICHARDSON, F.R.S.E., F.S.A.Scot., Author of "George Morland, Painter, 1763-1804."
"All interested in the charming art of George Morland can now learn, by means of this publication, where the best examples of his art are to be found."—Glasgow Evening News.

In crown 8vo, tastefully printed, and bound in parchment, price 6s.

GLEANINGS from IBSEN. (The Best and Choicest in Ibsen.) Selected and Edited, by Permission, by EMMIE AVERY KEDDELL and PERCY CROSS STANDING. With a Preface on Ibsenism.
"Those who admire Ibsen will find a pleasure in seeing his best sayings collected here, and those who do not, will find some valuable expressions in its pages."—Daily Free Press.

LONDON: ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER Row, E.C.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared this year:—

SAMUEL RICHARDSON...	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ..	"	9
LEIGH HUNT ...	"	16
LORD MACAULAY ...	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHEY ...	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE ...	February	6
CHARLES LAMB ...	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ...	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ...	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS ...	March	6
EDMUND WALLER ...	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS ...	"	20
JOHN MILTON ...	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER ...	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN ...	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ...	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW ...	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL ...	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING ...	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE ...	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ...	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS ...	"	29
JONATHAN SWIFT ...	June	5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ...	"	12
WILLIAM BLAKE... ..	"	19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ...	"	26
ALEXANDER POPE ...	July	3
DOUGLAS JERROLD ...	"	10
FRANCIS BACON ...	"	17

CONTENTS OF THE MAGAZINES.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.

AUGUST.

TORYISM and TOIL. By Hon. CLAUDE G. HAY and HAROLD HODGE.
MAURICE MAETERLINCK. By Mrs. CRAWFORD.
TWENTY YEARS of CYCLING. By J. and E. R. PENNELL.
FAMINES in INDIA and their REMEDY. By ROBERT C. DUTT.
DANTE as a RELIGIOUS TEACHER.—I. By Rev. E. MOORE, D.D.
THE SHORTCOMINGS of our SPORTING LITERATURE. By W. A. BAILLIE-GROHMAN.
HANDEL and the HANDEL FESTIVALS. By H. HEATHCOTE STATHAM.
"THE KING of the JOURNALISTS." By ALBERT D. VANDAM.
MRS. OLIPHANT. By Mrs. HARRY COHILL.
THE DEFEAT of the ARMADA. By Major MARTIN HUME.
OLD FRIENDS with a NEW FACE. By St. JOHN E. C. HANKIN.
THE PRESENT AGITATION in INDIA. By Sir M. M. BROWN.
THE SULTAN and the CONCERT. By DIPLOMATICUS.

CHAPMAN'S MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY OSWALD CRAWFORD.

Price Sixpence.

The AUGUST Number contains the continuation of MISS VIOLET HUNT'S NEW NOVEL, UNKIST, UNKIND!
And Seven Complete Stories by
G. B. BURNIN, LUCIAN BORREL, HENRY MANTLEY, HENRY FLOWERDEN, A. A. BRAZIER, MARY REYNOLDS, and W. L. ALDEN.
CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., London.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 982.—AUGUST, 1897.—2s. 6d.

A GLIMPSE of the LATE WAR, by Major C. E. Callwell.—EARLY VICTORIAN TRAVELLING.—THE NATIVE ARMY OF INDIA.—ITALIAN JOURNALISM AS SEEN IN FICTION.—THE WILD DOGS, by Bernard Capes.—FACES AND PLACES, by Dr. Louis Robinson.—DARIEL: A ROMANCE OF SURREY, by R. D. Blackmore.—AT DAWN OF DAY, by "A Son of the Marshes."—A REMINISCENCE of TRENTYSON, by Professor Knight.—THE SILVER MINES of NERTCHINSK, by J. Y. Simpson.—THE CONDUCT and PRESENT CONDITION of GREECE, by Walter B. Harris.—A HEALTHY CHANGE.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE PROGRESSIVE REVIEW.

No. 11.—AUGUST, 1897.—PRICE ONE SHILLING

CONTENTS.

EDITORIAL.—THE IMPUTENCE of the OPPOSITION.
THE PRESERVATION of FOOTPATHS.
THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER: his Position and Prospects in Scotland.
TWO DAYS with COUNT TOLSTOY. By Hon. ERNEST HOWARD CROSSBY.
THE DECADENCE of the HOUSE of COMMONS. By R. WALLACE, M.P.
HEINE'S TRANSLATORS. By ERNEST RADFORD.
PROGRESSIVE UNITY and RAILWAY NATIONALISATION. By CLEMENT EDWARDS.
ETHICS of EMPIRE. By NEMO.
THE PROGRESSIVE MOVEMENT ABROAD—FRANCE.
CAUSERIE of the MONTH.
BOOK REVIEWS.
HORACE MARSHALL & SON, Temple House, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

Price 3d., by post 3d.; yearly subscription (including Supplements), 2s. 8d.

THE LITERARY GUIDE: A Rationalist Review.

Devoted mainly to Books and Publications which deal with Religion, Philosophy, Science, and Ethics from a Rationalist standpoint.

THE AUGUST NUMBER CONTAINS:

RATIONALISM in FICTION.
THE GOSPEL in the DUST.
OUT-OF-DATE THEOLOGY.
THE CROSS and the CRESCENT.
MRS. BESANT'S NEW BOOK.
THE GHOST of KHAMMURABI.
A FIRST-CENTURY MANIFESTO.
MORAL INSTRUCTION in FRANCE.
ARGUING for IMMORTALITY.
RANDOM JOTTINGS.
OUR LIBRARY SHELVES.—Ruskin's "Time and Tide"
A PUBLIC SCHOOL for the UNORTHODOX.
SIGNS and WARNINGS (gleaned from the Religious Press).

*. Copies of the July issue, containing two important Supplements, may be still had, price 3d., by post 3d.
London: Watts & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

24, BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS beg to announce that they have just published "HANNIBAL, Soldier, Statesman, Patriot, and the Crisis of the Struggle between Carthage and Rome." By WILLIAM O'CONNOR MORRIS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s, being the twenty-first volume in the "Heroes of the Nations" Series, of which an illustrated prospectus will be sent on receipt of a postcard.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

OF THE

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKEATS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Farnival Street, E.C.

E P P S 'S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.

C O C O A

Just ready, crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s. 6d., post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH

Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity.

By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D., Cambridge.

CONTENTS:—I. Our Historic Principle: the Unity, Autonomy, and Continuity of the Church. II. Our Root is Religious—in Faith and Free Grace. III. Faith Demands a Church—but Catholic, not Monopolist. IV. We Disown the Prince, the Prelate, the Priest, and the Individualist. V. and VI. The History of our Spiritual Principle.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d., post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS

of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 500 Beautiful and Suggestive Illustrations. With a Textual Index and an Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d.

WILLIAM KNIBB, Missionary in Jamaica. A Memoir. With Introduction by the Rev. J. G. GREENHOUGH, M.A. By Mrs. JOHN JAMES SMITH.

London: ALEXANDER & SHEPHERD, Farnival Street,

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1318.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The AUGUST CATALOGUE of Valuable NEW and SECOND-HAND WORKS, offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C., PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS in all Languages.

New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues and terms on application.

LARGE STOCK of SECOND-HAND BOOKS

in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 51 SENTINEL—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1443 lots.)

No. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (753, 753 lots.)

No. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO., PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS, 22, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.

CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford. CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN, FOREIGN BOOKSELLER, 45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate prices. CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO., PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS, 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C. Catalogues: THACKER, SPINK & Co. MSS. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING. NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SHILL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C. are specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing, illustrating and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page Journals at one operation. Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals. Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted. Telephone 45121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1861. BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London. TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100. STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT. For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY. HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY. HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANAC, with full particulars post free. FRANCIS RAVENSBOROUGH, Manager.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. TECHNICAL EDUCATION BOARD.

The Technical Education Board of the London County Council is prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of HEAD MASTER of the new CAMBERWELL SCHOOL of ARTS and CRAFTS, erected by Mr. Passmore Edwards in memory of the late Lord Leighton. The salary will be at the rate of £400 a year, and the Head Master, whose services will be required in October, will be expected to devote his whole time to the duties of the office, unless he is also appointed by the Vestry of the Parish of Camberwell to be Director of the South London Art Gallery. Forms of application, together with full particulars of the duties and conditions of the Appointment, may be obtained from the undersigned during August, and must be returned to this Office on or before Wednesday, 15th September.

WM. GARNETT, Secretary of the Board.

24, St. Martin's Place, W.C., 30th July, 1897.

MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

I.—PROFESSORSHIP OF MENTAL AND MORAL PHILOSOPHY, AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.
II.—PROFESSORSHIP OF METALLURGY.

The Council invite APPLICATIONS for the above PROFESSORSHIP. The Candidates, accompanied by thirty-five copies of Testimonials, should be sent to the undersigned, not later than Saturday, the 18th of September.

The Candidates elected will be required to enter upon their duties as soon after the 1st of October, 1897, as possible.

Further particulars may be obtained from
Geo. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SHEFFIELD.

LECTURER in PHILOSOPHY and ECONOMICS.
The Council will proceed to the ELECTION of a LECTURER in PHILOSOPHY and ECONOMICS in September. Duties to commence in October next. Salary £200 at least, together with half the fees of the Lecturer's Classes.—For particulars apply to the REGISTRAR.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, PADDINGTON, W.

The WINTER SESSION begins on OCTOBER 1st with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS, at 4 p.m., by Dr. GOW.
The ANNUAL DINNER will be held in the EVENING, at the KING'S HALL, HOLBORN RESTAURANT.—Mr. A. J. PEPPER, F.R.C.S., in the Chair.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN NATURAL SCIENCE.

One of £144. Two of £73 15s. One of £202 10s. Two of £57 15s. (these Two open to Students from Oxford and Cambridge) will be awarded by Examination on September 22nd and 23rd.

There are Sixteen Resident Appointments in the Hospital open to Students without expense. The School provides complete preparation for the Higher Examinations and Degrees of the Universities. Special attention is directed to the fact that the authorities of the Medical School have for the first time thrown open all the Special Classes for the Higher Examinations free to Students. There will in future be complete Courses of Special Tuition for the Intermediate and Final Examinations of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and London.

The Residential College is at present at 33 and 35, Westbourne Terrace, W. Terms may be had on application to the Warden, Mr. H. S. COLLIER.

NEW OUT-PATIENTS' DEPARTMENT.
The new Out-Patients' Department, which will cover an area of over 30,000 superficial square feet, is to be ready by 15th September. It occupies the entire ground floor of the new Clarence Wing, which, when completed, will also provide additional Wards and a Residential College for Medical Officers and Students.

ENLARGEMENT OF THE MEDICAL SCHOOL.
A fresh Laboratory, fitted with electric light and all modern improvements, for the study of Biology, Pathology, and Bacteriology, has been added this year.

The whole of the buildings hitherto used for the Out-Patients' Department of the Hospital has been apportioned to the Medical School for purposes of New Laboratories, Class-rooms, and a New Pathological Department, with provision of extensive New Laboratories for Pathology and Bacteriology, and an improved Museum for Pathological Specimens, with a special Anatomical Department.
For Prospectus apply to Mr. F. H. MADDEN, School Secretary.
G. P. FIELD, Dean.
A. P. LUFF, M.D., Sub-Dean.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

FOUR SCHOLARSHIPS and ONE EXHIBITION, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1897—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology. Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology. The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German. The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation Examination of July, 1897.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.
For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

SALES BY AUCTION.

Mathematical, Theological, and Miscellaneous Library of the late Rev. A. FREEMAN, F.R.A.S., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge (by order of the Executors)—Collection of Modern Books, &c.

MESSRS. HODGSON will SELL by AUCTION, at their ROOMS, 115, CHANCERY LANE, W.C., on WEDNESDAY, August 11, and Two Following Days, at 1 o'clock, the above LIBRARY—Standard Modern Books and other Properties—Library Furniture—Central-fire Sporting Gun, &c.
To be viewed and Catalogues had.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for 11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—Apply ACADEMY Office, 43, Chancery Lane, London.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER—PAD. (The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Expenses each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, LONDON.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS OF FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools, now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns, made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

The Company offer their services for the Reproduction by the Permanent Processes of Works of Art, for the Collector's Portfolio, Book Illustrations of the highest class, Wall Decoration, &c. Examples of Work and Estimates submitted on application.

CATALOGUE AND LISTS FREE.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, FINE ART GALLERY, 74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. ART REPRODUCERS.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C. Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich.

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Process in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Pictorial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process for the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS., Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14 HENRIETTA STREET COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON ... ..	November	14
JOHN KEATS ... ..	"	21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... ..	"	28
TOM HOOD ... ..	December	5
THOMAS GRAY ... ..	"	12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ... ..	"	19
SIR WALTER SCOTT ... ..	"	26
1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON ... ..	January	2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ... ..	"	9
LEIGH HUNT ... ..	"	16
LORD MACAULAY ... ..	"	23
ROBERT SOUTHBY ... ..	"	30
S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..	February	6
CHARLES LAMB ... ..	"	13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ... ..	"	20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ... ..	"	27
SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..	March	6
EDMUND WALLER ... ..	"	13
WILKIE COLLINS ... ..	"	20
JOHN MILTON ... ..	"	27
WILLIAM COWPER ... ..	April	3
CHARLES DARWIN ... ..	"	10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ... ..	"	17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW ... ..	"	24
ANDREW MARVELL ... ..	May	1
ROBERT BROWNING ... ..	"	8
THOMAS CARLYLE ... ..	"	15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ... ..	"	22
CHARLES DICKENS ... ..	"	29
JONATHAN SWIFT ... ..	June	5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ... ..	"	12
WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..	"	19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ... ..	"	26
ALEXANDER POPE ... ..	July	3
DOUGLAS JERROLD ... ..	"	10
FRANCIS BACON ... ..	"	17

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.	COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.	N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION, and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS,
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE* ... ..	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 320, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the

FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.
"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

IMPORTANT NOVELS

PUBLISHED BY

CASSELL & COMPANY.

J. M. BARRIE.

Sentimental Tommy. Forty-third Thousand.
6s.

The Little Minister. 6s.

R. L. STEVENSON.

Treasure Island. 3s. 6d.

Catriona. 6s.

Kidnapped. 6s.

The Master of Ballantrae. 3s. 6d.

The Black Arrow. 3s. 6d.

The Wrecker. 6s.

Island Nights' Entertainments. 6s.

Q.

Ia: a Love Story. 3s. 6d.

Wandering Heath. 6s.

Dead Man's Rock. 5s.

"I Saw Three Ships." 5s.

Noughts and Crosses. 5s.

The Splendid Spur. 5s.

History of Troy Town. 5s.

The Delectable Duchy. 5s.

The Blue Pavilions. 5s.

Adventures in Criticism. 6s.

MAX PEMBERTON.

A Puritan's Wife. 6s.

The Impregnable City. 6s.

The Iron Pirate. 5s.

The Sea Wolves. 6s.

The Little Huguenot. 1s. 4d.

STANLEY WEYMAN.

From the Memoirs of a Minister of France. 6s.

The Story of Francis Cludde. 6s.

The Man in Black. 3s. 6d.

E. W. HORNING.

My Lord Duke. 6s.

The Rogue's March. 6s.

Tiny Luttrell. 6s.

FRANK STOCKTON.

A Story-Teller's Pack. 6s.

Mrs. Cliff's Yacht. 6s.

Adventures of Captain Horn. 6s.

Pomona's Travels. 3s. 6d.

H. RIDER HAGGARD.

King Solomon's Mines. 3s. 6d.

CLARK RUSSELL.

What Cheer! 6s.

List, ye Landsmen! 3s. 6d.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED.
London; Paris and Melbourne.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Irish Archaeology ... ..	108
An Impossible Man ... ..	106
Hereward's Hold and Awdrey's Shrine ... ..	106
From the Antipodes ... ..	107
Art and Life ... ..	108
Social England ... ..	109
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	109
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	111
New Books Received... ..	111
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	112
MAURICE MASTERLINCK ... ..	113
THE LONDON OF THE WRITERS ... ..	114
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	115
DRAMA ... ..	115
SCIENCE ... ..	116
MUSIC ... ..	117
CORRESPONDENCE ... ..	117
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..	118
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	45-48

REVIEWS.

IRISH ARCHÆOLOGY.

The Dolmens of Ireland, their Distribution, Structural Characteristics and Affinities in other Countries; together with the Folk-lore attaching to them; supplemented by considerations on the Anthropology, Ethnology, and Traditions of the Irish People. By W. Copeland Borlase, M.A. In 3 vols. (Chapman & Hall.)

ALL students of the monolithic remains of early man in Ireland, and the neighbouring lands, will receive this monumental contribution to the subject with mingled feelings of pleasure and disappointment. That Mr. Borlase, born amid the Cornish logan-stones, circles and cromlechs, and sprung of a lineage which for several generations has been engaged in the investigation of these curious relics of neolithic times, should give us a good book on the dolmens of the sister island and their manifold relations to those of the surrounding regions, was to be expected, and this expectation has here been more than realised. Indeed, his treatment of this most essential part of his work, together with the anthropological considerations based on the monuments themselves, is beyond all praise, and had his labours been confined to such matters no room would have been left for criticism. But the strictly scientific character of these sections is greatly impaired by the unscientific, strained, and impossible etymologies which he everywhere indulges in, and which culminate in the concluding section occupied with the ethnological and historical aspects of the subject.

The superabundant materials collected by Mr. Borlase during his annual visits to Ireland for the last decade or so, and supplemented by the no less copious data brought together during a life-long study of the extensive British and foreign literatures bearing on the questions at issue, have overflowed into three bulky volumes, the pagination of which is continuous, making altogether 1234 large octavo pages. Convenience of reference is thus greatly facilitated. More than half of the 793 illustrations are concentrated in Part I., which fills the whole of the first and a portion of the second volume, and which gives a succinct account of all the Irish dolmens, barrows, menhirs, and cyclooliths here passed under review. These, numbering altogether 898, are again systematically disposed according to their geographical position in the different counties of the four provinces, each province being accompanied by a map on which the sites of the several monuments are clearly shown by red dots. A large number of the dolmens were personally inspected and sketched by the author, while others are reproduced from drawings placed at his service by Miss Margaret Stokes, Mr. W. F. Wakeman, Mr. John Windele, Mr. T. J. Westropp, and other well-known Irish antiquaries.

In Part II., which is of quite exceptional interest, the author passes to a consideration of the general questions relating to megalithic monuments of all kinds, their different types, classifications, and distinctions, measurement of the cap-stones, probable mode of construction, origin, evolution, and centre of diffusion throughout the Eastern Hemisphere. Then follows a comparative study of similar structures in Britain, Scandinavia, Gaul, Iberia, North Africa, Syria, and so on eastwards to India. Having gone so far, it seems a pity that Mr. Borlase did not extend this comprehensive survey round the globe, so as to include the similar or analogous structures in Assam (the Khasi Hills), in Japan (of these he had already made an independent study in his Nippon and its Antiquities), in Korea, and lastly in South America, where megalithic buildings reach their highest development in the stupendous remains of Tiahuanaco strewn over the southern shores of Lake Titicaca. Doubtless the megaliths of the Western Hemisphere have no demonstrable connexion with those of the Old World, and, in fact, are almost certainly independent growths on analogous lines of evolution. But this very consideration would give all the greater interest to their comparative study with similar remains elsewhere, in connexion with the larger question of the psychic unity of all mankind. Ample materials, it may be added, are now available for such a study in the sumptuous volume lately issued by Herren Stübel and Uhle on the Tiahuanaco ruins.*

Part III., "Names and Legends," is concerned with the origin and interpretation of the various names, legends, and superstitions "associated with dolmens, and other megalithic remains and venerated sites in Ireland." The section forms a valuable chapter in comparative folk-lore, and those interested in such subjects will find much useful information here brought together in elucidation of the names of giants, women, Phooka, the cat, dog, cow, and other animals, the fairies and other supernatural beings who seem still to haunt many of the spots that have for ages been regarded as hallowed sites. An explanation is here offered of the puzzling expression Fir Breagach, so constantly found connected with venerated rocks, cairns, and similar remains. But the reader's confidence in the author as a trustworthy guide begins here to be already somewhat shaken by the fanciful etymologies which, for instance, would equate quoit, a Cornish term for cromlechs, not only with the first syllable of Cuthoge, name of a dolmen in County Cork, but even with the Kut of the Duyvel's Kut in Holland with the Kit's Coity in Kent, the Cat of Catiorqus in the Channel Islands, the Carrig-na-Chait ("Cat's Rock") in Meath, and so on.

* Die Ruinenstätte von Tiahuanaco, Breslau 1893, reviewed in the ACADEMY, July 8, 1893.

In Part IV. are comprised two distinct branches of inquiry, "Anthropology and Ethnology." The anthropology, which is a solid piece of work, well reasoned and generally free from extravagances, seeks to determine the constituent elements in the physical constitution of the Irish people by a careful comparison of the few skulls and other human remains found in ancient burial-places with those of the Stone and Bronze periods from the caves, barrows, and dolmens of Britain and the mainland. Mr. Borlase has himself worked in this field of research, and if his conclusions are not always convincing, his methods are, at least, those of a man of science. In proof of this, attention may be called to his treatment of the relics of early man from the Ballynamitra Cave on the Blackwater Estuary, which Sir John Lubbock had assigned to the palæolithic age, but which are here clearly shown to be referable to neolithic times. Nevertheless, the presence of the long-headed palæolithic man in Ireland is inferred from the prevalence in later times of the prominent superciliary ridges which form such a marked feature of the Neanderthal and Eguisheim crania. Indeed, the true Irish type is regarded as essentially platy-dolichocephalic (skull long and low), and Mr. Borlase goes so far as to assert that the brachycephalic element introduced during the later New Stone and Bronze periods "did not prove enduring" (p. 1020). Certainly this is a remarkable conclusion to arrive at on such slight evidence as is available. Could it be substantiated, it would go far to prove that primitive man had not only reached Ireland, but had occupied the island in large numbers during the Old Stone Age. Otherwise it is difficult to see how the later round-headed immigrants could have been so rapidly absorbed by their dolichocephalic forerunners.

But it is the strictly ethnological section of Part IV. that is likely to raise the most lively protests among students of Irish antiquities. Here an extraordinary theory is advanced to interpret on historic grounds the huge mass of legendary matter which forms the bulk of extant Irish literature, and which, in its present form, was composed or recomposed mainly between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries. But before dealing with this section it will be convenient to offer some remarks on the interesting questions dealt with in Part II.

Rejecting the needless distinction drawn by most Irish antiquaries between the cromlech, roofed with a single cap-stone, and the Giant's Grave, roofed with a series of slabs, Mr. Borlase broadly defines the true dolmen as "a covered structure, formed of slabs or blocks of stone in such a manner as that the stone or stones which constitute the roof are supported in place by the upper points or edges of some or all of the other stones which, set on end or edge, enclose or partially enclose an area or vault beneath." He rightly considers that all were originally covered, or intended to be covered, by cairns or mounds; not, however, for the purpose of protecting the dead and the accompanying deposits from plunder, as is often contended, but simply in order to strengthen the structure by pressure, and at the same time make it impervious to the elements and to wild beasts. In its full development a typical dolmen was thus practically a chambered tumulus or barrow, although large mounds are not regarded as essential to the structure. Indeed, the mound sometimes reached only to the edges of the cap-stone, and was so arranged as to allow access to the interior, the true dolmen differing in this respect from the cist (p. 426).

In many cases the slabs did not lie horizontally or at a slight angle, but were superimposed in such a way as to develop a vaulted chamber and simulate an arch. Such embryo arches, however, which closely resemble some analogous Maya structures in Yucatan, are not credited to the inventive faculty of the aborigines. On the contrary, they are looked upon as "a barbaric attempt to copy in unhewn materials some elaborate models of hewn-stone domes and arched vaults, which had become known to the builders through contact with the cultivation of the Mediterranean or the Black Sea coasts—the tomb of Atreus, for example, or the vaulted chamber-tombs of Etruria. The sculptures they contain may be rude copies of decorative art in the same districts" (p. 426).

Such an explanation could scarcely apply to the neolithic structures, but might conceivably account for those erected in the Bronze Age, during which the primitive architecture still survived in some places, and to that age should probably be referred the improved vaulted chambers.

Some of the cap-stones were of vast size, that of Kernanstown, in Carlow, weighing no less than one hundred tons, and exceeded only by some of the huge monoliths at Tiahuanaco. By what agency, asks Mr. Borlase, were such masses transported and raised to the positions in which we now find them? Some of the largest, including that of Kernanstown itself, were never transported, but are in situ geologically, either boulders deposited by glacial action, or naturally detached portions of the bed-rock. But others, which cannot be so accounted for, were certainly removed by human agency to their present positions. The suggestion that this might have been effected by an inclined plane of earth, afterwards removed, is rejected, except in some special cases, and it is argued with some force that the motive power was a mighty leverage, obtained with felled timber at a time when Ireland is believed to have been well wooded.

The popular theory which attributes these monuments to the "Kelts," or peoples of Keltic speech, is also rightly rejected in favour of their "Iberian" predecessors, who had already occupied both slopes of the Pyrenees in neolithic, if not even earlier times. Mr. Borlase would, in fact, seem to imply that the builders were the direct descendants of the cave-men in Gaul, and that the dolmens themselves were originally nothing more than copies or artificial developments of the natural sepulchral caves which abounded in that region.

France would thus be the cradleland of such structures, and the art of raising them would have spread north to the British Isles, Holland, North Germany, and Scandinavia, and south to the Iberian peninsula and Africa, when the long-headed neolithic dolmen-builders of the west of Europe were scattered in all directions by the short-headed race of Keltic speech, who pressed forward to the Atlantic seaboard during the Bronze Age, and here continued to erect similar structures, down even to Roman times. In its main features this theory had already been advanced by Prof. Keane (Ethnology, chap. vi.); but it has doubtless been arrived at independently by Mr. Borlase, who supports it by a wealth of argument and illustration which will probably bring conviction to the most sceptical. His weak point, of course, is his area of dispersion—north of the Pyrenees instead of North Africa, the true cradle both of the long-headed palæolithic and neolithic races, and also the region from which alone the dolmen-builder's art could have spread, not only through Iberia northwards to Gaul and Britain, but also through Syria eastwards to India, Korea, and Japan. Mr. Borlase has scarcely paid sufficient attention to the African side of this question, and a more extended study of the astonishing development of neolithic architecture in Mauritania may possibly induce him to shift the centre of early culture, as represented by these structures, from the north to the south side of the Mediterranean.

Our limited space forbids a detailed criticism of the 124 pages which are devoted to "Ethnology and Tradition," but which we cannot help thinking the author would be well advised to suppress in future editions. An extraordinary theory is here advanced, with a view to a rational interpretation of the great mass of legendary matter constituting the bulk of extant Irish literature. These voluminous documents, mainly composed, as above remarked, between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries, have hitherto been expounded by native writers in the light of the Biblical or classical records, while the sceptical modern critic "flings them bodily into what I will venture to term the vortex of Aryan mythology" (p. 1,054). But Mr. Borlase, rejecting both these views, may be said to fling them into the vortex of the wildest etymologies ever proposed by the Pinkertons, Vallenceys, Bethams, and other exponents of the Keltic school.

Put briefly, Mr. Borlase's theory is that the Irish records are neither pure fable nor yet historical as regards Ireland itself, but are the echoes or reminiscences of events which really did take place on the Continent about the period of the migrations and break-up of the Western Empire, and which in more or less modified form reached the shores of Erin at the time, or soon enough to be recorded in various ways by the native writers. This at least appears to be the theory, but in its application it undergoes an astonishing transformation, so that the historical events seem after all often to be rehearsed, as it were, in Ireland itself. By this process, aided by the etymologies, the legendary tribes, eponymous heroes, and other mythical beings of the Irish mediæval documents become identified with the historical peoples of the mainland, who were in a state of incessant ferment during the first centuries of the new era. Thus we learn with astonishment that

"Partholan would have meant the Bardlander, the man of the Bard-land; Nemed or Nimech, by which latter name he appears in Nennius, would have signified the German; Bolg would have been the equivalent of Bolgar or Βουλγαρες, the name given to those tribes, either singularly or collectively, who were the remnants of the Hunnish Confederation in retreat, whether in the mountainous countries bordering on the Danube or on the coasts and islands of the North; in the Tuatha Dé Danann we should have probably the Picts presented to us in their divinities, and representing a Teutonic, or possibly Finno-Teutonic, element largely distributed throughout Europe, whose wars with the Bolg would be wars with the Hunnish tribes in retreat, and whose wars with the Fomoré or Fomorians would be wars with the Slaves on the Southern Baltic, called Pomorjani by Nestor, between whom and the Germans there was ceaseless enmity" (p. 1056).

One instance will suffice to show how these and many similar identities are established. Partholan is no longer the Bartholomew of Prof. Rhys, but represents a whole nation, the Langobardi, whose name, however, despite the assurance of Tacitus, has no reference to their "long beards." From the Old High German form Lancpartolant (Lombardy) "take away the first syllable and there remains Partolant, the equivalent of Partolan, which would by itself signify Bart-land—that is, Land of the Barti, Barthi or Bardi." Then the Bard thus arrived at is equated not with the German Bart—a beard, but with O. H. G. bard [parta],—a battle-axe, while the lopped syllable lanc or lang has nothing to do with long, but is the river Lainca, now the Lein, a tributary of the Aller, so that the Langobardi were, in fact, so named because they carried battle-axes and dwelt originally about the river Lein. Later, some migrated to Italy (Lombardy), while others reached Ireland, where the tribal name bard may still, perhaps, be detected in the Partry mountains, and the Latnambard dolmen of the County Monaghan, while the fluvial determinant Lainca or Lagina survives in the province of Laighin (Leinster), whence the Irish tradition that "Partolan—that is, the Bardlander—was specially connected with Leinster, since he and his people died at Howth and were buried at Tamlacht" (p. 1059.)

There is a very full index, but the work needs much careful revision by some hand familiar with Aryan phonetics and linguistic forms.

AN IMPOSSIBLE MAN.

Memoirs of Bertrand Barère, Chairman of the Committee of Public Safety during the Revolution. Now first Translated by De V. Payen-Payne. (London: H. S. Nichols.)

MACAULAY was not an artist who greatly affected half-tints, and of the dark pigments on his palette he used the very blackest when painting the portrait of Barère. "Renegade, traitor, slave, coward, liar, slanderer, murderer, hack writer, police spy," "sensuality, poltroonery, baseness, effrontery, mendacity, barbarity!"—"not a single virtue, nor even the semblance of one": it is a terrible picture; so terrible indeed, so devoid of all relief, that, in looking at it, one almost experiences a kind of revulsion of feeling, a lurking desire to find some brighter spot, some trait not altogether vile. The man, according to Macaulay, "approached nearer to the idea of consummate and universal depravity" than any devil of "history or fiction"; but even the devil, in the eye of optimism at least, is not as black as he has been painted. Might not something be said for Barère?

If that something were at all sayable, then the publication of this English version of the Memoirs might, as one would suppose, have afforded a good opportunity for rehabilitation; and we rather wonder that no bold editor was found to undertake the task. Nothing of the kind has, however, been attempted. Practically, the book is unedited, and carries the reader not one whit further, so far as additional information and criticism are concerned, than the reader who, in 1842, first read the French original version with Macaulay. Yet, surely, something more was wanted. During the last fifty-five years the history of the French Revolution has been flooded with new light. How does that light strike the figure of Barère? Writing with the materials accessible in the forties, Macaulay pronounced the man to be a liar, unscrupulous, inveterate, incapable of truth—and, sooth to say, Taine, writing as it were yesterday, sees no reason for traversing that judgment. But if Barère was habitually a witness of lies, then his Memoirs can have no historical value. They are worthless. Why republish them in an English form? Should there be nothing to bring forward in arrest of Macaulay's scathing verdict, then the issue of these four volumes of translated matter stands in need of justification.

Nor can it be alleged that, historical value apart, Barère's Memoirs possess interest of a literary kind. Barère, no doubt, during a few brief months occupied a foremost place on the world's stage, and that at a time when the scenes enacted were tragic, terrible, portentous. He came to Paris, from his far Southern province, as one of the representatives of the Third Estate in 1789, edited a paper, spoke now and again, made friends with various men of note, and, on the whole, may be said to have held a fairly distinctive position in the National Assembly. In the Convention, which met on September 21, 1792, he soon came quite to the front. What honour could be too great for the man who, speaking in favour of the execution of Louis XVI., quoted a perfectly apocryphal "ancient author" as declaring that "the tree of liberty flourishes when it is watered with the blood of all classes of tyrants"? With a pretty turn for "sentiments" of this kind—and Barère's capacity for their production was copious, inexhaustible—to what might not a politician of the Revolutionary period aspire? Accordingly, when the Committee of Public Safety was established, he became one of its most prominent members. During its brief reign he acted in some sort as its mouthpiece. He had taken an active part in the trial of the king. He took an active part in bringing Marie Antoinette to the scaffold, in exterminating his old friends, the Girondists. He was constantly in evidence. During the memorable days of Thermidor, when Robespierre was tottering to his fall, Barère, trimming as usual till fortune finally declared itself, was in the thick of the fight. He had been a witness of great events, had taken an active share in some of them, had been brought into intimate relations with men who left their mark—often smeared in blood—upon the history of their times. If with all his faculty for stringing words together he had possessed anything of the writer-gift, any graphic power of pen, he might at least have interested and amused, even while we recognised that what he told us was mainly false. But he was, in sooth, no writer. His style is in the last degree dull and empty, the bad style of the worst period of French literature. M. Hippolyte Carnot, indeed, his biographer, seeking to excuse some of his many inaccuracies, calls him an "artist." An artist! Save the mark! The writer of this amorphous, ill-constructed, ill-written book, an artist!

No, he was not an artist. He is more correctly to be described as a wind-bag. In 1803, after going through many vicissitudes, he was commissioned to write a weekly report "on the state of public opinion on the proceedings of the government, and generally on everything which, in his judgment, it would be interesting for the First Consul to learn." The weekly reports were produced with regularity for some time, and then Barère received an intimation, not couched in terms calculated to minister to his vanity, that Napoleon cared to have no more of them. Napoleon, referring to the circumstance afterwards, at St. Helena, observed: "Barère had the reputation of a man of talent, but I did not find him so. I employed him to write, but he did not display ability. He used many flowers of rhetoric, but no solid argument, nothing but rubbish wrapped up in high-sounding language." Here we have the man judged by a supreme judge of men. He was empty. Such ability as he possessed lay in the ready assimilation of the ideas of others, and their reproduction, such as they were, in sonorous, vacuous phrases. Never did any nation or time so "pay itself with words," to use the French expression, as the France of the last ten years of the eighteenth century. And Barère revelled in words—probably came in time to be the first dupe of his own inflated utterances—doubtless even believed in that supreme blague, as Carlyle calls it, connected with the sinking of the Vengour.

When Sieyès was asked what he had done during the Reign of Terror, he replied that he had existed, as if it was something to have succeeded in that. But Sieyès, at least, had preserved his own life innocuously. With Barère the case was different. When he was questioned, in after years, as to what had really been the object and aims of the Committee of Public Safety, he replied: "We had only one object, my dear sir, and that was self-preservation; but one aim, and that was to keep our own lives, which each one of us thought to be in jeopardy. You guillotined your neighbour so that your neighbour might not guillotine you." Scarcely a very lofty ideal, perhaps, but one that sheds a good deal of light on Barère's most truculent acts—his instructions, for instance, that no English prisoners should be taken alive. Fear, abject fear, egged him on. And he had no character, and no conscience—not even judgment, for in many ways he was stupid. That he was capable of harm is obvious, as also that he did harm, but one cannot altogether repress a doubt whether a creature so weak, so irresponsible and pitiable, was really worthy of Macaulay's tremendous moral denunciations.

The translation of these volumes is fairly creditable. By why was the portrait of Barère prefixed to the first volume of the French edition of 1842 not reproduced? In that portrait, said to have been drawn by Isabey in 1793, he appears as a fine young fellow—"strikingly handsome" is Macaulay's verdict—alert, alive, with long hair loose over his shoulders, and something of the brigand, or, at least, the man of action, in look and bearing. The portrait prefixed to the first volume of this English edition exhibits him, on the contrary, as a bewigged little man, of mean aspect, who might be a small country attorney. Can it be that the portrait of 1793 was, like the story of the Vengour, a piece of blague?

HEREWARD'S HOLD AND AWDREY'S SHRINE.

Historical Memoirs of Ely Cathedral. By Charles William Stubbs, D.D., Dean of Ely. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

ELY Cathedral has not been written about to excess. Indeed, if it were not for Kingsley's romance it would not be familiar to the public. The cathedral stands, as it ever did, out of the beaten track. You do not catch a glimpse of Alan de Walsingham's unique "Gothic dome" from the Great Northern Railway. Rising, farther east, above the great level of the Fens, it preserves something of the lonesomeness of its aqueous period. What picture, indeed, can compare for greyness and coolness and holy isolation with that of the monastery of St. Ethelreda, the precursor of the cathedral, glowing in the level rays of the setting sun above those vast reedy wastes of which the Norfolk Broads are but the insignificant relic. The Dean bids us think of Ely as an island "fifteen miles or so off the coast at Cambridge," and he quotes, as he well may, Kingsley's description of the "labyrinth of black wandering streams, broad lagoons, morasses submerged every spring-tide," within which the piety of that early day found its safest retreat. And if the first monastery was burned by the Danes, the greatest Dane of them all did reverence to the second. It is to Monk Thomas of Ely that we owe the story of how

"on a certain day King Canute came to Ely in a boat, accompanied by his wife, the Queen Emma, and the chief nobles of his kingdom, hoping to keep there the solemn festival of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, and how, when the boat came to the Portus Pusillus of the monastery, the king raised his eyes aloft to the great church which close by stood up on the rocky eminence, and was aware of a sound of great sweetness, and listening intently heard the melody increase, and perceived that it was the monks singing in the convent their psalms and chanting 'the hours,' and calling his people about him, he exhorted them also to sing with gladness, he himself with his own mouth expressing the joy of his heart in a little song of English words, of which this verse is the beginning:

"Merie sungen the muneches binnan Ely,
Tha Cnut ching ren ther-by,
Roweth, nites, noer the land,
And here we thes muneches saeng."

The reader who feels the spell of that picture can well follow the Dean of Ely through the more learned and the less picturesque pages of this book. We have here two lectures, prepared for publication, with a full and useful chronological table, many notes, and some capital photogravures and pen and ink drawings. The Dean speaks of himself as being in his apprenticeship as an antiquarian. We should not like to say that this explains why his book is so interesting, but we hope that if he fulfils his expressed ambition to contribute further material to the history of Ely Minster he will produce a book as much relieved with the anecdotal and the picturesque, and as daintily turned out by its publisher.

Some of the best passages in this book are in the notes. These contain, for instance, the explanation of each of the sculptured bases of the tabernacles which adorn the lantern tower of Alan de Walsingham. The sculptures set forth the legend of St. Ethelreda from the time when by the advice of St. Wilfrid of York she left her lord, Ecgfrid, who had vainly tried to break down his wife's vow of chastity, and came to Ely. Indeed, they take her history farther back, for the first represents her marriage to Ecgfrid. The eighth and last shows the translation of her body, sixteen years after her death, from her grave "in the midst of her own people" to the convent church. Her body was found to be uncorrupted, and her physician, Kynnefrid, who had been present at her death, is said by Bede, and by Monk Thomas, to have made a remarkable post-mortem examination of the body. He found that a tumour which he had lanced had healed perfectly in the grave.

Incidentally he tells us that when Ethelreda was "afflicted with the aforesaid tumour and pain of the jaw and cheek, she was much pleased with this kind of distemper, and was wont to say—'I know most surely that I deservedly bear the weight of my illness on my neck, on which, I remember, that when a young girl I bore a needless weight of necklaces; and I believe that to this end the Supreme Goodness would have me be afflicted with pain in my neck, that thus I may be absolved from the guilt of idle levity; since I have now, instead of gold and pearls, the redness and heat of a tumour prominent on my neck.'"

No plain Quakeress could have "borne her testimony" better.

The doubtful story of the fortunes of St. Awdrey's (Ethelreda's) Convent after the Conquest is barely touched upon by the Dean, who is content to refer the reader to Freeman for the bed-rock of truth, and to Kingsley for its verdure. In 1080 the history of Ely solidifies, and we see Abbot Simeon laying the foundations of the church which has grown into the cathedral. He is believed to have begun the north and south transepts, the piers of the central tower, and the choir apse. Dying in 1093, Abbot Simeon was followed by Abbot Richard, who carried on the work. In 1257 Hugo de Northwold's presbytery was added to the choir, and the western tower, and the Galilee transept also belong to this century. So the temple grew, and no one dreamt of catastrophe. But on February 22, 1322, the old Norman central tower fell.

The crash seemed an earthquake. It was an earthquake in architecture, for it gave us the unique octagon lantern tower of Alan de Walsingham—the "Crown of St. Awdrey" as the Dean loves to call it—"the only Gothic dome in existence" as it has been called by another. We have not space to quote the one purple passage in this book, a passage in which the author grows justly eloquent on this unique dome. We reserve our space for less ethereal matters. The Dean's sketch of the domestic life of the Ely monks in the fourteenth century is interesting. For the collection of Cellerarius rolls at Ely is a fine one, and we notice that the Dean has been just a little concerned to present them discreetly. Fuller has left it on record in his Church History of Britain that "of all Abbeys in England, Ely bare away the bell for bountiful feast-making." Dean Stubbs will not have it that there was luxury at Ely, at any rate in the fourteenth century. Fuller's statement, of course, was made much later; yet the Dean's account of Ely fare, drawn, he tells us, from a "Manual" at Lambeth, makes very comfortable reading. The "Manual," we should explain, is a list of the gestures, with their meanings, used by the monks to make known their wishes to each other at table, where they were under a vow of silence. They had five or six gestures for as many kinds of bread; there was panes monachales, and panes militaris pro mandatis, and panes blakuyte, and panes prykket, and trencho. And there were several beers of several degrees of potency, and "Malvesy" wine, and wines of less fame. There is just room, but not more than room, for the acquittal which the Dean pronounces.

EMOTIONS.

"CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES."—The Psychology of the Emotions. By Th. Ribot, Professor at the College of France. (Walter Scott.)

ANY adequate discussion of the emotions to-day must take account of the somewhat revolutionary theory that was put forward independently, about a dozen years ago, by Profs. Lange and William James. Take the case of fear. It had been customary to put the matter thus: a child (1) sees an over-demonstrative dog, (2) experiences the emotion of fear, which (3) causes palpitation of the heart, a catch of the breath, constriction or dilatation of the blood-vessels, trembling and movements of shrinking. James and Lange tell us that this order of events is falsely described. According to them, the true sequence is: (1) the sight of the dog, (2) the shrinking palpitation, and so forth, which (3) cause the emotion of fear. We do not weep because we are sad, clench our fists because we are angry, or tremble because we fear. In all such statements we are putting the affective cart before the effective horse. It is because we cry that we are sad; because we clench our fists that we are angry; and because we run away that we are afraid!

It is scarcely a matter for surprise that this view was at first regarded as paradoxical, if not absurd. And so it remains, unless it is restricted within the limits of a purely genetic and analytic treatment. But it has gained ground. And Prof. Ribot is inclined to favour it:

"It seems to me," he says, "the most probable explanation for those who do not represent the emotions to themselves as psychological entities. The only point in which I differ from these authors relates to their way of putting the proposition, not to its substance."

"It is evident that our two authors, whether consciously or not, shun the dualist point of view with the common opinion which they are combating; the only difference being the intervention of cause and effect. Emotion is a cause of which the physical manifestations are the effect, says one party; the physical manifestations are the cause of which emotion is the effect, says the other. In my view, there would be a great advantage in eliminating from the question every notion of cause and effect, every relation of causality, and in substituting for the dualistic position a unitary or monistic one. . . . No state of consciousness can be dissociated from its physical conditions: they constitute a natural whole, which must be studied as such. Every kind of emotion ought to be considered in this way. . . . It is a single occurrence expressed in two languages."

We are by no means clear that this unitary point of view either conduces to clearness or is, indeed, consistent with the hypothesis in question. No doubt if we take the emotion and its physical expression as a synthetic whole, they may be regarded as a single occurrence expressed in two languages. But if we analyse the synthetic occurrence, one of the languages has the priority—is at least antecedent, if not causal. In the older interpretation as expressed in physiological terms by Maudsley (in a passage which Prof. Ribot quotes, but which does not, in our opinion, indicate any foreshadowing of the newer hypothesis, a physical impression of sight or hearing sets up a commotion in the brain which has for its subjective aspect an emotional state; and on this there follow "either movements or modifications of secretion and nutrition." The brain commotion, and the emotion connected therewith, have the priority. According to James, on the other hand, the brain changes immediately resulting from the sensory impression are not associated with the emotional state, which has no existence till messages are transmitted from the motor and visceral organs called into activity by the primary commotion. There are, indeed, two commotions—one produced by the sensory impression (sight or hearing), the other by physiological impulses coming in from the motor organs and the viscera. And it is with the second of these that the emotional state is associated; or, in monistic terminology, it is of the second commotion in the brain that the emotion is the subjective aspect.

The fact is, that the value of James's view lies wholly in its genetic bearing. Only when we strip off all effects of "association" does it become comprehensible. It is now well recognised that an instinctive response is due to a co-ordinated group of outgoing physiological impulses (initiated by more or less complex stimulation), the effect of which is to produce a mode of behaviour congenitally ingrained through heredity. Mr. Rutgers Marshall regards the instinct feelings thus arising as the main genetic constituents of an emotional state; Prof. James lays greater, but not exclusive, stress on the visceral results; Prof. Lloyd Morgan, approaching the matter from the biological side, regards these visceral effects—on heart, respiration, circulation, the digestive organs, and so forth—as the true differentiae of emotion in its genetic aspect. On any of these hypotheses the genesis of emotion has to be studied in close connexion with the genesis of instinct as biologically defined. Then, having disentangled our factors, we can proceed to study the many and far-reaching effects of "association" by which the emotional states of adult life are rendered so extraordinarily complex.

One of these factors is the pleasure-pain element. This rightly comes in for its due share of consideration in the earlier chapters of Prof. Ribot's work. We do not believe that it is an essential element in emotion analytically and genetically considered. But since it may, and normally does, enter into the complex synthetic states which constitute the emotions of mankind, its discussion naturally finds its proper place in such a work as that under consideration. And Prof. Ribot's treatment is careful, modern, and adequate.

Somewhat more than half the book is devoted to the "special psychology" of the emotions. But though James and Lange's hypothesis is held by the author to be applicable not only to the lower and coarser emotions, but also to those which are regarded as higher and distinctively human, yet in the special discussion little or nothing is said as to the part they play in this subtler region of the psychical life. Although this would have been helpful, and would have served to bring the discussion more fully into line with modern thought on the subject, its absence will not, perhaps, be felt by the majority of readers, who will thank Prof. Ribot for much that is clear in expression, vigorous, sometimes brilliant, in thought, and orderly in exposition. Through the simpler emotion we are led up to those which are more complex; the social and moral feelings, the æsthetic, religious, and intellectual sentiments are passed in review; and the leading types of character are discussed with freshness and originality. All this offers ample opportunity for a psychologist to indicate his standpoint and to deliver the faith that is in him. Prof. Ribot rises to the occasion, and gives us freely from his rich stores of thought, reading, and observation. He is altogether in line with traditional procedure in treating all these subjects in a work on the emotions. But it is none the less true that the æsthetic, religious, and intellectual sentiments are enormously complex syntheses, the adequate analysis of which discloses, as Prof. Ribot well shows, elements from all the well-springs of our mental and physical life.

FROM THE ANTIPODES.

The Naturalist in Australia. By W. Savile Kent, F.L.S., F.Z.S., &c. (Chapman & Hall.)

MR. SAVILE KENT'S Great Barrier Reef of Australia was welcomed by many naturalists as a valuable contribution to science. It is at least doubtful whether the same tribute will be paid to these later Australian sketches. Like everything Mr. Kent writes, they are pleasant enough to read—almost too pleasant, for one does not expect a naturalist to be continually cracking jokes and venturing, "with the reader's permission," to hazard bad puns; while, on the other hand, if one is in search of jokes and puns it is not to natural history that one would turn for them. We rather resent this habit which is growing up of turning everything into "journalese." It has infected geographers and explorers almost, we are afraid, beyond the power of healing. At least let it stop short there, and not penetrate to other sciences as well. Here is a typical specimen of Mr. Savile Kent's popular style:

"The contours of some of the termitaria constructed by the Kimberley white ant are most fantastic and grotesque. . . . In Fig. A. the contour is not unlike that of a primitive form of locomotive engine, which for some unexplained reason has become imbedded in a thick coating of clay. In the second view, B, of the same termitary there is a ludicrous likeness to a group of human figures, clad in voluminous fleece-like garments. A man resembling the stereotyped delineations of Father Christmas or Robinson Crusoe, with a pack on his back, leads the way, and is followed by what might be his better half, wearing what bears a suspicious resemblance to a divided skirt combined with the very latest fashion in balloon sleeves."

This sort of thing is cheap, nugatory, and perhaps a trifle vulgar. It remains to add that only by a most violent stretch of the imagination could one detect any of these supposed likenesses, the list of which is prolonged on to another page.

In speaking of the impossibility of detecting the nuclei of pearls by means of the Röntgen rays, Mr. Savile Kent cannot resist adding:

"May be, in the near future, a new XX, XXX, or other occult luminant will be evolved which shall possess the property of laying bare the nuclei of pearls, the marrow within our bones, and even the quality and quantity of the packing of our brain-cases. The physician's diagnosis of the eligibility of candidates for Hanwell, or of paterfamilias's determination of the most appropriate career for the training of his verdant olive branches, will, under such conditions, be a lightsome task."

Apart from its irrelevance, the fatuity of such a sentence in a book meant for naturalists hardly requires comment. We suspect that the satisfaction of unbottling that little joke about the treble X Rays was responsible for it.

As for the subject-matter of the book, we are inclined to divide it into two parts—one of which is well done, the other doubtfully. On fishes and marine organisms generally Mr. Savile Kent is an authority, while his position as Fishery Commissioner gave him an exceptional opportunity of studying the marine fauna of Australia very closely. Much of what appears in these sketches, especially as regards the coralline growths, has already figured in The Barrier Reef; but, at any rate, it is useful and good knowledge. We should say that the last chapters of the book in which these questions are dealt with are the best. There is less disposition to be funny, and more to convey information. The same cannot be said for the earlier chapters, on lizards and birds. The bird section, in particular, is mainly taken up with the portraits and doings of a couple of ridiculous young fern-owls, or "more-porks," which the author photographed in every variety of posture that would yield a humorous title. This method of illustrating science reaches its climax in Plates VIII., IX., which consist of twenty designs for Christmas cards made out of the Protean changes of the "more-pork" owl. We do not deny that the changes are humorous, or that the photographs are excellent; but Christmas cards are what they are suitable for, and they might have been judiciously left there. So with the lizards. Mr. Savile Kent was fortunate enough to secure specimens of the little known Chlamydosaurus Kingi, or frilled lizard, and to obtain snap-shop photographs of its absurd antics in walking and running on two legs. The fact of its going on two legs has never been satisfactorily demonstrated before, and Mr. Savile Kent has done service in proving this; but one does become rather weary of the everlasting joke about this poor little creature's resemblances, and of the suggestion that its right hand should be carrying a cricket-bat, &c.

Perhaps our worst grievance of all—and when that is stated there are many things left to praise—is the book itself. It is too large to hold, and enormously heavy; the latter fault being perhaps unavoidable owing to the nature of the paper required for the text illustrations. But besides this it is a thoroughly sloppy, though specious, piece of book making. It gives one the suggestion at once that it was written up to the illustrations, which are lavished throughout the text with more regard to quantity than quality. The "50 full-page colotype plates" are sometimes good, but, in general, poor, and they have the disadvantage of coming out as you turn over the leaves. The half-tone blocks do something less than justice to Mr. Savile Kent's extraordinarily good photographs, which we have seen, and they are only fairly well printed. The whole should be compared with a book just published, on which real care has been spent, and which from every point of view is a credit to English printing and publishing—J. G. Millais's British Deer Horns. Between the two methods of production there is a great gulf fixed.

When one has got over all the objectionable features referred to, The Naturalist in Australia contains much that is worth noting. The theme is one of surpassing interest, and has never yet been exhaustively treated. The botany and fauna of Australia represent all that is left of the great southern continent, or "Notogea," in its pristine state, uncontaminated by the hardier species which invaded it from the north. They afford us a means of comparing the working of organic evolution on parallel lines, under different conditions, from a very early period of time, and generally present the largest field for labour now left to the Darwinian naturalist. It is hardly to be expected that so enthusiastic an observer as Mr. Savile Kent would miss the great opportunity here offered him; and throughout his book will be found speculations of original merit and proofs of careful observation. These useful additions to science are spoilt, as we have said, by a too keen sense of humour—a fault one could pardon—and a journalistic habit of writing for smartness, which one cannot. If, like "E. H. A." or Mr. Kipling, he had deliberately set himself to anthropomorphise or diagnose the motives of "the tribes on his frontier," it would have been different. For such work popular treatment is permissible. But The Naturalist in Australia is a person with definite responsibilities towards science, and in his case the flippancies of Mr. Savile Kent, like the moral obliquities of the fashionable mother's child, are not only wrong, they are vulgar.

ARTS AND CRAFTS LECTURES.

Art and Life, and the Building and Decoration of Cities. A Series of Lectures by Members of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society, delivered at the Fifth Exhibition of the Society in 1896. (Rivington, Percival & Co.)

IDEALS have their value in every place and at all times; and nowhere is this more true than in the London that we know. In the pleasant little book before us we are gradually led up from general considerations of art in our daily life to its detailed application to the surroundings of our business or our pleasure. By the names at the head of these five chapters we are gently persuaded that the knowledge of the expert craftsman is displayed for our benefit in each instance, and the individual note struck by each author adds its own strength to the harmony of the whole.

The first lecture begins with a graceful tribute to the memory of the society's president, William Morris, and it is his ideals which will be discovered, in varied adaptations, in these pages written by the pupils who sat at his feet. Here shall you find the doctrine of "the doing a right thing well in the spirit of an artist who loves the just, the seemly, the beautiful"—of "that spirit of order and seemliness, of dignity and sublimity which, acting in unison with the great procession of natural forces in their own orderly evolution, tends to make out of a chaos of egotistic passions a great power of disinterested social action."

'Tis pity that all this must be conditioned by "the possible"; but the fact of this condition need not deter us from the dream of what were best; nor need the "enormousness—or rather the enormity"—of London give us pause. For beauty is organic, and grows with every living growth which it adorns; nor need we fear that once the heart is seized by that strong passion for the right which beauty brings, the head will lag behind in formulating possibilities of action. Just as practical politicians are well aware that the most far-seeing calculations may in an instant be swept away by sudden sentiment or passion, so in the most disheartening depths of modern plutocracy and ostentation we may with confidence await some sudden burst of the illuminating spirit that will in a few short years undo the errors of a century. Unattainable, therefore, as many of the views before us may appear, we hail them as an honest expression of that end which all men and all cities are striving in their hearts to win, of that desire which few can formulate and most conceal, but which demands some such modest and timely expression as this.

From glimpses of the magnificent simplicity of Homeric life we are led on to contemplate the early cities of historic years—those rock-built dwelling-places upon a hill or at the curving of a stream—where the camp first held the ground and gave a shelter for the palace and the sacred shrine, where gods and the daughters of gods still mingled with the sons of men, and the light of a passionate devotion burnt clearly on the public altar. So from the twilight of Paganism stands out the Acropolis of Athens, the Seven Hills of Rome, and then the domes and columns of Constantinople. Then with the strengthened life of Christianity came the Gothic art of the thirteenth and the fourteenth centuries. The dreaded "thousandth year" was gone; the peoples were gradually settling down in the divisions that were to make for permanence; the old order changed, and with the death of feudalism came the rise of national art. Exuberant, romantic, full-blooded, and passionately human, the mediæval craftsman laid hold upon his tools with an intensity of feeling which resulted from his mere brute joy in life and living. Save by material itself, and by his actual knowledge, his art was without limits, for the necessity of expression was paramount, and the hardness of a creative faith was in him. These were the days of the true mason-craft and guild-work; when "good work was understood, and the good workman was honoured." Leisure and the wealth of loving service, space and unfettered fancy, all were his, and upon every yard of stone or wood that showed on his cathedral walls he carved the things he saw around him—the lessons of his daily task, his dreams of punishment or of reward, his guesses at the riddles of existence.

"Romance has gone," sighs Mr. Lethaby, and looks aghast at modern London. But it is here, though the old master masons are at work no longer. But yesterday:

"... and all unseen
Romance brought up the nine-fifteen . . .
Robed, crowned, and throned he wove his spell
Where heart-blood beat or hearth-smoke curled,
With unconsidered miracle,
Hedged in a backward-gazing world."

It is of little use to bewail a condition of society that is in the irrevocable past; it was not the society that left us the monuments which we strive vainly to imitate, it was the same art which is with us now would we but know it, for art and beauty are eternal. We cannot, therefore, agree with the complaint that Wren was not allowed to work his will in full upon the town. His churches are with us, and his Cathedral. His plans to Haussmanise the capital we can well spare. For there is a beauty of its own in the strong commingled architecture of our London streets which does not easily lend itself to such organised pomp as was attempted at Vienna, even to the magnificent designs of Paris. It is a beauty of which Mr. Henley has made us free, which needs but seeing eyes to understand it. And we are far more in sympathy with some such bold and simple scheme (surely not impossible of realisation later on) as that broad stately way that is here suggested from the River upwards to the British Museum. This is to deal in the old spirit with a modern state of things.

Mr. Walter Crane contributes some advice on the decoration of public buildings, in which his appreciation of Mr. Watts's fine qualifications is adequate and suggestive. Mr. Reginald Bloomfield speaks wisely of public parks and open spaces, reminding us of the Roman architect, the courage of whose expenditure "on public works for the adornment of his city makes our own municipal efforts seem little less than contemptible." Something of this Roman spirit of grandeur in design was realised by the Renaissance artists; but it needed the Great Century in France to fully develop that national amplitude of art and architecture which was a direct consequence of the political ambition of Richelieu for the greatness of his country as a whole. That ambition is in its turn out of date; it has given way to the modern outburst of democratic feeling which was heralded by the Revolution. The individualism of the mediæval artist, crushed out by Richelieu and welded into a centralised and academic stateliness, has asserted itself once more in the modern state which Richelieu made possible for the democratic peoples whom he could not crush. It is in this modern state of ours, in a greater empire than the world has seen, that we have now to deal with the problem of directing a sovereign democracy into the right lines in which its life should be laid. And those lines must of necessity be broad ones. A sense of colour (which is here discussed in Mr. Ricardo's paper) and a sense of decorative detail will follow that larger sense of proportion and of fitness which must first of all be roused. But if we must begin by appreciating small things, for such beginnings we may be grateful to the Society of Arts and Crafts.

SOCIAL ENGLAND.

Social England. By Various Writers. Edited by H. D. Traill, D.C.L. Vol. VI., "From the Battle of Waterloo to the General Election of 1885." (Cassell.)

MR. TRAILL'S final volume contains the best account yet published of that era in English history which culminated in the Diamond Jubilee. As a rule, the book by many hands is a patchwork without design, every contributor working to a plan and in a style of his own. Here the difficulty is nearly, if not wholly, overcome. The editor has poured his own spirit into the ears of writers who, without losing their individuality, maintain a certain uniformity in aim and treatment. It would, however, have been a miracle had all the team been brought level. Side by side with the excellent "Political History" of Mr. Lloyd Sanders, the clever and trenchant "Decorative Art" of Miss May Morris, and the very thorough work of such specialists as Mr. Laird Clowes, Mr. W. H. Hutton, Mr. Scott Keltie, Mr. Prothero, and others, there are one or two weak contributions. Miss Bateson's chapters on "Manners and Social Life," for instance, are most inadequate, and coloured to some extent by a fad. Nor can a history of Social England be reckoned complete that omits all reference to its games and pastimes. Are not horse-racing and cricket, lawn-tennis and football, chess and cards and billiards elements of social existence, more particularly when they become international in character? Worthy of much broader treatment than it has received, too, is the fall of the landed and the rise of the commercial interest, with all the changes it carries—the flocking of people to towns, the decay of territorial influence, the obliteration of ancient usage and custom. Apart from these blemishes and omissions, the work deserves the very highest praise; and if we were to single out one portion of it as better than the rest, it is that done by the editor himself—the literature of the period. It is doubtful if any other living writer could have given us a survey equal to it. Mr. Traill stands clear of school and clique. He is at once appreciative, critical, and impartial. We say this, nevertheless, without committing ourselves to a wholesale acceptance of his judgment. Indeed, some of them are more than a little curious. Of Dickens, for instance, he says the humour is shallow, his characters are but abstract qualities, they are not real people; his pathos is more than occasionally false. Now these are definite and damning vices, and it is surprising, after their enumeration, to find Dickens still placed at the head of Victorian novelists. Dickens, Thackeray, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, Charles Reade, Charles Kingsley, and Mrs. Gaskell—that is his class list placed in order of merit, although his warm and unstinted praise of Thackeray suggests that in putting Dickens first Mr. Traill only bows the knee to a popular god. Now, only the other day Mr. Gladstone, casting his patriarchal eye over the century, told us it had produced only two supreme novelists, Sir Walter Scott and George Eliot. Mr. Traill will perhaps pardon us for frankly telling him why we think posterity is more likely to be with the old statesman than the consummate literary critic. The latter, in the exercise of his craft, is absolutely bound to come under the influence of the surface waves of his time, to apply the standard of a "movement," of which he has been part, and to forget what is the most thorough test of great fiction. Are the characters of it so truly imagined as to impose upon you as living, breathing human beings? Do they actually talk and act as mortals do? How many English writers would come triumphantly out of the ordeal? Shakespeare, of course, and Sir Walter, and Laurence Sterne in certain passages unsurpassed in our literature, and Fielding, with his Squire Western, and George Eliot; but, according to Mr. Traill's admission, decidedly not Dickens, and just as decidedly not Thackeray, whose gift is ever that of one of the most engaging, one of the most brilliant, essayists who in a novel, only made clever, play with his puppets. It is all very well to declaim against George Eliot's analytic method, her abuse of science, her too pretentious and other blemishes, but Sir Walter was careless, and Sterne prolix; and every great writer has faults. In George Eliot the saving essential grace is that she had the imagination to mirror human life in her books. With that gift a writer may go anywhere—it makes the difference between Ivanhoe and the two dozen romances produced by as many thrilling romancers every half-year; it makes the difference between George Eliot and every author who has tried to walk in her footsteps. Without it the gasping chase after "situations" is no more than a modern journalist's hunt for "fetching" copy. To revolt against the humdrum commonplace of Anthony Trollope was all very well, but steel chains and swords do not make romance which inhabits our English lanes and cottages as certainly as it is found in the clash of battle. The "Romantic school" has some strange monsters to answer for. And this brings us to a phenomenon of our times that Mr. Traill points out with his usual force and clearness. The passage deserves quotation. He says:

"There is at least no evidence to show that when Shakespeare and the other great dramatists and lyrists ruled, in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth century, or when, as at the beginning of the eighteenth, Addison and Steele and Pope and Swift were the admired and honoured leaders of the national literature, there flourished side by side with them one or more writers of vast inferiority to these great men, but of quite as wide, if not of wider, celebrity, and commanding a 'paying public' of a numerical magnitude to which the admirers of Shakespeare and Ben Jonson, of Pope and Addison, never at their most successful moment approached. If any such fortunate impostors existed in these periods, their very names are lost to us. Poetasters and prose twaddlers no doubt abounded; but not with money. The 'poor devils' worked for the booksellers at a pittance, and Pope had the satisfaction not only of lashing their incompetence but of jeering at their rags.

This is à propos of Martin Tupper, who is dead; but it might have been written of the many prose Tupperes now alive, and whose vogue is no doubt a result of the millions of untrained minds turned out by the Board schools. There are many other suggestive remarks that one is reluctant to pass unnoticed in Mr. Traill's article—for example, his reference to the magnetism which some writers exercise over beginners. Macaulay's prose style was slavishly copied for generations. Mr. Swinburne's method dominated young poets for twenty years; so, in a lesser degree, did that of Rossetti. Hence, perhaps, the flock of "minors" over whom Mr. Traill keeps watch with benevolent eye; hence, too, perhaps, the slowness of any great genius to arise, for in the world, as Goethe says, are "many echoes but few voices."

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Four Lectures on the Law of Employers' Liability at Home and Abroad. By Augustine Birrell, Q.C., M.P., Quain Professor of Law at University College, London. (Macmillan & Co.)

MESSRS. MACMILLAN are gradually building up a select law library which shall be understood of the people. Mr. Birrell's capital little handbook for trustees, Dr. Blake Odgers' résumé of the law of libel, and now Mr. Birrell's companion volume on employers' liability, will go a long way to remove that too common ignorantia juris which is no excuse when any of us offends. No defter hand or more ingenious brain could have been engaged for this task than Mr. Birrell's. Here is a writer who actually dares to mention "the Human Comedy" in a book on law! He plays with his subject, fondles it, dandles it, and occasionally pokes fun at the most eminent judges in our history. Moreover, he uses technical terms, and actually condescends to tell you what they mean. Nor is he the opposite of a pedant. If pedantry is repulsive in law, amateurism is dangerous; but Mr. Birrell is neither hide-bound in his profession nor disinclined to admit its real value. The public, as apart from the student and the professional man, may take this pretty little volume and know that while they are enjoying the witty and delightful papers it contains on a subject of wide human interest appealing to the business and bosoms of us all, they are also imbibing the best that can be said about it by an accurate jurist.

In four chapters Mr. Birrell discusses the common-law doctrines about employers' liability, based on negligence, modified by the exceptions of "contributory negligence," "volenti non fit injuria," and "common employment"; the Act of 1880; the foreign laws on the same subject; and the new Workmen's Compensation Bill. From a superficial view, and for the general reader, we should say that the chapter on the laws abroad will be of particular interest. It enables the English reader to understand where we really are in the matter of social legislation, how much behind Germany, but not comparing unfavourably with the rest of the Continent. On the new Bill Mr. Birrell has a good many acute criticisms to make, though he gives it a hearty welcome. Some of them are already perhaps, out of date, and this chapter will soon bear re-writing; but since all that Mr. Birrell has to say throughout really leads up to the new reform proposed by the Unionist Government, there could not at the present moment be any better guide to a comprehension of the Bill than this volume, by which the change is put compactly into its proper historical and legal perspective.

* * *

A Guide to Chamonix and Mont Blanc. By Edward Whympers. (John Murray.)

This is a second edition of an invaluable book. Mr. Whympers is not a rival to Murray and to Baedeker. He writes for mountaineers rather than for tourists, with that intimate and detailed knowledge of every peak, glacier, and arête in the Mont Blanc district which probably he alone possesses. The guide proper is preceded by a fascinating and learned account of the history of the Mont Blanc campaign, and by an obituary of those who fell in the onslaught. Amongst the last victims recorded are Emile Rey, of Courmayeur, who was killed on the Aiguille du Géant in August, 1895, and of the lamented Richard Lewis Nettleship. Mr. Whympers' information is exhaustive and practical. He knows the right shop for ice-axes in every town, and the quality of the provisions at every hut. He appends precise information on financial subjects, and careful plans, many of them from his own photographs. And he writes in an incisive humorous fashion, which affords a pleasing contrast to the wooden style of the ordinary handbook. Every mountaineer owes him gratitude for an indispensable part of his outfit.

* * *

Croquet: its History, Rules, and Secrets. By Arthur Lillie. (Longmans & Co.)

THE apparition, to-day, of a book on croquet may be taken according to taste as prophetic of revival or memorial of extinction.

In any case, no one could be better qualified to write eulogy or epitaph than Mr. Lillie, who was champion as far back as 1872, and champion, too, in the galvanised tournament of last year. The volume before us contains a complete record of the history, theory, and practice of the game. Nor is it difficult to glean therefrom why croquet died. As a serious game, it was too easy; and as a garden-party diversion, it lent itself too easily to irrelevancies. A witty scholar defined it as a school less for horticulture than for husbandry. It is said to survive at Oxford, but "in a country-house last autumn two ladies, fond of golf and hunting, by a winding path in a garden came upon a game of croquet unexpectedly. They sprang back with faces of absolute loathing." To the man of letters croquet is chiefly interesting because Mark Pattison played it with considerable success, and because Disraeli described it immortally in Lothair. It was at Brentham that Lady Corisande played with "curates in cassocks," and that Mr. Blenkinsop, who hopelessly loved her, drove over with "several cases and bags containing instruments and weapons for the fray."

"The scene was brilliant—a marvellous lawn, the Duchess's Turkish tent with its rich hangings, and the players themselves, the prettiest of all the spectacle, with their coquettish hats and their half-veiled, half-revealed under-vestment, scarlet and silver or blue and gold, made up a sparkling and modish scene."

We cannot resist the gorgeous quotation.

* * *

Chopin's Greater Works: How they should be Understood. By Jean Kleczynski. Translated by Natalie Janotha. (William Reeves.)

THIS work should be in the hands of every man and every woman. To know how to play Chopin's music is the knowledge of all things. Chopin has the charm that never dies; he stands as the bible of melody, as the hymn of flowers. He remembered the workers in field and wood, and field and wood sang back to him their strength. The shell on the seashore whispered its cloistered psalm to him; and the spirit of the rose afforded him a text-book. Many have wondered where he won his inspiration. He had eyes to see with, and saw; ears to hear with, and heard. He could lead the simple and harm them not. He was acquainted with sounds, and knew that sounds were before words. He takes us into great presences, and we are afraid; he makes us remember our Creator in the days of our youth, and again we are afraid. Oh! Chopin, thou art the St. John of harmony; who will come after thee? His polonaises, ballads, nocturnes, mazurkas mean that heaven still can throw down to thinkers what prophecy, even in its flight, hath never yet told. This translation of Natalie Janotha has received the highest praise from Mr. Fredrick Niecks, who wrote the Life of Chopin, and is dedicated to H.R.H. Princess Henry of Battenberg. The Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone has written to Mrs. Drew regarding it: "I am extremely glad to hear that Miss Janotha is giving her aid to the interpretation of Chopin, whom she so deeply venerates, for I feel sure that no one living is more competent to do it."

* * *

"FAMOUS SCOTS" SERIES.—Sir Walter Scott. By George Saintsbury. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

THIS volume, the most important, with the possible exception of that on John Knox, in the series of which it forms a part, is appropriately put in the hands of Prof. Saintsbury, who thus makes his courteous bow to the country of his recent adoption. Nor will any one acquainted with Prof. Saintsbury's literary temper need to be told that in Sir Walter Scott, both as writer and man, he finds a subject peculiarly sympathetic to him. There are plenty of little books on Scott, of course, but it is quite fair to plead, as is pleaded for this one, that a little book containing a survey of the new material provided by the recent instalments of Journal and Letters as well as by Mr. Lang's Life of Lockhart, cannot be considered out of place. And even were that not so, we are glad, on the critical side, to hear what Prof. Saintsbury has to say. As to the manner in which it is said, there will of course be a difference of opinion. To some Prof. Saintsbury's style will appear easy, unaffected, and entertaining; others it will, as usual, exasperate beyond the bounds of serenity. And we are bound to confess that upon ourselves the aliphod English, the constant colloquialism, the frequent obscurity of meaning, have at times a positively maddening effect. We recognise that upon Scott, as upon every other literary subject under the sun, Prof. Saintsbury has much that is sensible and something that is original to say. He brings to his task wide knowledge and real, though not, we think, unprejudiced, critical faculty. But as for reading him for pleasure, we have this many a day given up the attempt.

* * *

The Music of the Poets: a Musician's Birthday Book. By Eleonore D'Esterre-Keeling. (Walter Scott & Co.)

THIS charming volume is announced as a second edition completely revised. It is handsomely bound, and is adorned with portraits of twelve of the world's greatest musicians, one for each month in the year, the portrait being attached to the birth-month of the composer. In each case a facsimile autograph is appended to the portrait. On every day in the year is recorded the birth of one or more great musical writer, popular singer, or famous virtuoso, and in connexion with the most prominent of these some snatch of a poet's song in praise of music is quoted. The compiler says that "in reading descriptions of music in English poetry some special composer or performer has often been suggested to me by certain verses." In this way a very interesting book took shape. In addition to the autographs attached to the large portraits, many signatures of composers and players are scattered through its pages, with brief phrases from some of their most familiar works. Over a hundred poets have been laid under contribution, and from Geoffrey Chaucer to Alfred Austin they rhythmically chant the praises of the art which is twin-sister to their own.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

The Mutable Many. By Robert Barr.
(Methuen & Co.)

Mr. Barr writes this time in all seriousness, but he comes perilously near the brink of caricature. The success of Marcella and of Sir George Tressady has not unnaturally ushered in an era of political novels. Consequently, I look forward to several hours of tedium; for although the magic wand of art can inspire politics, and even labour politics, with interest—Charles Reade, by the way, did it well of old—yet in the hands of the ordinary novelist the details of strikes and of trades-unions become all that there is of the most boring. In any case, one may fairly claim that the politicians should be living and not lay figures. Now Mr. Barr's strikers come straight from the property room. You have the clever artisan with the managership of the works in his eye, the burly Yorkshireman with lusty sinews and thick brains, the glib union secretary, and the "mutable many" themselves, the veering mob of workmen. For the real human being, drawn with knowledge and sympathy, you look in vain. For sentimental interest Mr. Barr gives you the manager's beautiful daughter Edna, in love with the aspiring artisan aforesaid. Comic—one might say farcical—relief is provided by a pseudo-artist, a son of one of the "masters." He is caricature pure and simple, wallowing in money, varnished with humbug, and a cad at heart. He sets up a studio in Chelsea, with stone steps like those at the Pitti Palace, and a flunkey in a blue, crimson, and silver livery of the artist's own design:

"Nothing gives character and dignity to a place so much as a 'man' sumptuously fitted out in a style that is palpably regardless of cost; and if it may be plainly seen that the 'man' performs no needful function whatever, then is the effect heightened, for few human beings attain the apex of utter uselessness. The great hotels of this country recognise the distinction reflected upon them by the possession of a creature of splendour at their doors, who grandly wafts the incoming guests with a hand-wave towards the hall. But these persons of embellishment often demean themselves by opening the doors of cabs and performing other useful acts, thus detracting from their proper function, which was, Barney insisted, to content themselves with being merely beautiful.

When a visitor once complained that the man at the top of the stairs had refused to direct him into the studio, Barney laid his right hand in friendly brotherliness on the visitor's shoulder and said:

'He knew, dear boy, that I would discharge him instantly if he so far forgot himself as to answer a question.'

Barney Hope affects impressionism, and describes his own pictures much as a Ruskinian would describe Mr. Whistler's:

"Were you long in painting it?"

'Yes, a good while. Of course, I can't tell just how long, for one does not do a masterpiece like that right off the reel, don't you know. I suppose I must have spent as much as six hours on it, off and on. You see, you have to wait until the groundwork dries before you can go on with the rest. First, with a big brush, I covered the whole of the canvas with burnt umber, and then let it dry. That's night, as it would appear if there were no lights anywhere. Then I put in my high lights—little dabs of white paint. That seems easy; but, I tell you, it requires genius. Then, if there is water, even though unseen to the general eye, one has to put in little wobbly lines of grey paint under the dots of high light, and there you are, don't you know. It all seems simple enough to talk about, and plenty of fellows are trying it, now I have shown them the way; but somehow they don't hit it off, don't you know!'

I am afraid that Mr. Barr has not put much heart into this story. It is a bit of patchwork, full of disconnected incidents. There are too many "walking gentlemen," who come in and go off again without forwarding the story or assisting its vital unity. Mr. Barr can write easily and pleasantly enough, but he seems to suffer from having nothing to write about.

A Rich Man's Daughter. By Mrs. J. H. Riddell.
(F. V. White & Co.)

One of the minor characters in this book tells a story of a man who lay under sentence of death at Newgate. His wife went to see him, and there was a touching farewell. As she tore herself away she said: "Well, good-bye, dear. When Monday comes I'll bring the children up to see the last of you." "For God's sake, don't," entreated the unfortunate wretch. "Just like you," she retorted, "you always did grudge the poor dears a bit of pleasure." The anecdote, in its not very happy mingling of the pathetic with the humorous, is curiously characteristic of Mrs. Riddell's style in this book. Most women have no sense of humour. Mrs. Riddell has one, and it is just a little too restive. Her way is to bring in a character in circumstances tragic or depressing. We attune our feelings accordingly—accord our respectful sympathy, or pursue with genuine interest. Of a sudden she whisks off the mask, and whom we took for hero is revealed for low-comedy man. There is the case of Mrs. Vink. We are introduced to her in the street:

"Dr. Dagley's professional eye was attracted by the walk of a woman in front, who likewise was proceeding towards Kensington-road.

It was not a reel or a stagger, neither did it resemble the uncertain certainty that marks the progress of one utterly blind. Dr. Dagley did not understand, therefore he quickened his pace in order to overtake the pedestrian—in vain.

The faster he walked the more speed she put on—a spasmodic speed, as he quite understood, which could not last. She was a genteelish-looking, slight, poor body, dressed in shabby, well-fitting clothes; a totally respectable woman, he would have thought, had it not been for that occasional 'heel over,' which, when connected with the after 'spurt,' puzzled him immensely. In all his experience, which had been large, he had never come across anything like it. Therefore, as she hurried he followed on faster; but when he was within measurable distance of that lean, strangely hurrying woman, she flung out her hands as if to catch hold of something, only to clutch empty air, and fell to the ground.

In a moment Dr. Dagley was beside the poor creature, and had propped her up against the pillar of a portico. Even then he found it necessary to support her, for she was in a swoon—a delicate, youngish woman, with small, pretty features, shabbily dressed, but neat and clean.

'Can we get any water?' inquired the doctor of a policeman, who happened to be close by.

'I'll try, sir,' answered the man, and ringing an area bell he was soon supplied with what he asked for.

'It is a clear case of semi-starvation,' said Dr. Dagley, looking at the head which hung down helplessly like a broken lily.'

By these representations one is led to take an interest, to expend a pity; and the feeling is almost one of irritation when one learns that Mrs. Vink is a cheat, a liar, and a ne'er-do-well, and quite deserves the frequent drubbings which her husband gives her. This person—another victim to Mrs. Riddell's passion for the unexpected—begins as a brutalised drunkard, but suddenly reforms, and explains why he refused a good situation in the country:

"It was a fine offer, and sorry enough I felt when I'd to say I couldn't go."

'You did refuse, then?'

'Had to. When I told my missus she was like one demented. Leave London, not she! Bury herself in the country! No; if I wanted to go I might go myself, but she'd never do such a thing. She had enough of the country when she spent two months with my mother; wild horses wouldn't draw her into such a lonely, miserable place again. It was then, sir, I did feel it hard not to give her "one," but I only said, "Take your own way, my girl; we'll see where it will land you."'

Then there is Mr. Koberl, a man dying of consumption, whom I might almost call the buffoon of the book. No reason, of course, can be adduced why pathos and humour should not be compatible—many pens have found them not only compatible but mutually advantageous—but in this book the combination jars. Mrs. Riddell does not mix her colours well. In the story, as a whole, there is a good deal of crudity. The main figure is a doctor, who is “only waiting for a capitalist in order to show mankind a better order of physician.” He is a cad and an egotist, and his efforts to find a short cut to Harley-street are, I fear, not so enlivening as they are unscrupulous. The wheels of the narrative drag somewhat, for Mrs. Riddell keeps all her sensation for the last two chapters.

* * * *

Captain Kid's Millions. By Alan Oscar.
(Chapman & Hall.)

There is, as you have of course observed, a fashion in novel-writing which changes with the changing times. But the course of fashion is spiral, and leads us back periodically to somewhere near the point we had reached when our years and our follies were fewer than they are. This morning it has struck me that we are back again at a point a little above—or below—Wilkie Collins. I pick up a batch of books, and I find them all what I may term “detective” stories. You are given a crime, a mystery, a hidden treasure. The problem is to find the criminal, or the cash. But this is a detective story with a difference: for it has a strong dash of Treasure Island—which statement I intend as a compliment to Mr. Alan Oscar. You have heard of Captain Kid and his treasure. But a few years have passed since an expedition—a real one—sailed to the island of Trinidad in search of it. In the first part of this story Mr. Alan Oscar reconstitutes the adventures of Captain Kid, and writes with considerable success in the person of that truculent sailor. The second part, which is connected by a curious link with the first, is pitched in a modern key, and does not quite reach the same level of excellence. But there are stirring scenes, and there are passages which will make you hold your breath as you accompany Jefferson, Keddy, and Palfrow in their hazardous quest. Here is a passage which should thrill you:

“If you think I am going to make a row,” he said, “you are devilish well mistaken. Shoot! why don’t you? Perhaps he won’t hit me,” he thought quite calmly. “I’ll take a jump at him, and chance it.”

PALFROW: “Forty seconds gone.”

KEDDY (to himself): “If I could only get him to shift his eyes a moment! Anyhow, I’ll stare him, full face.”

PALFROW: “Fifteen seconds more.”

At that moment Keddy’s chance came. From far below rose a sudden cry—“Dick! Down for your life, Dick!”

For the briefest part of a moment Palfrow’s eyes flickered. In that brief moment Keddy sprang forward from off his right heel. Palfrow fired, his shot entering Keddy’s shoulder; then the two grappled.

An Arab or a Zulu will carry several ounces of lead through a fight unnoticed. A healthy Englishman, when his blood is up, will do the same. Keddy did not even notice that he was hit. He wanted to squash this filthy reptile—that was all.

In the first rush they staggered through the entrance, through the drenching waterfall, out on to the ledge beyond. They did not keep their feet half a minute. The rocky shelf was slippery with slime from the constant wet; and they went down, Keddy uppermost.”

From this passage you will see that Mr. Alan Oscar has the irritating habit of dropping occasionally into the dramatic form. It is unnecessary and ineffective: it strikes the reader as a ruse to save trouble: but the defect is rare. If you want to know what became of the treasure, what Blue Jim did, whom Keddy married, you must read the book: it will keep your pulse consistently at something over the normal rate.

* * * *

Ripple and Flood. By James Prior.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

This is a novel distinctly out of the common. It has humanity in it and life and colour. The scene is laid on the banks of the Trent, and Mr. Prior falls in with the prevalent demand for dialect and for the humours and setting of rural life. Humour he has, and also the power of word-painting, the latter in an unusual and remarkable degree. Some of his landscape is magnificent, intimately drawn and full of atmosphere. But the book is no mere idyll or series of idylls. The meads and various rivers are but the background to a real story, richly conceived and strongly executed. You are aware of movement, progression, vitality in the threefold development of Edward Allius, artist, lover and potential murderer. The growth and ply of conflicting strains of temperament are finely and patiently studied, with genuine comprehension of the making of large and slowly evolved natures. Excellent is the picture of Edward’s early life, the somewhat solitary boy, with the dour farmer uncle, and the silent father on whose name is the stain of a crime, and whose identity must be hidden, by the brother’s stern decree, from his son. The shadow of tragedy is over the household, and in tragedy at last it breaks up. Excellent, too, is the picture of the heroine of the book, Ivy Sivil, first as the passionate, unkempt, tender-hearted gipsy child, then as the Salvation Army captain, of unearthly beauty, a marvel among women. Mr. Prior’s name is unknown to us, but in Ripple and Flood he has produced a book with real stuff in it, with restrained art in the handling, with vigour and amplitude in the theme. There is one scene, in a hayfield, which, for the closeness of its touch upon the harmony of human and natural life, recalls Thomas Hardy in Tess of the D’Urbervilles. And than this there could hardly be greater praise.

* * * *

False Gods. By Mrs. Albert Bradshaw.
(Henry & Co.)

The stilted language and indifferent English of this novel recall the Sunday-school prize of childhood. Adjectives—mostly in the superlative degree—bristle on every page, but they are all the conventional and obvious adjectives. Scarcely one shows observation or thought. “Unsuspectiveness” is a word to give one pause, and “berceaunette” for what is generally called “bassinette” savours of the lady’s-maid or the baby-linen warehouse. Flavia Thornton, the heroine, has every physical perfection, including “deeply-fringed eye-lashes.” Morally she has not a leg to stand on. A grandfather, of whose existence she has hitherto known nothing, advertises for relatives “without encumbrances,” and Flavia, with a light heart, deserts husband and child to pose as an unmarried woman and adorn the table of a rich old man. She enjoys ribbons and laces galore—the book is crowded with descriptions of frocks and millinery—together with the attentions, which she virtuously ignores, of an eligible young barrister. The grandfather’s objections to encumbrances do not prevent him from encouraging this suit, and Flavia no longer finds her path one of roses. Then comes Nemesis. The husband is introduced to the grandfather as a private secretary, and thus discovers his wife’s perfidy. He leaves the house, and on his deathbed writes his wife a reproachful letter, which Flavia, now repentant, is sufficiently melodramatic to have read aloud. She is stormed out of the house; but when the infatuated barrister, who has succeeded to the inheritance, marries her, in two years’ time, we feel that poetic justice has hardly been done.

ABOUT BALZAC.

Autour de Honoré de Balzac. By the Vicomte de Spoelbergh de Lovenjoul. (Calmann Lévy.)

There are books difficult to class. The present volume is one of them. It is not a biography, although it throws more light on Balzac than more portentous works have succeeded in doing. The Vicomte de Spoelbergh de Lovenjoul is the author of L’Histoire des Œuvres de H. de Balzac, a volume now in its third edition, which was “crowned” by the French Academy. The book before me appears a logical sequel to the former work. In spite of the minute attention which two generations of men of letters have devoted to Balzac—for he astonished his contemporaries even more than he has dazzled his followers and imitators—there has yet to be written an adequate life of the author of the unparalleled series of novels to which their creator finally, and with extreme felicity, gave the name of the “Comédie Humaine.” It is doubtful whether so extraordinary a range of observation, sympathy, and knowledge of human nature can be found in any other novelist. A library could be formed out of the books and articles Balzac’s work and his life have inspired, and yet, in spite of Mme. Surville, of George Sand, and of Théophile Gautier, the last word still remains to be said. There are reasons why his career should seem obscure or contradictory. Mme. Surville, who published soon after her brother’s death the famous "Notice sur Balzac" in the Revue de Paris, was naturally anxious to present him in the most favourable light, whilst George Sand and Théophile Gautier were almost equally anxious to spare their friend's memory. In one of his earlier letters to his sister Balzac said: "I am young and hungry, and there is nothing on my plate." Then, that there should be no doubt as to the meaning of his metaphor, he added: "I wish to be famous and to be loved!" Well, probably he was as much loved as any man of eccentric genius can expect; and as for fame, he was always hungry, however full his plate.

It is partly due to his friends and partly to his enemies that we have two Balzacs—one simple, generous, and full of indomitable energy; the other so completely deficient in common sense to appear at times imperfectly sane. The real relations of Balzac with most of the men and women associated more or less with his life are little known. Like the immortal Tartarin, he was the victim of mirage. The facts of everyday existence were so coloured by his own fancy that, all through his feverish busy days, he was chasing spectral lights across boggy ground and paying the penalty of his folly by many an ignominious fall. When his friends, probably not without that air of patronage with which we all pick up a brother out of the mud, rescued him, he was rude rather than grateful. Generally they forgave him because he was a man of genius, but the man of genius who, outside his own intellectual province, acts as a vain child in the affairs of life does so at the expense of a reputation for dignified living. This has been pre-eminently the case with Balzac. The contradictory elements in his character, however, have made him as fascinating an object of study as any of his own vivid creations, and it is this peculiar force of attraction which has induced admirers like the Vicomte de Spoelbergh de Lovenjoul to devote infinite pains to the elucidation of comparatively unimportant incidents in his vexed and debt-harassed career, for to have a correct idea of Balzac you must imagine him always hiding from duns.

The present work, if more microscopic in character than its predecessor from the same pen, is of singular interest. The author throws not a little light on the relations between Théophile Gautier and Balzac, and makes it clear that the author of Malle de Maupin was ready to give his friend almost limitless aid in his literary work. From 1837 until 1850 the two writers were on terms of great intimacy, although how far they collaborated is left uncertain, in the interesting correspondence published here and elsewhere. Workers in remote literary fields, each admired the other warmly, and Gautier was among the few friends whom Balzac could never seriously annoy. To the end they were "Mon cher Théo" and "Mon cher Ami." They have both become immortal names in French literature, and the affectionate judgments each passed on the other have been ratified by time and critical assent.

In the second portion of the book are told the curious adventures of Balzac's unacted tragedy, L'Ecole des Ménages, of which the only copy supposed to be in France (only thirty copies were printed) fell into our author's hands. This chapter is of interest to all bibliophiles and students of études Balzaciennes. The play was read by Balzac to a circle of admiring friends many years before his death; yet, when in 1873 M. Duquesnel, the manager of the Odéon, requested M. d'Ennery to prepare it for the stage, the latter found the task quite impossible. "Mais quel dénouement!" wrote the dramatist. "L'amant et l'amante deviennent fous tous deux! On en rirait!" The third part of the book is entitled "Un portrait," and gives the history of the daguerreotype reproduced in 1891 in the May number of Paris-Photographie. An interesting letter, dated January 26, 1840, written by Meissonier to Balzac, proposing to paint his portrait, is here printed, I believe, for the first time. "Le temps nous pousse," wrote Meissonier, "mais nous pousse si fort, qu'il n'y a pas à en perdre le moindre peu." So he proposed to commence at three the next day. But his eagerness was disappointed; it fell through, and so the world is the poorer for the want of this record of a famous man. Destiny was always against Balzac. The Vicomte de Spoelbergh de Lovenjoul is to be congratulated on the success of his book. If the writing fall below the level of the subject at times the author has fully atoned for this by immense industry and tireless research. The book has been evidently a labour of love, and should be missed by no serious student of the literature still gathering round the memory of the greatest novelist that France has ever produced.

SELECTED NOVELS

WARD, LOCK & CO'S NEW NOVELS.

Special Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

JUST PUBLISHED.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NEW NOVEL.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING. THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

By GUY BOOTHBY,

Author of "Dr. Nikola," "The Beautiful White Devil," &c., &c.
NOW READY, at all Booksellers', Libraries, and Bookstalls.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, special design, bevelled boards, 6s.

Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

Although a very large first edition of this book was printed, it was found quite insufficient to meet even the orders received before subscribing, and publication had to be delayed in order to produce a sufficient number to supply the enormous public demand.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

By GUY BOOTHBY.

"Undoubtedly dramatic.....A wonderfully interesting story."—The Morning Leader.

OTHER NOVELS BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s.

Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

DOCTOR NIKOLA. Fourth Edition.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL. Seventh Edition.

A BID for FORTUNE. Third Edition.

IN STRANGE COMPANY. Fifth Edition.

THE MARRIAGE of ESTHER. Fourth Edition.

THREE SPLENDID 3s. 6d. NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW NOVEL BY BERTRAM MITFORD.

FORDHAM'S FEUD. Second Edition just ready.

First Edition all sold on publication. With 4 Full-page Illustrations by STANLEY L. WOOD.

"A story of much merit and startling dénouement. For wealth of character, pleasant descriptive matter, romantic incident, and powerful plot there are few books that will eclipse 'Fordham's Feud.'"—Manchester Courier.

SECOND EDITION OF

COULSON KERNAHAN'S NEW NOVEL.

CAPTAIN SHANNON. Just ready. With 16

Full-page Illustrations by F. S. WILSON.

"Deserves a foremost place among detective stories. To say that the tale is a clever one hardly suffices to indicate the marvellous fascination which the tracking of this monster in human form has."—Notte Guardian.

"Keeps one in a perspiration of excitement.....It is so brilliantly ingenious."—Queen.

"Full of dramatic interest."—The Times.

NOW READY.

LADY TURPIN. By Henry Herman. Profusely

Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

"Ingeniously constructed and throbbing with excitement."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"A breathlessly exciting tale."—The Bookman.

ROWLAND GREY'S NEW STORY.

THE CRAFTSMAN. By Rowland Grey. Just ready. Leatherette gilt, 1s. 6d.; cloth gilt, gilt edges, 2s. With 2 Full-page Illustrations by MONTAGUE BARSTOW.

"A clever, well-written story. It is the study of the man of success and the man of failure."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Compares very favourably with the writer's 'The Power of the Dog.' It deals sympathetically with the fortunes of a poor playwright. Readers cannot but be interested in his love story and even in his play."—The Bookman.

"Of special literary excellence.....Its human interest is particularly strong."

Dundee Courier.

NEW POPULAR SHILLING NOVELS.

At all Booksellers' and Railway Bookstalls, &c.

PHILIP BENNION'S DEATH. By Richard MARSH.

FALSE EVIDENCE. By E. Phillips Oppenheim.

CAMP and BARRACK. By W. Ferrars Auburn

London: WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, Salisbury Square, E.C.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

COMPARATIVE VALUE OF FOODS.

SHOWN BY THE HEIGHT OF THE FIGURES BELOW.

EACH OF THE THREE COLUMNS REPRESENTS SIXTEEN OUNCES.

The accompanying sketch shows at a glance the remarkable pre-eminence of CADBURY'S Cocoa in point of nutritive value as compared with other important articles of daily food.

A recent careful Analysis of the Three Standard Foods to which the Illustration relates has proved that CADBURY'S Cocoa is far and away the richest in constituents that are

FLESH-forming,
FORCE generating,
HEAT-producing,

BONE-making,
and BLOOD-preserving.

It has in addition been shown that One-Shillingsworth of CADBURY'S Cocoa contains as much nourishment as can be obtained for Three Shillings spent on some of the best meat extracts.

The LANCET refers to CADBURY'S Cocoa as representing "the standard of highest purity": and the Editor of the MEDICAL MAGAZINE writes:—"CADBURY'S is, without exception, the favourite Cocoa of the day. We are glad to give it the highest praise."

PURE Cocoa is a perfect food, the addition of drugs and alkalies deteriorates it. The Public should be wary of mixtures, and the plausible arguments used to promote their sale.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1897.

No. 1318, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

WHEN war is over the war correspondents' books arrive. To Mr. Wilfred Pollock's War and a Wheel and Mr. Clive Bigham's With the Turkish Army in Thessaly succeeds Mr. W. Kinnaird Rose's With the Greeks in Thessaly. Mr. Rose went out to Greece as Reuter's special correspondent in the late war, and his despatches were certainly among the most complete and vivid sent home. Mr. Rose's description of the stampede to Larissa won the praise of many critics. He now embodies his despatches in a book, and explains that "in the descriptions of the various engagements of which I was a witness—I had almost said in which I had taken part—there is little amplification of the originals forwarded by telegraph, and which were generally written on the field, while the picture was vivid and the atmosphere of battle was still round me." Mr. Rose thus describes the situation at the outset of his work:

"My instructions were to proceed with all possible speed to the Thessalian frontier, and there wait events. Colonel Vasso's expedition to Crete had forced the hands of the Great Powers in relation to that cradle of Greek revolt against the deliberate government by massacre by the unspeakable Turk. Moreover, it gave dramatic interest to the heroic efforts of the Cretan Greeks rightly struggling to be free. The Sultan, prohibited by the blockade of the International fleet from landing his Asiatic hordes on the gem of the Egean Archipelago, was pouring into Macedonia battalion after battalion of Anatolian troops, and marshalling his Moslem hosts along the Thessalian frontier and in the defiles of Epirus.

"From the house-tops of the Chancelleries of Europe proclamation was made that the dogs of war would not be unleashed, and that peace would be maintained at all hazards. Yet few students of Eastern politics believed in their heart of hearts in this vain cry. While optimist diplomats called 'peace' came the moaning echo of 'no peace' from the mountains of Crete, from the snow-mantled shoulders of Olympus, the peaks and passes of Kassia which divide Macedonia from Thessaly, and the blue and white crests of the Pindus range which cuts Epirus from Northern Greece. The air was charged with the electric forces of battle, and the only question was when the war-cloud would burst. My object was to be on the scene ere it precipitated."

The book contains numerous spirited illustrations by Mr. W. T. Maud, the artist commissioned by the Graphic.

It would be interesting to compile a bibliography of books which have sprung into existence as the direct or indirect consequence of recent phases of politics in the Near East. The list would be a long one. So large a question as the destiny of the Mohammedan religion has not been thought too large to raise. Mohammedanism: Has it any Future? is the title of a small book to which the Right Rev. W. Boyd Carpenter contributes an introduction. The author, the Rev. C. H. Robinson, Lecturer in Hausa at Cambridge, offers two justifications for his book:

"First, the acute stage which the Eastern Question has now reached in Europe and Western Asia, coincident as it is with the rapid opening out of what will soon cease to be the Dark Continent of Africa, has drawn the attention of many to the influence which Mohammedanism is exerting in these countries who would not have been likely to take an interest in it from any merely theological standpoint; secondly, the object in view is different from that of most of the books which have been published, in that I propose to say very little as to the truth or falsehood or as to the spiritual power of Mohammedanism, but to confine myself almost entirely to the practical side of the matter, and to suggest some facts which may help to answer the two questions: (1) To what extent is Mohammedanism a civilising power in the world to-day? and (2) What is to be the future of Mohammedanism? Is it or is it not likely that Christian missions will ever make any impression upon it?"

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. add to their beautiful "Parnassus Library of Greek and Latin Texts" Sophocles Tragedies, edited by Mr. Robert Yelverton Tyrrell. Mr. Tyrrell has adopted many of Prof. Jebb's emendations, and so often does he mention the name of this scholar that he soon drops into calling him "J." Mr. Tyrrell pays the following tribute to Prof. Jebb's work:

"The more one studies Sophocles, the more one admires J.'s method and appreciates its results. He does not, like the Germans, and like some Germanised British scholars, ascribe to the poet what he himself would have written, but asks himself what Sophocles wrote. If he allowed himself to use the vicious method of the German school, he would easily surpass his foreign rivals in the art of polishing Greek verses into conformity with modern ideas of taste and elegance. J. is a master of the art of Greek and Latin verse-writing, an accomplishment which is hardly ever acquired abroad, and never to the perfection which English scholars, and foremost among them all J., have attained."

The "Temple Classics" now include Chapman's version of Homer's Odyssey. Chapman's Odyssey was first published in 1614. In the present edition "old grammatical forms have been retained; and the spelling has been kept where it testifies to the old pronunciation, or, in brief, wherever the editor deemed this could be done without pedantry." Chapman's own introduction, which takes the form of a dedicatory letter to the Earl of Somerset, is printed in the first volume. It is pleasant to quote his fat Elizabethan English:

"The return of a man into his country is his whole scope and object; which in itself, your Lordship may well say, is jejune and fruitless enough, affording nothing fearful, nothing magnificent. And yet even this doth the divine inspiration render vast, illustrious, and of miraculous composure. And for this, my Lord, is this poem preferred to his Iliads; for therein much magnificence, both of person and action, gives great aid to his industry; but in this are these helps exceeding sparing, or nothing; and yet is the structure so elaborate and pompous, that the poor plain groundwork, considered together, may seem the naturally rich womb to it, and produce it needfully."

We have received Practical Astrology, by Alan Leo, a work issued from the office of Modern Astrology. The writer informs his readers that "the time has come when the Chaldean and Assyrian religions shall be once more revealed, and the truth with regard to our destiny as told by the stars unfolded." Mr. Leo also assures us that "the rules given will enable the reader by very little practice to unravel the great mystery of life."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.

A CATALOGUE OF THE WASHINGTON COLLECTION IN THE BOSTON ATHENÆUM. Compiled and annotated by Appleton P. C. Griffin. With an Appendix by William Coolidge Lane. The Boston Athenæum.

POETRY.

FUGITIVE LINES. By Henry Jerome Stockard. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 4s.

FICTION.

THE CHARMING WIDOW: A DOMESTIC TRIFLE. By Clarence Hamlyn. The Roxburghe Press. 6d.

GOOD MRS. HYPOCRITE: A STUDY IN SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS. By "Rita." Hutchinson & Co. 3s. 6d.

AN ALTRUIST. By Ouida. T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. 6d.

A SEA-SIDE FLIRT. By John Strange Winter. F. V. White & Co. 1s.

THE COMING OF CLEO. By Mrs. Hungerford. F. V. White & Co.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

HORNE'S GUIDE TO WHITBY. Horne & Son (Whitby).

EDUCATIONAL.

THE TUTORIAL TRIGONOMETRY. By William Briggs, M.A., and G. H. Bryan, Sc.D. W. B. Clive. 3s. 6d.

THE UNIVERSITY TUTORIAL SERIES: EUCLID, BOOKS I.-IV. By Rupert Deakin, M.A. W. B. Clive.

THE REIGNS FROM THE CONQUEST IN RHYMES FOR A CHILD. By William Knight, M.A. Simpkin, Marshall. 1s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HOMBURG AND ITS WATERS. By Nathaniel Edward Yorke-Davies. Sampson Low. 1s. 6d.

FORMER REMINISCENCES. By the Author of "Desultory Retracings." Gardner, Darton & Co.

WITH THE GREEKS IN THESSALY. By W. Kinnaird Rose. Methuen & Co. 6s.

PRACTICAL ASTROLOGY. By Alan Leo. Offices of Modern Astrology. 3s. 6d.

NOTES AND NEWS.

A CIRCULAR just issued by the Kelm-scott Press makes its very clear that persons wishing to obtain the forthcoming volumes must be quick to act. Of Sire Degraumont, indeed, all copies have been sold in advance, and a large proportion of the editions of Sire Isambard and Sigurd the Vol-sung and the Fall of the Niblungs, has already gone. The Sundering Flood, Mr. Morris's last romance, Two Specimen Pages of Froissart, and Love is Enough, printed in three colours, are the other publications to be expected. Finally, it is announced that a complete set of Kelm-scott books, numbering forty-nine volumes, including the Chaucer, is now priced at £650.

PROF. KNIGHT's reminiscences of conversation with Tennyson, which he contributes to Blackwood, contain some good stories of Scotch innkeepers. After Tennyson had left an inn in the island of Skye, the landlord was asked, Did he know who had been staying in his house? It was the poet Tennyson. He replied, "Lor'—to think o' that! and sure I thought he was a shentleman!" Near Stirling the same remark was made to the keeper of the hotel where he had stayed. "Do you ken who you had wi' you t'other night?" "Naa; but he was a plessant shentleman." "It was Tennyson, the poet." "An' wha' may he be?" "Oh, he is a writer o' verses, sich as ye see i' the papers." "Noo, to think o' that! jeest a pooblic writer, and I gied him ma best bedroom!" Of Mrs. Tennyson, however, the landlord remarked, "Oh! but she was an angel."

NOTHING very extraordinary is recorded by Prof. Knight, but Tennyson made some interesting statements. This, for example, may be found discouraging by editors of classics: "I don't care a bit for various readings from the poets," he said, "although I have changed my own text a good deal. I like to enjoy the book I am reading, and footnotes distract me. I like to read, and I just read straight on."

MR. LANG, it seems, is not the only sufferer under the generous minor poet. Tennyson asked Prof. Knight for advice as to what should be done with books that were sent to him, adding, "I have several every day, chiefly books of poetry or rhyme. I wish they would rather send me prose. I calculate, by the number of verses which the books contain, that I get a verse for every three minutes of my life; and the worst of it is that nearly all the writers expect me to answer and acknowledge them!" A verse for every three minutes of life is very bad. Nulla dies sine linea is a sufficiently trying rule to live by.

DR. JAMES LEGGE, the veteran professor of Chinese at Oxford, who, by reason of his great age, and the extreme caution necessitated thereby, is not able to lecture so frequently as he desires, is nevertheless one of the hardest workers in the University.

For many years he has commenced his day's task at three o'clock in the morning, and by such assiduity he has been able to do much more than his share in the work of demonstrating to Western peoples the greatness of the earlier Eastern literatures. Twelve large volumes now stand to his name, his most important work having been done in connexion with the text of Confucianism for the Sacred Books of the East. Prof. Legge is now preparing for delivery next term two lectures upon the illustrious Pan family, two members of which wrote in the first century of this era a history of the dynasty which has given to the Chinese the title "Children of Han." On the death of the eldest son of this family, the Emperor commissioned the daughter to complete the work left unfinished by his sister, and, further, made her companion to the Empress and instructress of the Court ladies. It is worthy of note that, while we do not possess a translation of the work in English, the French have forestalled us in this as in so many other matters relating to Oriental research.

THE Anglo-Russian, a new organ of friendliness, announces that as the result of a visit paid by the editor to Mr. Meredith, an article upon that novelist's views of Russian fiction and Russian women will appear in a forthcoming number.

MR. KIPLING's Captains Courageous has appeared as a feuilleton in a Russian periodical. A story by Mr. Jerome, entitled New Utopia, was published in the June number of the literary supplement to the Niva. As the story, says the Anglo-Russian, is a satirical criticism of socialism, no trace of the censor's pencil was visible.

THE Western Mail has unearthed a very nice example of the manner in which great authors are injured in order that little people may learn. It is contained in the question from an Intermediate School examination paper: "Write out in your own words the meaning of the following passage:

"'Bridget Elia has been my housekeeper for many a long year. I have obligations to Bridget extending beyond the period of memory. We house together, old bachelor and maid, in a sort of double singleness; with such tolerable comfort upon the whole that I for one find in myself no sort of disposition to go out upon the mountains, with the rash king's offspring, to bewail my celibacy.'"

As our contemporary points out, apart from the needlessness of extracting passages from Lamb for school use, there is the question of discretion.

AN Italian professor has just completed a remarkable effort of memory and endurance. He has recited, in a continuous sitting of twenty hours, the whole of the Divine Comedy of Dante without once needing the prompter's aid. We sympathise with the audience, but the professor has our sincere admiration. It would be better, of course, that such feats were avoided, but, once begun, it is well that they finish so creditably. The Daily News is reminded by this incident of a gentleman who engaged St. Martin's Hall some years ago for the recital of Paradise Lost. But that was in a series of sittings.

THE youthful historian lisp in numbers. Before he reaches Dr. Collier and Mrs. Markham en route for Macaulay and Froude, Mr. Lecky and Mr. Gardiner, he has recourse to rhyme. The couplets of the school differ:

"In ten hundred sixty-six Did Conquest Norman William fix"— that is one summary of William the First's accomplishment, and many of our readers will be able to supply others from memory. Now comes Mr. William Knight with a new series. Reigns in Rhyme is the title of his little book, which aims, we suppose, at superseding the above historical poets, most of whom are nameless.

MR. KNIGHT is not persistently given to the couplet. When he comes to Elizabeth and our own Queen, he fills a page, but in the main his stories, like those in the dictionary, are "unco' short." Thus, Henry I.: "Next Henry, who the name of Beauclerk bore;
For children sunk at sea he sorrowed sore."

Rossetti, who was not an historian, made, it may be recollected, more of this incident than Mr. Knight does. Richard II.'s reign is cursory too:

"A second Richard. Wat the tyler rose,
'Twas Bolingbroke who did the King depose."

Mr. Knight is more communicative about Edward VI.:

"His son, sixth Edward, young to hold the helm,
Had Somerset Protector of the Realm.
The Act of Uniformity was passed,
And Somerset beheaded at the last.
The King successor in his sister's stead Appointed Lady Jane. She lost her head."

The climax is very sudden. These rhymes, however, may certainly be found useful as pegs on which to land a large bundle of facts concerning each reign.

So much for Mr. Knight's simple manner. But to show us that he is not always so transparent and monosyllabic a bard, and that when he likes he can soar with the best of them, he has prefixed to the volume a sonnet to a baby. To write a sonnet to a baby seems unnecessary, but for such a sonnet as this Mr. Knight ought to come under the notice of Mr. Waugh's society:

"Far from the orbs a mystic effluence,
Comes echoing æry through the vast immense,
And, palpitant of memories from the years,
Within the holies' holiest of the sense
May wake a spirit unto prescience,
As oft as Echo answering inly stirs."

That is the sextet. We ought to be told how the baby took it, and why it prefaces Reigns in Rhyme.

MEANWHILE an American rhymester has also had his eye on history. In the Boston Literary World we find a review of a very remarkable book, entitled The Eagleid, an Epic Poem; or, The Causes Which Led to the War of 1812 Between the United States and Great Britain, with the Principal Events Thereof Rhythmically Related. The author is Mr. William H. Bryan, a poet with an extraordinary fondness for accentuating final syllables. In the accomplishment of such a work as this epic it is, of course, necessary to give a character-sketch of the English. Mr. Bryan does this in the following passage, with its notably emphatic close :

"Such the conduct of th' unnatural Bull,— Cross-grained, crusty, crotchety, and full
Of malice, megrims, and much bile secreted,
Obstinate, arrogant, and conceited :
In constant dudgeon raised his broad back,
And equally protruding his high stomach."
Were the English ever better hit off ?

MAJOR MARTIN HUME has been commissioned by the Cambridge University Press to write a new History of Spain for the Cambridge Historical Series. The introductory chapters will be contributed by Mr. Armstrong, Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford.

A NEW illustrated edition of Dante's "Pilgrim's Progress," by the late Mrs. Russell Gurney, is to be published in the early autumn by Mr. Elliot Stock.

MR. TOM GALLON, whose first novel, Tatterley, was given a warm welcome by readers with old-fashioned sentiments, has completed another story, called A Prince of Mischance.

THE first edition of Mr. Hall Caine's new story, The Christian, will consist of fifty thousand copies.

ACCORDING to the Bookman there is a possibility that Mark Twain will, before long, give the world his autobiography. To some extent he has already done so, although the chapters are scattered over many volumes. But the autobiography of popular writers may be written continuously and repeatedly without offence—witness the late Mr. Sala's garrulous career.

MESSRS. HORNE & SON, of Whitby, write to inform us that Whitby, Past and Present—upon the printing and format of which our reviewer made some strictures last week—was not produced at Whitby, nor by them. Messrs. Horne & Son's name appears, with another, on the title-page, but only as agents for the book at Whitby. We regret the mistake which our reviewer made in supposing that Messrs. Horne & Son were responsible for the faults which he pointed out, and which undoubtedly existed. The book was produced in London. We may add that Messrs. Horne & Son send us the fifth edition, just published, of their Guide to Whitby, a cloth-bound book of some 200 pages. This is free from the defects of the other work, and is, in fact, notably well printed, both as regards type and illustrations.

A FIVE-SHILLING edition of Mr. Austin Dobson's poems, selected by himself from the volumes now in existence—Old World Idylls, At the Sign of the Lyre, and Poems on Several Occasions, a two-volume edition which appeared in 1895—will be published in October. Mr. Dobson's first volume of poetry appeared in 1873.

MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

THE supreme quality of Maeterlinck's prose is its soft whispering charm. It eludes analysis or definition, being something vague, intangible, unintellectual as the divagations of a dream; but, as in a dream, it holds you in an emotional grip, by the intense power of suggestion, by the beauty of an almost barbarous simplicity: the innocence of childhood, something of its unintelligible precocity, its radiant directness, pervade all the works of this young Belgian dreamer and sage. It has been remarked that M. Maeterlinck is extremely modest: more surprised than anyone by the clamour round his name. This description fits admirably with the musing tone, the delicate murmur of mysticism that run through his books. There is nothing strong, ripe, or self-assertive about this quaint, precocious child. He talks in a vague persistent way about his own and his neighbour's soul with the gravity of a sage transformed into a saint, and there is a dim, but extremely sweet and winning, nobility in each of the inarticulate aspects of his spiritual development.

For the revelation of personal charm, his gathered essays, in their original, murmuring, musical form, Le Trésor des Humbles, have not been surpassed in recent times. The book must not be approached as a spiritual guide, though this was its evident purpose, for it enunciates not a coherent idea or counsel, contains not a practical phrase, but it leads insensibly to the heights through the exquisite cadences of broken speech, of soft suggestive musing, of fluted nothings spread largely among little sudden words of wisdom, as wise as the deeps of life, that peer out of the helpless flutterings of the poet's soul, with all the curious simplicity and gravity of childhood's gaze.

For Maeterlinck begins and ends a child, supreme, simple, and sincere within his limitations. Now and then he writes a phrase philosophy itself might envy, and then he ceases to think, and abandons himself to unintellectual emotion, which sways him and his readers too exclusively. Emotion is his narcotic, which has become a vice, and his strongest effects are produced by a dexterous cultivation of emotional capacity. Reason never preoccupies him. His own confession of faith he places in the mouth of Aglavaine:

"Ah, how little it means being in the right! I believe it is better to be in the wrong all one's life, and not cause those who are not in the right to weep. I know all that can be said on the other side, but why say it, since we know that it could not change in the least a profounder truth that would not approve of our fine words. Only listen to that which is not concerned with phrases. What directs our life, in spite of all our words and actions, is the simplicity of things, and error lies wherever there is a struggle against what is simple."

What is simple! This is all the object of Maeterlinck's worship. It is carried to exaggeration, as most faiths are, unassisted by reason. Before the little surprises of our daily life, he seems to hear the wave of eternity above the horizon, and fatality lies in the wink of an eyelid. He finely asks himself in that most subtle and suggestive of essays, Le Tragique Quotidien: "Must we absolutely roar like the Atrides for an eternal God to show Himself in our life, and does He never come and sit beneath the immobility of our lamp?" What could be intenser than the amount of tragic meaning he has managed to concentrate in the commonplace terror of the blind men and women in the forest? He, by the very crudity of his art and the simplicity of the situation, creates a powerful thrill many deeply tragic situations have failed to arouse. His phrases, like those of a lisping child—iterated, broken, bald—have much of the indescribable mysteriousness of falling water in the dusk, of the sough of branches when the wind shudders along the hill-tops at night, of the monotonous plash of waves along a silent shore. Feeling, not thought, travels purposelessly across a dim landscape, where everything is fearfully indistinct, and tears are never far from the dim actors' eyes. Intellectually as unsubstantial as moonrays, of no bracing quality, often, too often, lacking the commonplace virtue of coherence; but what a power of mysterious vision accentuating the inevitable approach of misfortune in little undecorative, unpicturesque words! Take that living drama, "Intérieur," where the action is merely observed by a few personages outside the lighted window, who describe what passes. Peasants are carrying across the field to an unsuspecting household the corpse of the eldest daughter, who has committed suicide. Within all is peace and domestic content, faces smiling round the lamp. The two younger sisters approach the window, and gaze out into obscurity. The old man outside says:

"They are walking across the meadow. They look so small that one can hardly distinguish them from the grass; one might take them for children playing by moonlight; and if they (the sisters looking out) could see them they would not understand. Let them turn their backs upon them, they approach all the same with each step, and misfortune is increasing, now nearly two hours. They cannot prevent its growth, and those who bring it can no longer arrest it. It is their master also, and they must perforce serve it. It has its aim and it follows its path. It is indefatigable, and has but one idea; they must lend it their force; they are sorrowful, but they come; they are full of pity, but they must advance."

And again, glancing within, he cries:

"I am nearly eighty-three, and it is the first time that the sight of life has struck me. I know not why everything they do seems so strange and grave. They await nightfall simply beneath their lamp as we might await it beneath ours; and yet I feel that I behold them from the height of another world, because I know a little truth that they do not yet know. . . . I did not know that there was something so sad in life, and that it frightens those who look on. . . . They think nothing can happen because they have closed their door, and do not know that something is ever happening in the soul, and that the world does not end at the doors of our houses. . . . They are so sure of their little life, while I, poor old man, here, two steps off their door, I hold all their happiness, like a sick bird, between my withered hands, which I dare not open."

This is surely the speech of a visionary child, but it is all Maeterlinck. Pity and tenderness form the essential note, with, for art, flashes of insight and dramatic vision, the whole wrapped in a quaint setting of melody and moonray.

The appearance of Aglavaine et Sélysette has definitely settled the question of Maeterlinck's serious claims in modern literature. Here we leave iteration and thin fantastic speech. We have something considerably stronger than a mere dexterous appeal to unintelligent emotion and a latent mystical sensuousness. Defined character—along with definite speech, a substantial tenderness and beauty, vivid conception and solid thought—comes to surprise us, with a fuller development of charm and grace. The dramatist has stepped out of the atmosphere of diluted platonism and empty musing into an upper world of suffering and love. Sélysette, pale, wounded little bird, is a witching creation that only a hand so delicate and soft and pure as the dreamy Maeterlinck's could draw. A figure of divine childhood in an exquisite woman's form. In this beautiful drama of three hearts, it is the simple Sélysette, the child-wife, who acts the noblest part, while the two, husband and brilliant friend, whose mutual but not guilty love have killed her, are left aghast before the ruin of that same love above which she triumphs in death. The play abounds in memorable lines and little evocative phrases. The art is accomplished, and the impression is not so much tragic as mournful. Even Sélysette's first prick of jealousy has no touch of bitterness. Both women, the strong and the delicate, the brilliantly intellectual and the merely tender-hearted, are rivals in magnanimity, and each desires the other's happiness with the man each loves. Sélysette believes her death will consecrate the happiness of her husband and her friend, while her husband, crushed by the misery of his doing, can only moan:

"I believe no longer, and all my sorrow is transformed to disgust. I spit upon beauty that brings about misfortune. I spit upon reason that would appear too fair. I spit upon destiny which will admit nothing. I spit upon words which deceive the animal, and I spit upon life which listens not to life."

What could be prettier than the picture of Sélysette's childhood the grandmother recalls when the unhappy smiling girl comes to bid her a last farewell before casting herself upon death's bosom?

"You came, you went, you laughed along the halls; then you opened the doors, crying in a terrified voice, 'She is coming, she is coming, she is there!' And nobody knew who you meant in frightening yourself thus; you did not know yourself; but I also feigned a great terror, and I went with you down the long corridors as far as the threshold of the garden. All that was little enough, my child, and had no aim whatever; but we understood one another, and we smiled day and night. Thus it was, thanks to thee, I was a mother once more when I was no longer fair; and one day you will learn that women are never weary of being mothers, and that they would nurse death itself if it came and slept in their lap."

Profound word with which to end a delightful passage. But throughout all this captivating book there is depth as well as an indescribable charm. Whatever may be thought of La Princesse Maleine, nobody will deny that this is literature.

HANNAH LYNCH.

THE LONDON OF THE WRITERS.

GUIDE-BOOK quotations are usually so loose or hackneyed that it is pleasant to find that in London and Environs (DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS) Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Cook have brightened their pages with quotations carefully chosen and transcribed. We are shown the London of our writers as well as the London that hums under today's sun. Of course some of Mrs. Cook's quotations—for it is to Mrs. Cook, we believe, that we should credit them—are of the old brigade. But then they have not been beaten. You cannot resent the thousandth repetition of Spenser's description of the Temple—precious rather as a description of the river—

"Those brick towers

The which on Thames' broad-aged back do ride,
Where now the studious lawyers have their bowers,

There whilom wont the Templar knights to bide,
Till they decayed through pride."

These have always seemed to us to be the lines to have in mind when looking at the river. The "aged back" of the stream, and the "whilom" that was even then distant, give the right note, leading us to place the antiquity of London in its river and its ships. Dean Stanley well wrote:

"The river is, in a deeper and truer sense than was intended by Gray, when he used the phrase, our Father Thames. . . . Here, from the earliest times, the coracles of the British tribes, the galleys of the Roman armies, were moored, and gave to the place the most probable origin of its name—the 'City of Ships.' Thus the Thames is the parent of London."

Everyone knows that Denham's line, "Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full," was inspired by the Thames.

"Oh could I flow like thee, and make thy stream

My great example, as it is my theme!

Though deep yet clear, though gentle yet not dull,

Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full."

A brisk passage in Fielding's Voyage to Lisbon, which is not quoted by Mr. Cook, is worth recalling, as a correction of the notion, still common enough, that the river's beauty is to be sought only above London:

"The morning was fair and bright, and we had a passage thither [to Gravesend] I think as pleasant as can be conceived; for take it with all its advantages, particularly the number of fine ships you are always sure of seeing by the way, there is nothing to equal it in all the rivers of the world. The yards of Deptford and Woolwich are noble sights. . . . We saw likewise several Indiamen just returned from their voyage. . . . The colliers likewise, which are very numerous, and even assemble in fleets, are ships of great bulk; and if we descend to those used in the American, African, and European trades, and pass through those which visit our own coasts, to the small craft that plie between Chatham and the Tower, the whole forms a most pleasing object to the eye, as well as highly warming to the heart of an Englishman."

Perhaps only a Frenchman could be warmed by Shadwell. M. Taine's recent book of travel jottings in Brittany, Carnets de Voyage, proved, to the surprise even of his own countrymen, how fine an eye he carries up and down the world. Shadwell at its dullest, the river at its shabbiest, could inspire M. Taine to write as follows:

"I was at the corner of Shadwell basin, and I gazed upon the slate-coloured river before me, shining and exhaling mist; the northern bank winds and bounds the horizon with its blackish fringe mottled with red; a few vessels descend with the supple and slow movement of a sea-bird; their sombre hulls and brown sails balance themselves upon the water, which simmers. To north and south a mass of ships raise their crowded masts. The silence is almost complete; one hears but the strokes of distant hammers, the vague tinkle of a bell, and the fluttering of birds in the trees. A Dutch painter, Van der Heyden, Bakhuizen, would have taken pleasure in beholding this plain of water, the distant tones of brick and tar, this uncertain horizon where stretch the sleeping clouds. I have seen nothing more picturesque in London."

Another Frenchman who has travelled England with a keen and kindly gaze, M. Gabriel Mourey, has given his impression of the Tower Bridge. M. Mourey sees in this water-gate of London "a colossal symbol of the British genius."

"Like that genius, the Bridge struck me as built on lines of severe simplicity—harmonious, superbly balanced, without exaggeration or emphasis—sober architecture, yet with reasonable audacities—signifying its end with that clearness which is the hall-mark of everything English. It wonderfully completes the seething landscape of quays and docks, and the infernal activity of the greatest port in the world."

But it is time to go ashore. From the many fine things that have been written about modern London Mrs. Cook selects a passage of Lowell's which has the felicity and conciseness that only a practised writer can be trusted to bring to such a theme:

"I confess that I never think of London, which I love, without thinking of that palace which David built for Bathsheba, sitting in hearing of one hundred streams—streams of thought, of intelligence, of activity. One other thing about London impresses me beyond any other sound I have ever heard, and that is the low, unceasing roar one hears always in the air; it is not a mere accident, like a tempest or a cataract, but it is impressive because it indicates human will and impulse and conscious movement; and I confess that when I hear it I almost feel as if I were listening to the roaring loom of time."

With this we may link Browning's suggestion of the size, the chaos, and the harmony of London seen from St. Paul's:

"Over the ball of it,
Peering and prying,
How I see all of it,
Life there outlying!
Roughness and smoothness,
Shine and defilement,
Grace and uncouthness:
One reconciliation."

Hawthorne liked the blackness of St. Paul's, and its calm amid the surrounding bustle. "Other edifices may crowd close to its foundation, and people may tramp as they like about it, but still the great Cathedral is as quiet and serene as if it stood in the midst of Salisbury Plain."

Westminster and its Abbey have inspired passages of prose and poetry which, on their merits, are worthy to be known by heart. Wordsworth's Westminster Bridge sonnet belongs to London as a whole. One of the noblest passages about the Abbey is little known, and Mr. Cook does not quote it; it occurs in Tickell's lines on the funeral of Addison, who was buried there at dead of night. Very fine is Tickell's description of how he was borne "through rows of warriors and through walks of kings"—Addison, who had written of the Abbey in his own clear English—so cool beside Macaulay's rhetorical passage—these words:

"When I look upon the tombs of the great, every emotion of envy dies in me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out. . . . When I see kings lying by those who deposed them, when I consider rival wits placed side by side, or the holy men that divided with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, the factions, and debates of mankind."

But Addison's and Waller's and Macaulay's and Washington Irving's references to Westminster may give place to Shakespearean simplicity:

"Methought I sate in seat of majesty
In the Cathedral Church of Westminster,
And in that chair where kings and queens are crowned."

There the Abbey rises royal and clear and significant, and in the slow monosyllabic movement of the last line we hear the march and pomp of history.

Charing Cross, the Strand, and Fleet-street belong to Johnson and Lamb; Johnson would have agreed with Lamb that "the man must have a rare recipe for melancholy who can be dull in Fleet-street," and Lamb would have chimed in with Johnson's remark that the full tide of existence is at Charing Cross. Pall Mall has for eulogists Gay and Capt. Charles Morris, the one exclaiming—

"Oh, bear me to the paths of fair Pell Mell, Safe are thy pavements, grateful is thy smell"

—and the other praying to be restored its "sweet shady side." Piccadilly's poet is the late Mr. Locker-Lampson. Mrs. Cook quotes his verse:

"Gay shops, stately palaces, bustle and breeze,
The whirring of wheels, and the murmur of trees,
By night or by day, whether noisy or stilly,
Whatever my mood is—I love Piccadilly."

M. Taine's praise of Piccadilly is particularly generous:

"In Piccadilly . . . there is a bustling crowd, a surging traffic, an amount of obstruction which our busiest and most frequented boulevard cannot parallel. . . . Everything is on a large scale here: the clubs are palaces, the hotels are monuments."

M. Taine might well be glad to escape into

St. James's Park and find in it "a genuine piece of country, and of English country." This description would apply much better to Regent's Park, "with its depths of real country," as, indeed, by a coincidence, another Frenchman describes it. But, of course, Kensington Gardens come nearer than either to "English country": witness Matthew Arnold's:

"In this lone open glade I lie,
Screen'd by deep boughs on either hand,
And at its end, to stay the eye,
Those black-crown'd, red-boled pine-trees stand."

Was it pure mischief that led Mr. Cook to quote below this verse Disraeli's rococo tribute to the same retreat? We transcribe it ourselves out of a certain enjoyment of its faded-plush style:

"The inhabitants of London are scarcely sufficiently sensible of the beauty of its environs. On every side the most charming retreats open to them. . . . In exactly ten minutes it is in the power of every man to free himself from all the tumult of the world: the pangs of love, the throbs of ambition, the wear and tear of play, the recriminating boudoir, the conspiring club, the rattling hell; and find himself in a sublime sylvan solitude superior to the cedars of Lebanon, and inferior only in extent to the chestnut forests of Anatolia. It is Kensington Gardens that is almost the only place that has realised his idea of the forests of Spenser and Ariosto."

And now we talk of running a railway beneath Kensington Gardens!

THE BOOK MARKET.

CRICKET BOOKS.

THE event of next week in the book trade will be the publication on the 9th of Prince Ranjitsinhji's Jubilee Book of Cricket. The work is regarded by booksellers as a plum. Three editions will be issued simultaneously. There will be, first, an Edition de Luxe. This will be limited to 350 copies in crown quarto, printed on hand-made paper, and bound in buckram. There will be 22 photogravures and 85 full-page plates. Each copy in this edition will be signed by the author, and the price will be £5 5s. The two other editions will be sold at 25s. and 6s. respectively. The work is divided into eleven chapters. These deal with such branches of the subject as Training and Outfit, Fielding, Bowling, Batting, Captaincy, &c. The whole work is not from the Prince's pen: Mr. W. J. Ford contributes chapters on Public School Cricket, and Cambridge University Cricket, and Mr. Thomas Case writes on Oxford University Cricket. County Cricket is treated by various writers, and the whole concludes with a chapter on Cricket and the Victorian Era.

Gathering these particulars from a prospectus lying on the counter of a leading bookseller, I turned to him and said: "How do you regard cricket books, considered as stock?"

"Oh, we do a large business in them. A good cricket book always sells."

"And what do you consider have been the good cricket books of the last few years?"

"Well, this of Prince Ranjitsinhji's will create the most interest."

"You are giving a large order?"

"Oh, yes, for all three editions."

"And what other cricket books are selling?"

"The Badminton volume by Mr. A. G. Steel and the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton and others, of course, still goes. Murdoch's little shilling book on Cricket, in the "Oval" series, has always been a favourite. Abel's book went well, too, at the time it appeared. Daft's Kings of Cricket sold excellently at half-a-crown."

"What about W. W. Read's Annals of Cricket?"

"It is a good book, but of course mainly historical and statistical, and therefore not so popular as a book dealing with the action of the game."

"Then, let me see, Mr. Arrowsmith published some pretty books: How's That? The County Championship, and Told in the Pavilion—how did they succeed?"

"Very fairly."

"And Christian's At the Sign of the Wicket?"

"Yes, that's a good book."

"What else is there?"

"Well, you know, Mr. David Nutt brought out Nyren's Young Cricketer's Tutor at a shilling. Here it is; we still keep it well in sight."

"Do you consider there is any glut of cricket books?"

"Oh, dear, no. I should order any new cricket book of merit."

DRAMA.

THE interest of the American melodrama "Secret Service" has been such, that, the New York company who brought it hither having this week gone home, it has been taken up by Mr. William Terriss, Miss Millward, and the other members of the Adelphi company, and played in English fashion without any apparent loss of popularity. This is a curious and interesting fact, for two reasons. In the first place, Mr. Gillette's play is the very negation of the description of sentiment which has been as the breath of life to melodrama for many years; and secondly, it ignores another dramatic principle of equal importance and of still greater venerability, namely, "comic relief." From the days of Dion Boucicault and Watts-Phillips, the creators of the realistic play, there has never been seen a cardinal situation in which the hero of melodrama did not pose in order to capture the plaudits of the groundlings. He had a manner which might fairly be described as larger than life. At moments when baser mortals would be tempted to parley with evil he would draw himself up to his full height, proudly place his hand upon his heart, and in so many words exclaim: "Never! You may take my life, but my honour shall remain inviolable." The late Mr. Henry Pettitt was fond of making his juvenile lover strike an heroic attitude, and Mr. G. R. Sims and other masters of the craft have followed in his footsteps. It has always been an un-failing bid for applause. But lo! in "Secret Service" Mr. Gillette not only avoids this trick, but runs into the opposite extreme. For heroics he substitutes the calmest intonation in the world, the very reverse of the "high falutin'." Thus his hero, Captain Thornton, is a Northern spy, acting in the City of Richmond during its siege by the Northern forces during the Civil War. According to rule, he falls in love with a daughter of the enemy—for here the author is necessarily conventional. In due time he is recognised as a traitor and condemned by court-martial to be shot. The firing-party told off to execute him leave their muskets stacked for a few moments—a rather stagey proceeding, it must be owned—and the opportunity is seized by a faithful henchman of the heroine's to withdraw the bullets so that her lover's life may be saved. Like the heroic young gentleman that he is, Captain Thornton, to whom the fact has been communicated, does not accept his life on such terms. He would live if his lady-love commanded him to do so; but she hesitates to speak the word. So far there is nothing new in the situation—any of Captain Thornton's predecessors in the heroic drama would have chosen death in his place. But mark how he exercises his choice. "Major," he calmly remarks to the officer of the firing-party, as the latter proceeds to carry out the sentence, "your men's muskets have been tampered with." The fatal words are uttered without the smallest attitudinising, without the slightest intonation to mark their importance; they are thrown off in a purely conversational and commonplace manner, as if the remark were the most natural in the world. Think how a hero of the older school would have acted in the circumstances! With what emphasis he would have made his avowal, and how instinctively he would have taken the centre of the stage to do it, so as to secure his round of applause! Mr. Gillette, who has been playing Captain Thornton, being actor as well as author, obtains his round of applause too, and that in no stinted measure—but by a different method.

THE suppression of "comic relief" is a bold step in melodrama. Of late years, Mr. Pinero and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, without discarding that element, have made a point of working it into the texture of their story; but in melodrama the rule has been to interlard it with the action as a tolerably distinct stratum of business, even at the expense of leaving some necessary question of the play in abeyance. Comic relief is as old as the drama itself. Shakespeare with his clowns resorted to it freely; and it occurs in the old Spanish drama where there was invariably a comic character flitting through the story, in it but not of it. This personage was called the gracioso, and his purpose was to relieve by his pleasantries the gloom of the piece if the action happened to be tragic. In the well-made melodrama of the day, French and English, the gracioso exists, though his function is somewhat changed. If during three acts out of four he leads a quasi-independent existence, with a love-affair of his own, he often becomes in the end an instrument for confounding the villain and securing the hero his rights.

FROM the success attending Mr. Gillette's new departure are we to assume that heroics and comic relief are henceforth exploded devices on the stage—tricks which have had their day, like the buttered slide of the Christmas clown? I am afraid this would be a rash assumption. Mr. Gillette has only pushed to an extreme a movement which has been noticeable on the stage for some years past, and which shows signs of waning rather than waxing—I refer to the tendency of actors to adopt what is called a "natural" mode of delivery and of stage managers to furnish their rooms with real furniture in place of a serviceable make-believe. As the two hours' traffic of the stage is not and cannot be real life, it is obvious that such reversions towards nature are capable of being overdone. A natural delivery is not always audible to the house, and real furniture in the several scenes not only causes long entr'actes, but conflicts with the supreme principle that everything on the stage must be done with reference to, and for the convenience of, the public in front, not the dramatis personæ. It is the unpardonable sin for an actor, for instance, to talk with his back to the house, though this might be his most natural position with regard to the persons he was addressing. In Paris there is already a movement (favoured by M. Francisque Sarcey and other authorities) for reverting to the older and more inflated style of diction; to which end it is proposed to revive a number of the masterpieces of the old Spanish drama, in rendering of which inflation is all-important. The Spaniards, indeed, have never descended to our "natural" level of acting. If they play a translation of a modern French comedy, they still adopt the panache of the old school, with, it must be confessed, occasionally some droll effects so far as the stranger is concerned, though this may be the stranger's fault as much as theirs. Mr. Gillette's play, with its naturalism in excess, is a curiosity, and has been regarded here as an interesting American product. Whether its ultra-prosaic style would have been as well received in a purely English play is a question. As a symptom of the reaction in Paris, it may be noted that a previously unknown actor, named Krauss, has been attracting attention during the past season at the Porte St. Martin by his performance, marked by something of the vigour of the old school, in "Don César de Bazan." He is, so far, however, the one swallow which does not make a summer. M. Sarcey and other veterans lament the almost complete disappearance from the French stage of the ornate and emphatic diction of the old school. Exactly the same state of things prevails in London. Except in melodrama, the English actor of the present day thinks it bad form to let himself go. He is afraid that his exuberance would be called rant. Nevertheless, the art of diction requires to be cultivated more than it is. A succession of plays written and acted on the model of "Secret Service" would probably have the effect of deteriorating it still further.

WITH reference to the Spanish gracioso and our "comic contryman," it is interesting to note an experience of the Italian stage communicated by a travelling correspondent to a Paris paper. The writer saw a piece in Naples where a character bearing a considerable resemblance to the gracioso, but dressed as a harlequin and known as pulcinello, wandered through the piece, advising, chaffing, or encouraging the other dramatis personæ. He had no written part. The actor was supposed to improvise his sallies, and came and went on the stage as he pleased. Moreover, while the other actors spoke good Italian, he talked the local dialect.

J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

WE shall probably hear more from Toronto of the theory respecting the age and permanence of the Arctic basin which Dr. Gregory has just put out as a feeler in Nature. Dr. Gregory has made his reputation as a geologist mainly in southern latitudes, but he has also conducted explorations in the Rocky Mountains of America, and his experience with the Conway expedition to Spitzbergen last year gives him undoubted right to come forward as an authority on Arctic geology. The subject, however, is a thorny one; and opinions have undergone so many changes in regard to it that any fresh dogmatic suggestion is likely to arouse a controversy.

BRIEFLY, Dr. Gregory's contentions are as follows: It used to be believed that the Arctic Ocean was a shallow basin containing much unexplored land. The soundings of the Fram have upset this view entirely, and now the tendency is to regard it as a deep and permanent ocean basin. If this view be correct, it carries with it the upheaval of many problems relating to British geology, which will now require fresh solutions. By way of averting this contingency, Dr. Gregory tries to show that the Arctic basin, though undeniably deep, may not have been of very long duration; that it may, in fact, represent "a great area of subsidence (a senkungsfeld of Suess) later than the deposition of the Tertiary plant beds."

HIS argument is two-fold. He begins by a comparison of the Arctic with the other well-determined ocean basins, each of which has been long enough in existence to bring about a complete divergence of the flora on its opposite sides. No such divergence exists in the Arctic regions, but as there is almost a complete belt of land round the Arctic Ocean, the distribution of which has often altered, the botanical argument is admittedly not worth much, and is practically abandoned. Then comes the geological, which is more complicated and more important. Dr. Gregory traces within fairly wide limits the extension of the Arctic Sea in the Archæan, Cambrian, Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, Triassic, and later periods down to the Pleistocene, showing a wide variation of its area. He sums up by adding that it is at present bounded by a rim of land, supported by five great continental blocks of Archæan rocks, surrounded by bands of sedimentary rocks. There is nothing to show that the Archæan blocks have ever been submerged, and a theory might well be put forward—as indeed it has been—that the basin is coeval with them in geological time. This is the point that Dr. Gregory contests. If we look at a map of the Polar regions showing the strike of the rocks and the trend of the mountain chains, we see, he says, that these all run north and south, and end abruptly in the margin of the Polar basin. A characteristic instance of this is afforded by the Ural and Verhanoyak Mountains with their respective geological continuations—Nova Zemlya and the New Siberian Islands. Analogy with similar truncated mountain lines elsewhere renders it probable that all these radial systems once extended still further north; and if they did so they would have effectually broken up the existing Polar basin. At the present time we have no knowledge which would justify us in saying that this has been the case; nothing but analogy and an absence of direct evidence to the contrary. As Dr. Gregory's article is numbered 1, we may conclude that similar speculations are to follow. They are certain to be received with interest, if only for the fresh and original method in which Dr. Gregory approaches his problems.

THE physical anthropologist has been patient, waiting for his time to come; but at last he is in arms. Mr. George Dorsey, of the Field Columbian Museum, in the course of a masterly address, which is printed in Science, complains that what should be the foremost of all human sciences is practically neglected. He quotes, of course, in support of his premise, Pope's saying that the proper study of mankind is man, and draws a glowing picture of the knowledge to be gained from well-ordered museums of comparative skeletons and casts. He makes out a fairly good case against explorers. How often, he asks, on any of the great scientific expeditions is there any one fitted by previous training to observe correctly and accurately the races of men to be encountered? On all the numerous expeditions into Africa and across Asia, or among the Pacific Islands, we find men competent to observe and collect reptiles, birds, fishes, and mammals, or to study botany and geology; but how often is anthropology represented? Mr. Dorsey's oratorical indignation blinds him, of course, to an obvious fact, that where an explorer may collect fishes or mammals he would have a difficulty in collecting human specimens. The Society for the Protection of Aborigines might be counted upon to resist any such scientific aspirations in dark regions, while at home human dissection is hardly a very popular occupation, and the choice of specimens is not ideal. It is easy to see the value of Mr. Dorsey's museum with rows upon rows of comparative skeletons of all the races of the world, showing the embryology and growth, hereditary characteristics, &c., of the different human species; but it is equally easy to overlook the special difficulties in the way of carrying out such an idea. Mr. Dorsey himself recognises some limitation, as when he says, "We can dig up the bony remains of the Papuan, but he refuses to be dissected." In nine places out of ten, however, the Papuan or his equivalent would have equally strong objections to the disturbance of bony remains.

H. C. M.

MUSIC.

BEETHOVEN'S BIOGRAPHER.

LAST month passed peacefully away Alexander Wheelock Thayer, who, up to within a few months of his death, was United States Consul at Trieste. He was born in 1817, at South Natick, Mass. While studying at Harvard University he conceived the idea of writing a biography of Beethoven, and in 1854 set seriously to work. The first volume only appeared in 1866, the second in 1872, and the third in 1879. For eighteen years lovers of Beethoven have been anxiously awaiting a fourth, though scarcely last volume, since the years 1816-1827, still to be described, were among the most eventful of the composer's life. It is probable that the material is collected, and that the remaining volume or volumes will soon be edited and published by Dr. H. Deiters, the translator of those which have already appeared. For the work, though originally written in English, was published in German. It is difficult to know what induced Mr. Thayer thus to make known the result of his researches. Possibly he was of opinion that his book would find more readers in Germany. Yet there are many, many lovers and admirers of the master all over the world; and there is no country in which the name of Beethoven is held in greater honour than England or America.

The story of Beethoven's troubled life is full of interest, although that interest is often of a painful kind. That story is strongly reflected in his music, which is in truth a psychography. The biographer has given us facts; the music reveals to us feelings. Were the facts connected with his life totally unknown to us we could have told that he was a man of noble impulse, of tender emotion, of deep melancholy, and at times of caustic humour. Sir George Grove in his recently published work on the symphonies remarks as follows: "It has been well said that, though the 'Eroica' was a portrait of Bonaparte, it is as much a portrait of Beethoven himself." And he adds, "But that is the case with everything he wrote."

Mr. Thayer concerned himself almost entirely with the outer man; he left the music to speak for itself. He was a most painstaking biographer, and, moreover, a truthful one. His Life of Beethoven is no romance; he has tried to present to us the man exactly as he was. Nothing is kept back: the writer's aim was the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Beethoven had his failings and his faults, and these are placed side by side with his many virtues.

The first to write a Life of Beethoven was Anton Schindler, who was a devoted friend of the master's. Mr. Thayer, although he has exposed some of his errors, recorded that "his honesty and intelligence are both to be trusted." Schindler's work—which, by the way, passed through three editions—is certainly valuable; and there is a warmth and enthusiasm in it which may be easily accounted for by his personal intercourse with the master. There was no lack of enthusiasm about Thayer, yet his strong desire to be impartial, not in any way to colour his narrative, imparts at times a certain coldness to his writing—I may even say dryness. But in reading his book one feels all the time that he is a very safe guide; of Schindler that cannot be said. Then, again, what the latter wrote was a sketch rather than a biography. He touched in the briefest manner on events of special importance, and of this he was well aware; many facts, too, are not noticed at all. A more complete Life was absolutely necessary; and Thayer, by his indefatigable energy and patience in collecting material, by the care and judgment which he displayed in sifting and setting in order that material, and by the trouble which he took to ferret out documents and facts that would throw any light on the composer's career, was evidently most competent to undertake such a task. One can only regret that he was not able to bring the labour of well-nigh half a century to a successful close. It is fortunate that that labour will be undertaken by a man who must be intimately acquainted with the late historian's notes and intentions.

J. S. S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

London: August 2.

I feel it difficult to account for Mr. E. K. Chambers's statement that the number of the so-called Herbertists is "rapidly thinning," unless he is affected by that curious psychological illusion which consists in an extension or multiplication of one's own personality. In a somewhat similar way I should be able to explain what he says about being "dazzled" by a "specious structure," and seeing "an unsubstantial pageant" which "faded into nothingness." Mr. Chambers's acquaintance with my Commentary on the Sonnets (if I may judge from his letter) is probably limited to the binding. He makes the absurd statement that "the language and thought of the Sonnets" is "that of the plays written during the years 1592-1594." Now, there is not a single play of Shakespeare's of which it can be precisely and definitely said that it was written during the period named. Whether this fact would enable Mr. Chambers to escape the auto da fé to which he expresses his willingness to resign himself it is not for me to say. But—to put aside dates—the assertion that the melancholy and pessimistic thought so often appearing in the Sonnets is characteristic of Shakespeare's earlier plays needs no consideration. It is assumed, moreover, that I am ignorant of a certain essay by Hermann Isaac, which was mentioned and quoted in my Introduction. Moreover, if Mr. Chambers had made himself acquainted with what I have written he would have found a tolerably full explanation of the words "in act thy bed-vow broke," as probably referring to a marriage of Mary Fitton in early youth—possibly a runaway match—which had been set aside as invalid. According to Elizabethan usage, "in act" bore a meaning different from that which the words now suggest. Possibly some additional light may be thrown on this matter by the Fitton letters now at Arbury, which, it is announced, Mrs. Newdigate is intending to publish. But, whether this be so or not, Mr. Chambers may rest assured that the use of big words will not suffice for the settlement of this question, or the questions related thereto.

THOMAS TYLER.

Highbury: July 31.

Mr. Tyler bewails the inexorable march of events which places his views here anent in the prospective background of lapsed heresies; personally, I welcome any ally, in the reconstruction of Shakespeare's personal relations, who shall discountenance the disgusting immorality of his "dark lady" theory.

These Sonnets are many-sided; they were not intended to be read as a whole, having been "sugared" to suit many palates—written and circulated for his "friends"—a term which, taken collectively, covers all sorts and conditions of men and women—poets, players, and patrons.

I have pondered much over "Willobie," obviously an assumed name. There were Willoughbys at college, but I connect the involved mystery with the Danvers family, who were associates of Southampton and a sad clog to his career.

Now, Mr. Tyler considers this Southampton theory to be dead; it may yet be resuscitated and face him in this world as a Banquo's ghost. What, indeed, can exceed Lord Southampton's claims as patron? Let any unprejudiced person read the two dedications written for "Venus and Adonis" and for "Lucrece," and then turn to the overpowering sense of obligation implied in the Sonnets: "All I have, devoted yours"—what language could surpass this strain? Then comes the urgent appeal to marry: father dead, mother living; while Lord Pembroke, senior, still survived. But Herbert is quite out of the running, and would never have appeared on the tapis but for the laboured address prefixed by Heming and Condell to the folio. Now, Lord Southampton was then in the shade, perhaps abroad, while the Herberts were in high office; self-interest explains this episode.

The burden of the Sonnets is the sense of obligation to continue writing, as per contract; it involved a great strain, an incessant effort after fresh ideas; so we find him veer about, shifting his sails to secure variety, and yet preserve continuity; thus his "puppet" is alternately lauded and belaboured; he is personified in many aspects, but a strain of hyperbolic praise runs through it all.

Then as to Mr. "W. H.," read H. W. Lord Southampton was proscribed, he was proscribed, and all his honours forfeited, thus surviving as a private gentleman. Several of the Sonnets refer to eclipse and imprisonment; but the "nod and the wink" are sufficient for some, while none are so blind as they who will not see. So for them fifty-two letters in the ACADEMY were insufficient.

A. HALL.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

COMPARING the present work "Cromwell's Place in History," with Carlyle's, the Chronicle By Dr. Gardiner. writes: "Carlyle . . . was the posthumous Boswell of his hero, while Dr. Gardiner has only aimed at being his retrospective Buckle." His lectures "are a perfect model of the higher academic style of teaching history by general principle; and though one may occasionally differ from his conclusions, we are always moved to admiration of his research, his critical acumen, his philosophical spirit, and his impartiality. . . . Some may be disposed to think that he emphasises a little too much the negative side of Cromwell's character." "It is always difficult," remarks the Pall Mall in a similar spirit, "to say where the work of destruction . . . ends and the work of construction begins; and it seems strange to find Cromwell's military successes classed among his 'negative actions,' because by their means 'hostile armies were not allowed to be victorious.'" "It is lamented that the adoption of an impartial attitude . . . involves of necessity a lamentable neglect of the judicious historian at the hands of the world at large. . . . Prof. Gardiner must be content with having produced the most reasonable estimate of Cromwell's genius which has yet been given." The dictum that Cromwell was "the typical Englishman in the world of action as Shakespeare in the spiritual world" is criticised on the ground, first, that Shakespeare's fame rests on his accomplishment as a poet, and not as a thinker; and, secondly, on the ambiguity of the word "typical." "If the most typical Englishman exhibits the besetting sins of his countrymen in equal measure with their virtues, we beg leave to withhold from him the title of the greatest Englishman of all time. If he does not, then he becomes the ideal Englishman—a glorious, if somewhat hazy, image, which everybody is at liberty to construct for himself according to taste." "The book probably expresses," writes the Daily News, "the final and general judgment of educated men."

"The Choir Invisible." By J. Speaker the exclamation of an old country squire, that "there are some books which it is a positive pleasure to read." It is "one of those rare stories which make a direct appeal to the taste and feelings. . . . A beautiful book—beautiful in language and sentiment, in design and in execution. . . . The historical novel can hardly be said as yet to have thriven on American soil, but The Choir Invisible . . . shows that America may yet have a school of genuine historical romance not inferior to any that exists elsewhere." The Saturday reviewer, though warm in his admiration, is more outspoken in his criticism. The work is "remarkably lacking in balance"; first, "the dramatic and reflective, the objective and the personal, lie separately, and the book rocks like an ill-balanced boat from side to side"; and, secondly, "the various parts of the scheme are not drawn in proportion to each other. . . . It is as though a painter had schemed out a composition, and then had spent all his skill on the detail of a piece of drapery in the foreground." However, "the love-scenes are beautiful. Moreover, on almost every page there sits the indefinable grace of an imagination enamoured of beauty. And if Mr. Allen, in his devotion, becomes at times just a little over-serious, he shares his fault with all other persons who are devoted—a sufficiently small and distinguished company." The Bookman observes that American readers are more patient of "the disburdening of the heart" than Englishmen; and that "in The Choir Invisible Mr. Allen disburdens himself with great simplicity, revealing a very sympathetic and sensitive nature." "Mr. Allen's power of character drawing," writes the Pall Mall's Irresponsible Reader, "invests the old, old story with renewed and absorbing interest. . . . The fascination of the story lies in great part in Mr. Allen's graceful and vivid style. His beautiful vignettes of forest scenery, and the real thoughtfulness of his dialogue, raise the story out of the ruck of the commonplace." A provincial critic opines that "the want of incident is the main defect." "On the other hand, the pages are crowded with moralising, and the reader grows tired of long speeches."

"Mr. Peters." By Riccardo Stephens. (Bliss, Sands.) "The author of The Cruciform Mark," the Speaker explains, "has once more made Edinburgh the scene of a story of modern romance and adventure. Mr. Peters, if it does not fulfil the promise of the earlier book, . . . helps to confirm the impression that in Mr. Riccardo Stephens the modern Athens has found another devoted son whose name may be added to the noble list in which Scott and Stevenson hold the foremost place." A weak point is said to be "the somewhat nebulous character of Mr. Peters himself." On the other hand, "some of the pleasantest chapters are those in which no progress is made with the great scheme of vengeance." Mr. Courtney, in the Daily Telegraph, writes: "The story grows in intensity as we near the close; and, although in many respects it would benefit by greater conciseness and by the elimination of one or two unnecessary chapters, it is true that we learn something more of the deadly persistence of the hero by watching the slow evolution of his mind." "Mr. Stephens," writes the Pall Mall, "is a little too leisurely in the gradual development of his hero's plan of vengeance, but the result of his work is a powerfully written and deeply interesting novel. There is plenty of light relief to the grimness of the central idea, and all the characters are excellently drawn, particularly Mrs. Jimp and 'Melia Rivers.'"

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa are being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled Tins.

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the

BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos :

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS' PUBLICATIONS.

---

PRINCE RANJITSINHJI ON CRICKET.

---

Dedicated by permission to Her Majesty the Queen-Empress.

ON MONDAY, AUGUST 9th, WILL BE PUBLISHED

THE JUBILEE BOOK OF CRICKET.

By K. S. RANJITSINHJI.

With 107 Full-Page Plates.

This Work will be issued in Three Editions:

1. EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 350 Copies for England, printed on Hand-made Paper, and handsomely bound in buckram, crown 4to, with 22 Photogravures and 85 Full-Page Plates, each Copy signed by Prince Ranjitsinhji, £5 5s. net.
2. FINE-PAPER EDITION, royal 8vo, with Photogravure Frontispiece, and 106 Full-Page Plates on Art Paper, 25s. net.
3. POPULAR EDITION, with 107 Page Illustrations, large crown 8vo, 6s.

---

POPULAR EDITION, price SIXPENCE.

IN A FEW DAYS WILL BE PUBLISHED

GEORGE ELIOT'S SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE.

Royal 8vo, paper cover, SIXPENCE.

---

WORKS BY THE LATE SIR JOHN SKELTON, K.C.B.

THE TABLE-TALK of SHIRLEY. Reminiscences of and Letters from Froude, Thackeray, Disraeli, Browning, Rossetti, Kingsley, Baynes, Huxley, Tyndall, and others. With an Engraving on Steel and 3 Woodcuts. Sixth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Post 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE TABLE-TALK of SHIRLEY. Second Series. Summers and Winters at Balmawhapple. Book I. BY the NORTH SEA. Book II. AMONG the SUMMER ISLES. Book III. ALPINE RESTING-PLACES. Book IV. HOME AGAIN! 2 vols., with Illustrations, post 8vo, 10s. net.

MAITLAND of LETHINGTON; and the Scotland of Mary Stuart. A History. Limited Edition, with Portraits. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 28s. net.

---

NEW BOOKS.

OLD MEMORIES. By General Sir Hugh Gough, G.C.B., V.C. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Sir Hugh Gough's peculiarly 'live' little work is one that soldiers and civilians will equally appreciate."—World.

THE WOODLAND LIFE. By Edward Thomas. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very daintily drawn and beautifully finished sketches in pen and ink of wild nature in our woods and meadows."—Pall Mall Gazette.

---

TWO NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

AN ELECTRIC SHOCK, and Other Stories. By E. Gerard (Madame de Laszowska), Author of "A Foreigner," &c., Joint-Author of "Reata," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Each of the stories has its own special charm, that which gives its title to the book being one of those delightful studies of Austrian life in which this writer excels."—Speaker.

AUDREY CRAVEN. By May Sinclair. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A clever novel, admirably conceived and well written."—Saturday Review.

---

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS, LONDON AND EDINBURGH.

---

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 48, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1319.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.
New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.
Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—
No. 51 SENTINEL—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1443 lots.)
No. 54 MINISTERS' BIBLES. (763, 733 lots.)
No. 55 PHILOSOPHY. (840 lots.)

SPECIAL CATALOGUE OF CHOICE BOOKS, in Large Paper, Limited Editions, and Privately Printed Issues, at very low prices.—Post free from JONES & EVANS, 77, Queen Street, Liverpool, E.C.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
28, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS OF FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS AND EXPORTERS,
2, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPIKE & Co.
MSB. considered for Publication. (Established 1819.)

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 29 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS.—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.
NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAYMOND, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 15, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 64-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.
For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANAC, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

BRITISH MUSEUM, BLOOMSBURY.

EVENING OPENING ON WEEKDAYS.

EXHIBITION GALLERIES of the BRITISH MUSEUM, Bloomsbury, will again be OPEN (in Sections) to the PUBLIC in the EVENING, from 8 to 10 o'clock, on and after MONDAY, August 16th.

E. MAURICE THOMPSON,
Principal Librarian and Secretary.
British Museum, 10th August, 1897.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LECTURES ON ZOOLOGY.

The GENERAL COURSE of LECTURES, by Professor W. F. R.
WELDON, F.R.S., will commence on WEDNESDAY, October 6th,
at 1 p.m.

These Lectures are suited to the requirements of Students preparing for the Examinations of the London University, as well as to those of Students wishing to study Zoology for its own sake. Notice of other Courses of Lectures, to be delivered during the Session, will be given later.

J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of SHEFFIELD.

LECTURER IN PHILOSOPHY AND ECONOMICS.

The Council will proceed to the ELECTION of a LECTURER in PHILOSOPHY and ECONOMICS in September. Duties to commence in October next. Salary £300 at least, together with half the fees of the Lecturer's Classes.—For particulars apply to the Registrar.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

FOUR SCHOLARSHIPS and ONE EXHIBITION, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £50 each, tenable for one year, will be open for on September 27th, 1897.—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology. Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London medical school.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £50) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German.
The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation
Examination of July, 1897.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

RUSKIN.—"THE PRINCIPLES OF ART," as defined by Mr. RUSKIN, and illustrated in the Ruskin Museum, is now to be obtained from the Author on receipt of Postal order, carriage paid. Price (with 6 Photogravure Plates, 625 pp.) 10s. 6d. net.
—Address, Mr. WILLIAM WHITE, Ruskin Museum, Sheffield. Prospectus, with Press opinions, on application.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS OF ART and BELLES
LETTERS.—A Gentleman engaged in producing GREAT WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout the civilized world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent.
The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—
Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to K., care of Messrs.
Stedman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 28, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSB., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating, Addressing, Type-written & Photographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses
E. & J. FRY, 485, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 48, Chancery Lane, London.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(THE LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 80, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen ruled or plain.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY, LONDON.

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF
FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

AUTOTYPES of MODERN ENGLISH ART.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the NATIONAL GALLERY.

AUTOTYPES of DRAWINGS by the OLD
MASTERS.

AUTOTYPES of PICTURES in the FRENCH
SALONS.

Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproduction of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples, of specially designed patterns made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

The Company offer their services for the Reproduction by their Permanent Processes of Works of Art, for the Collector's Portfolio, Book Illustrations of the highest class, Wall Decoration, &c. Examples of Work and Estimates submitted on application.

CATALOGUE AND LISTS FREE.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
FINE ART GALLERY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS from ONE GUINEA per annum.	COUNTRY SUBSCRIPTIONS from TWO GUINEAS per annum.
LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.	N.B.—Two or Three Friends may UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,
30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.
48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:— 1896.

BEN JONSON	...	November 14
JOHN KEATS	...	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING	...	" 28
TOM HOOD	...	December 5
THOMAS GRAY	...	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON	...	" 19
SIR WALTER SCOTT	...	" 26
1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON	...	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY	...	" 9
LEIGH HUNT	...	" 16
LORD MACAULAY	...	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHEY	...	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE	...	February 6
CHARLES LAMB	...	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON	...	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR	...	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS	...	March 6
EDMUND WALLER	...	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS	...	" 20
JOHN MILTON	...	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER	...	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN	...	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON	...	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW	...	" 24
ANDREW MARVELL	...	May 1
ROBERT BROWNING	...	" 8
THOMAS CARLYLE	...	" 15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY	...	" 22
CHARLES DICKENS	...	" 29
JONATHAN SWIFT	...	June 5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY	...	" 12
WILLIAM BLAKE	...	" 19
SIR RICHARD STEELE	...	" 26
ALEXANDER POPE	...	July 3
DOUGLAS JERROLD	...	" 10
FRANCIS BACON	...	" 17

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.,
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich.

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

MESSRS. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 14 HENRIETTA STREET COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

E P P S ' S

GRATEFUL—COMFORTING

C O C O A

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS,
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT AND EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,

whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN.

MOST RECENT, crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, AND OTHER SERMONS.

"Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the Beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 5s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.

"Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times.
"Masterly, beautiful, inspiring."—Methodist Recorder.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"The work of a master of pulpit oratory."—Freeman.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and the most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE HOLY OF HOLIES: A Series of Sermons on the 14th, 16th, and 18th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"Every sermon glows with unctious, and shows intense power."—Methodist Recorder.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, and the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."
—Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"For more than a quarter of a century he has held almost an unchallenged position as the prince of pulpit orators....
The back pews of Dr. Maclaren's church are in the nooks and corners of the earth."—Methodist Times.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other Sermons.

"Open the book wherever we may, the temptation to read on and on is very great. The volume is invaluable."
—Sunday School Chronicle.

THREE CENTURIES OF NONCONFORMITY.

Large cr. 8vo, nearly 800 pp., cloth, 6s., post free.

HISTORY

FREE CHURCHES OF ENGLAND

FROM THE REFORMATION TO 1851.

By HERBERT S. SKRATHS.

WITH A CONTINUATION TO 1891,

By CHARLES S. MIALL.

"A monument of painstaking and skilful work, which no
one probably could have undertaken with so many advantages as Mr. Miall, or have accomplished with greater success."—Literary World.

"The leading members of all denominations will do well to get hold of this publication."—South Wales Daily News.

Just ready, crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s. 6d. post free.

THE CHARTER of the CHURCH.

Lectures on the Spiritual Principle of Nonconformity.
By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D., Cambridge.

CONTENTS:—I. Our Historic Principle: the Unity, Autonomy, and Continuity of the Church. II. Our Root is Religious—in Faith and Free Grace. III. Faith-Demands a Church—but Catholic, not Monopolist. IV. We Disown the Prince, the Prelate, the Priest, and the Individualist.
V. and VI. The History of our Spiritual Principle.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d. post free.

ILLUSTRATIONS from the SERMONS

of ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D. Edited and Selected by JAMES HENRY MARTYN. Containing over 600 Beautiful and Suggestive Illustrations. With a Textual Index and an Alphabetical List of Subjects.

Crown 8vo, Illustrated, price 2s. 6d.

WILLIAM KNIBB, Missionary in Jamaica. A Memoir. With Introduction by the Rev.
J. G. GREENHOUGH, M.A. By Mrs. JOHN JAMES SMITH.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,
21 AND 22, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Courthope's "History of Poetry" ... ..	123
Rival Folklore Theories ... ..	124
Decadts of the Senses ... ..	125
The Dies Ira ... ..	126
Spanish Protestants in the Sixteenth Century ... ..	127
The Young Idea ... ..	128
A History of Pembroke College, Oxford ... ..	129
Wild Flowers of Scotland ... ..	129
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	129
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	131
New Books Received... ..	131
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	132
PARIS LETTER ... ..	133
TENTHSON AS DRAMATIST ... ..	134
SOME LETTERS OF SWIFT ... ..	135
O FOWS BANDUSIA ... ..	136
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	137
SCIENCE ... ..	137
MUSIC ... ..	138
CORRESPONDENCE ... ..	138
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..	139
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	40-43

REVIEWS.

COURTHOPE'S HISTORY OF POETRY.

A History of English Poetry. By W. J. Courthope. (Macmillan & Co.)

THE second volume of Prof. Courthope's History of English Poetry, let it be said at once, is very valuable. At the same time, a distinction may be made as to the nature of its value. Prof. Courthope has the professorial mind in an absolute degree; and his history is valuable in the peculiar qualities of the professorial mind. It is deficient in the qualities which are outside the professorial mind. In criticism he is for the most part sound and reliable, where he has a defined and traditional body of taste to guide himself by. At the same time, and by a necessary result of the academic habit, there is little original and illuminative about his criticism. Where precedent in judgment fails him, and he has to depend upon native insight, he is as liable to be wrong as right. In the main, the value of his History is historical (which may seem a truism, but is not), and its peculiar historical value is evolutionary. He has worked out, as no previous historian has done, the origins of various literary forces in different countries, and the differing ways in which their momentum has communicated itself to English literature, and been responsible for the various streams of tendency in that literature. In this respect we reckon his work most thorough and authoritative. If anything, he lays too much stress upon the evolutionary derivations of the various English writers, and groups of writers, from foreign literatures, and too little stress upon the original elements superadded by those writers, which make their work very different from, and often transcending, the work of the foreign writers from whom they derived their suggestions. We do not mean that he gives no notification of this; but that he gives too little proportionate importance to it. To pursue all the intricate ramifications of his evolutionary analysis in a review would be impossible. Let us take a single instance, which involves broad and general principles. We mean the evolution of the literary tongue in England from the vulgar tongue. He goes back to the Cortegiano (the Courtier) of the Italian Castiglione. There Castiglione, as the basis of an elegant style in writing, lays down the following principles:

"Whatever is allowable in writing ought also to be allowable in speaking, and the most beautiful kind of speech is that which resembles elegant writing. . . . I would accordingly recommend (the courtier) not only to avoid all old and obsolete Tuscan words, but both in writing and speaking to make use of such words as are in vogue in Tuscany and other parts of Italy to-day, and which have some grace and charm in themselves."

It will at once be perceived that this is the exploded Wordsworthian theory—with an important difference. Both would have the writer to use only the words of conversation. But whereas Wordsworth would have him to use the speech of "simple livers," Castiglione would have him to use elegant speech. Each, of course, was wrong; but each was a most excellent influence in his time. When it was a case of forming a language out of rude elements, nothing better could be recommended as a standard than the speech of the Court. When it was a question of putting fresh blood into a language over-refined, nothing better could be recommended than the speech of simple men. In literature two wrongs do sometimes make a right.

The adoption of the Court language in England did furnish a much-needed standard. It settled the main lines of the language. At the same time, that standard being once fixed, the influence of great writers such as Spenser, who revived archaisms, and Shakespeare, who introduced Latinisms, while he kept in the main to the vernacular formed by previous writers from the standard of the Court, prevented the language of poetry from being stereotyped by the diction prevalent in conversation. And, finally, the influence of Milton, who revived many of the archaisms which Spenser had previously revived from Chaucer and his contemporaries, while at the same time he introduced new Latinisms of his own, created for poetry its present omnigenous diction, distinct from that of prose, and enabling a poet to express with ease what prose can only express with difficulty. This is but a partial sample of the evolutionary process which Prof. Courthope's book enables the student to trace on every hand. In this particular instance he has not altogether traced it himself. He sees that literary language became fixed, as to its basis, by the prevalence of the living language of the Court as a standard. He does not perceive—or, at any rate, does not state—that the language of poetry, if not of prose, was built up by a process more intricate.

Once the staple of the tongue had been fixed by the adoption of the language actually spoken in that most refined and brilliant Court of Elizabeth, the great poets enriched and enlarged it by interweaving with that staple words adapted from the Latin, revived from earlier speech, or borrowed from the homely tongue of the people. The speech of the Court furnished the nucleus round which all these other elements crystallised. The first thing was to get a settled tissue. This was obtained by adopting the living diction used at Court. But once the earlier writers had supplied, by their practice, this accepted tissue, the way was open for Shakespeare (and, later, Milton) to embroider upon this tissue words of vulgar or Latin derivation, or even revived from archaic language. Shakespeare enriched the received tissue of the language by abundance of Latinisms and vulgarisms. Spenser added archaisms, but, owing to his too free use of them, they did not at the time find acceptance, or not to any material degree. The tongue was still too young, too much in process of formation; the experiment was premature. But Milton, succeeding to a poetic tongue by that time fairly settled (thanks to Shakespeare, whom Milton followed in his earlier work), was able to make a judicious selection from Spenser's archaisms, and—by means of his overpowering genius—add them to the recognised resources of poetic diction. Accordingly, most of Spenser's archaisms have become current poetic paper-money only where they were endorsed by Milton. Other and more modern poets, following Milton's example, have endorsed more and more of Spenser's at first unsuccessful archaisms; Shelley, for example, and Keats, and Coventry Patmore: till at last most of Spenser's daring revivals have passed into poetic currency, so far as they were worthy of such a fate. So has been built up that great body of poetic diction which makes England transcendently superior in poetic resource to all modern countries. France has gone but a little way from the starting-point of Castiglione. Its literary speech may indeed be richer than its conversational speech—no country has been insensate enough to adopt finally the dictum of Castiglione or Wordsworth, which would make literary speech one with the spoken speech of a given generation—but its poetic diction is one with its prose diction; the poet has no resource of language which is not shared by the prose-writer. Other nations diverge from France in this respect, till the climax is reached in England, which possesses an enormous range of poetic speech altogether denied to the prose-writer. The poet has a vocabulary which enables him to express all manner of things which the prosatour can either not express at all, or can express but feebly; while at the same time the whole range of the prose-writer is his to command. Hence, chiefly, it is that the English vocabulary perhaps transcends that of ancient Greece in tropical fertility.

This point illustrates one great merit of Prof. Courthope's work. He is uniformly fair. Even where his own conclusions are (to our mind) mistaken, he gives us, by his careful and representative citations, the means of deciding for ourselves on those conclusions; and arriving, if we please, at a different result. If the academic mind sometimes (we think) leads him astray in his judgments, he is singularly just in adducing the grounds of his judgments, so that we may reverse his results if we like. This is the favourable (and a very favourable) side of the professorial method. We know no fairer and more judicial history of his subject. No one, we should think, will dispute his valuable analysis of the evolution of English poetry. And on a most enlightened principle, he sees that the evolution of poetry cannot be kept separate from the evolution of literature at large. Accordingly we have a thorough analysis of the the progress of prose as well as poetry. Indeed, but for Prof. Courthope's modesty, this might have been called a history of English literature.

On one point, chiefly, we have to find fault with the author. He does not shrink from entering into an analysis of the progress of English metre. And here his conclusions are vitiated by the professorial mind. Nothing is more subtle and less understood; and Prof. Courthope's ideas are such as no poet who had studied metre could accept. He follows, without an intrusion of doubt, the ordinary metrical principles of the grammarians (vitiating as they are by an attempt to conform the principles of English to those of classic metre), and his judgments are often mistaken in the extremest degree. But this is not the place to enter on a matter so intricate. We can only assure the student that he could not do better than accept the exact contrary of Prof. Courthope's conclusions on this point.

There are, of course, points in which we differ from the author. We cannot agree with his general high estimate of George Peele, though we are glad to see that he recognises the value of Peele's one really fanciful (and neglected) play, "The Arraignment of Paris." Still more, we disagree with his comparative disparagement of Greene. As a lyricist, Greene was worth three thousand Peeles. We could make this good were there space for it. Other such dubious points there are, but on the whole this is an invaluable book for the enlightened student. For the unenlightened student its value is much less. The value of it consists in the careful tracing of evolution in English poetry, and in the copious material Prof. Courthope affords the student for arriving at his own conclusions. No matter how strong his bias, he never garbles or abbreviates quotations in order to support his own view—a thing how rare; how very, very rare!

But if the student have no power of judging for himself, if he take Prof. Courthope's conclusions blindly, then he will remain fixed for life in some most grievous and damning errors with regard to poetry. Wherefore, the value of this book emphatically depends upon the reader. But yet it must, we think, endure—as a review of the development of English poetry. It supersedes anything previously in the field. And the learning, the labour, the accuracy, the painful fair-mindedness which have gone to the making of it only life-long students of English literature can estimate.

RIVAL FOLKLORE THEORIES.

Modern Mythology. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans.)

Few writers show at their best in controversy, and it is no disparagement of the brilliant champion of the natural explanation of popular myths to say that he has written more agreeable essays on this fascinating subject than the present work. Yet even here much of the unpleasantness inseparable from the polemical attitude is mitigated by the pointedly courteous tone everywhere maintained towards his formidable opponent, Prof. Max Müller, founder and now almost sole defender of the philological school of interpretation. The erudite Oxford sage has perhaps himself a dim feeling that he is but the leader of a forlorn hope—most anthropologists, and even many philologists, having long made up their minds as to the merits of the rival systems. Such, indeed, is the strength of Mr. Lang's position, that he would scarcely be justified in reopening the discussion had it not been revived in Mr. Max Müller's recently published Contributions to the Science of Mythology. He naturally feels aggrieved at the desultory character of the attack brought against him and his followers in that work, in which their views are nowhere distinctly formulated, their arguments nowhere clearly stated, and where disputed points are referred to in the vaguest manner. Hence, also, the necessarily rambling character of his reply, which has to follow the lines of attack:

"Throughout more than 800 pages," he complains, "the learned author keeps up an irregular fire at the ideas and methods of the anthropological school of mythologists. . . . Mr. Max Müller never comes to grips with his opponents, and his large volumes shine rather in erudition and style than in method and system. Anyone who attempts a reply must necessarily follow Mr. Max Müller up and down, collecting his scattered remarks on this or that point at issue. Hence my reply, much against my will, must seem desultory and rambling. But I have endeavoured to answer with some kind of method, and I even hope that this little book may be useful as a kind of supplement to Mr. Max Müller's, for it contains exact references to certain works of which he takes the reader's knowledge for granted" (Introduction).

All this will be readily conceded by those who have found Mr. Max Müller's big book, with all its learning and dazzling exposition, in many respects so unsatisfactory and inconclusive. Not even is there anywhere a precise statement of the general problem at issue, a problem which has its roots in the very principles on which both anthropology and philology have been almost contemporaneously established, and which have from the first imparted a distinctly antagonistic character to those somewhat recent branches of science. Speech-craft—the comparative method applied to language—if not founded, has certainly been far more widely cultivated, in Germany than elsewhere, and there largely under Hegelian influences. On the other hand, the natural history of man—physical man—as shown by the classical writings of Dr. Prichard, found an earlier and somewhat more congenial home in England; where its study has also been pursued in a broader spirit, less encumbered by metaphysical vagaries. Hence an initial divergence, resulting in two almost irreconcilable schools of thought—the philological and the anthropological. For the philologist language is an independent organism (Schleicher), inseparable from or even identical with reason, the existence of which is inconceivable without articulate speech (Max Müller), while radically distinct linguistic families argue radically distinct human groups independently evolved in different geographical areas (Fr. Müller). For the anthropologist language is a faculty entirely dependent on certain facial organs, with the gradual development of which articulate speech is gradually developed and perfected (Dr. Arthur Keith).

Bearing these contrasts in mind, we easily understand how inevitably have arisen two opposite methods—Max Müller's linguistic and Andrew Lang's naturalistic—of explaining the myths and other forms of folk-lore characteristic of every stage of human culture. A myth, says the former, is the outcome of phonetic decay, of language in a state of "disease," when the etymologies are blurred and forgotten, and fresh stories have to be invented to account for the new forms assumed by proper names in later times. Attention may here be incidentally called to a point generally overlooked and not touched upon by Mr. Lang himself, that is, the all but irresistible temptation inseparable from this process, to read our own elevated conceptions into the minds of rude primitive peoples. With this consideration alone is dimmed much of the glamour of the lofty notions which are so liberally credited to untutored savages in Contributions to the Science of Mythology.

The reaction came in due course from a system which obviously began at the wrong end, and which, for instance, was obliged to regard fetishism and polytheism generally as degraded forms of a pure monotheism, as if this sublimated residuum of all the religions were the natural endowment of palæolithic man! Although by no means the founder, Mr. Andrew Lang is rightly regarded by common consent as the most brilliant exponent of the opposite method, which goes to natural man, and not to phonetic decay, for an explanation of many of the otherwise inexplicable crudities in the mythologies of later and more cultured peoples. But so much confusion still prevails respecting the different attitudes of the two schools, that it will be best to put the main points at issue in our author's own words:

"The general problem is this: has language—especially language in a state of 'disease'—been the great source of the mythology of the world? Or does mythology, on the whole, represent the survival of an old stage of thought—not caused by language—from which civilised men have slowly emancipated themselves? Mr. Max Müller is of the former, anthropologists are of the latter, opinion. Both, of course, agree that the myths are a product of thought, of a kind of thought almost extinct in civilised races; but Mr. Max Müller holds that language caused that kind of thought. We, on the other hand, think that language only gave it one means of expressing itself" (Introduction).

By means of the principle of interpretation here laid down, Mr. Lang is not only able to meet the objections raised by philologists against his conclusions, but also to carry the war with great effect into the enemy's camp. The test is applied with signal success to several well-known classical myths, taken as typical examples, and it is shown that the charge of "scientific inaccuracy," among others, lies rather with Mr. Max Müller and his followers, whose linguistic equations between Greek and Hindu deities present such endless discrepancies that only Dyaus=Zeus has been generally accepted as beyond dispute. In the instructive chapter on the widespread institution of Totemism, Mr. Lang withdraws from his former position, or, rather, leaves it a moot question that a mouse-totem lay behind the story of Apollo Smintheus. He, however, rejects the linguistic explanations, adding with delightful irony:

"I make no doubt that philologists can explain Sminthian Apollo, the Dog-Apollo, and all the rest in the same way, and account for all the other peculiarities of place-names, myths, works of art, local badges, and so forth. . . . The Greek analogy to totemistic facts would be explained (1) either by asking for a definition of totemism, and not listening when it is given; or (2) by maintaining that savage totemism is also a result of a world-wide malady of language, which, in a hundred tongues, produced the same confusion of thought, and consequently the same practices and institutions. Nor do I for one moment doubt that the ingenuity of philologists could prove the name of every beast and plant in every language under heaven, to be a name for the 'inevitable dawn' (Max Müller), or for the inevitable thunder, or storm, or lightning (Kuhn-Schwartz). But, as names appear to yield storm, lightning, night, or dawn with equal ease and certainty, according as the scholar prefers dawn or storm, I confess that this demonstration would leave me sceptical. It lacks scientific exactitude" (p. 82).

Such a passage, taken almost at hazard, will help to show how completely the philological ghost is laid in this work. But the book is not all controversy. In the concluding part, where he breaks new ground independently of polemical considerations, Mr. Lang reasserts himself, and the chapter on the "Fire-Walk," as he calls it, will come as a surprise even to many well-informed folklorists. A considerable mass of fresh evidence is brought forward from Malasia, Fiji, Bulgaria, and other lands, to show that the walking over red-hot ground, already recorded by the Ancients at Mount Soracte, would appear to be still practised with impunity in many parts of the world. Mr. Lang may, perhaps, himself be interested to know that this very legend of the Sabine tribe of Hirpini ("Wolves") is treated from quite a novel standpoint in the late Prof. von Ihering's Evolution of the Aryan, reviewed in a recent number of the ACADEMY. That ingenious writer makes sad havoc of Mannhardt's "Korndämonen in wolf-shape," and indirectly of some of the "Corn-wolves" in Mr. Frazer's delightful book, The Golden Bough. As is his wont, he seeks an explanation of the wolf legend in certain incidents possibly associated with the pre-historic Aryan migrations, and "still surviving in the recollection of the people." A new factor or "disturbing element" is thus introduced to folklorists, who certainly cannot afford to overlook its significance in their interpretation of many popular "Aryan" myths.

The book is singularly free from misprints or errors of any kind. We notice, however, that the modern name of Soracte is given (p. 148) as Monte di Silvestro instead of Monte S. Silvestro, now better known as Monte Sant' Oreste; and "a local tribe" (p. 74) seems a somewhat inadequate description of the wide-spread Snake (Shoshone) nation, which includes about a dozen branches, each comprising scores of "tribes."

DECEITS OF THE SENSES.

"CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES."—Hallucinations and Illusions. By Edmund Parish. (Walter Scott.)

WHAT are "hallucinations"? Dr. Gowers, following older authorities such as Esquirol and de Boismont, would define them as sensory images arising without sensory impressions, and therein differing both from "illusions" or false sensory images produced by actual sensory impressions, and from "delusions" or false ideas. But Mr. Parish will have none of these distinctions. According to him the word "hallucination" is wide enough to cover "all false sensory perceptions from whatever cause arising," and is, therefore, just as applicable to dreams and other normal phenomena as to those deceits of the senses which can be traced to disease or some other abnormal cause. It is evident that by thus enlarging the popular meaning of the phrase he opens the door to a variety of subjects not generally connected with it. Among these may be mentioned the fallacious perceptions of the insane and those produced by drugs or alcohol, by hypnotism, and by such means as crystal-gazing. On all these subjects does he dilate, always with learning and generally with lucidity.

The common element which Mr. Parish finds to characterise all hallucinatory states is the "dissociation of consciousness," by which he appears to mean that in all cases of hallucination the consciousness of the patient as to his surroundings is more or less obstructed or impeded. With this view, he sets to work to examine in detail the results of the international census of waking hallucinations recently set on foot by the Psychological Research Society, and he succeeds in finding some evidence of dissociation in them all. In the main he is probably right, but it must be confessed that the evidence which satisfies him would hardly seem conclusive to every one. In many cases, indeed, hardly any is required. The patients themselves suggest that they were in a state between sleeping and waking, or only infer that they were awake from some otherwise irrelevant circumstance. Here Mr. Parish is probably justified in assuming, as he says, "the presence of a dream state." But in others it is assumed on much less safe grounds. In one case, "a wife saw an apparition; the husband declared he could see nothing, but when the wife laid her hand on his shoulder, saying, 'George, do you really not see him?' the apparition speedily became visible to him too." In the story, as thus told, we confess we see nothing to indicate that the husband was not awake, and in full possession of all his faculties. But Mr. Parish finds in it evidence of "suggestion acting in a state of expectancy." In another case, a person absorbed in reading in a well-lighted room felt a touch on the shoulder, and, looking up, saw the apparition of a friend, who, unknown to the percipient, had been killed in a duel the day before. "This," says Mr. Parish, "appears to have been an illusory perception of the after-image of the brightly lighted paper of the book." Of course, it may have been. But in view of the fact that people read books every day in a bright light without seeing apparitions the hypothesis seems purely gratuitous.

Passing over Mr. Parish's account of the physiological theories of hallucination—very clear, and, on the whole, fair, but not very interesting, save to experts—we come to his description of the subjects, or, as he prefers to call it, the "content" of fallacious perception. Here Mr. Parish takes a line as decided as it is sensible. "The content of a fallacious perception depends primarily on the past experience of the individual. Only what has passed in (the italics are ours) at the portals of sense can be reproduced." These are golden words, and it would be well could they be scored in the memory of all superstitious or hysterical persons who may be inclined either to see visions themselves or to sit at the feet of those who falsely or truly pretend to do so. In them we have a key to the extraordinary fact that no oracle, prophet, spiritualist medium, or other mystery-monger has ever advanced the knowledge of his consultants by one iota. Never in dreams, nor in hysterical vision, nor in hypnotic trance, has any one succeeded in foreseeing the future, for it is from the past impressions of the percipient that the images which cannot be associated with the present come. Once, as Mr. Parish reminds us, hallucinations were for the most part dramas in which the leading parts were played by witches and devils, because the memories of the hallucinated were choked with tales of witches and devils. Now we find the same class of persons appearing before police magistrates with stories that they are electrified or mesmerised, because they have had some first hand or hearsay acquaintance with the phenomena of electricity or mesmerism. But no hallucinated person in the Middle Ages ever thought that he was electrified, for such a phenomenon had no part in his previous experience. One fact recorded by Mr. Parish is conclusive as to this. Those completely blind from birth "have not even the ghost of an idea of light and darkness, and consequently have no visual hallucinations."

Equally instructive are his remarks as to the tricks played us by our memories with regard to reflex as opposed to spontaneous attention. How often do we not notice, and unconsciously remember, things which have yet not consciously impressed themselves on our senses! Thus Mr. Parish describes a series of experiments conducted by a Roumanian professor, which go far to show that certain words and sounds may really produce sensations of colour in the hearer, and that, therefore, the talk of the æsthete as to "purple passages" and the like may not be mere jargon. Yet he argues—rightly, as we think—that these colour sensations are nothing but "hallucinations whose regular recurrence and fixed character point to an automatic association acquired very early in life." The treacherous character of our memory with regard to such association is well illustrated by an anecdote quoted from Binet of a student intent on a botany examination, who, while walking in Paris, suddenly saw to his astonishment the words "Verbascum thapsus" inscribed on the glass door of a restaurant. Turning back to look again, he found that the words had vanished, and that the simple inscription "Bouillon" had appeared in their place. But it was not till then that he remembered that the popular name for the plant in question was bouillon blanc.

That muscular motion, again, sometimes takes place unconsciously is known to all, yet the part which it plays in deceptions of the senses has been hitherto almost unsuspected. Mr. Parish calls attention to the fact that in cases of vertigo the spinning movement of surrounding objects is due to the slight and rapid, but unconscious, movement of the patient's eyeballs. So, in the case of thinking aloud, a trick into which persons accustomed to solitude easily fall, the patient generally remains unconscious that he has given voice to his thoughts; and to this "automatic speech" Mr. Parish, in opposition to former observers, attributes most of the auditory hallucinations or mysterious "voices" so common to diseased minds.

"Automatic writing, in which the hand writes, while the consciousness is unaware of the action, is another example of the same thing. Here, too, the motor impulses set the muscular apparatus in motion, while our upper consciousness knows nothing of the action except through the result, afterwards looked on with incredulity by the writer, who denies having written the words, and either thinks he has been made a fool of, or attributes the writing to spirits (mediumistic writing)."

As to telepathy, or thought transference, as a means of inducing hallucinations, Mr. Parish thinks there is no sufficient evidence for its existence. He goes carefully through the cases collected by the Psychical Research Society, points out the sources of error that they disclose, and sums up against their acceptance as proof of any new force. "We are still forced to say 'Non liquet'" is his last word on the matter.

Generally, it may be said that Mr. Parish has written a most interesting book. It will be valuable not only as a contribution to our knowledge of psychology, but also as a counterblast to many of the mystical and superstitious ideas which still obscure the subject. In its English dress it has received some additions to the German original, which appeared, if we mistake not, as a memoir presented to the Munich Society of Experimental Psychology some three years ago. Mr. Parish seems to have been his own translator, or to have written in the first instance in English, which is probably (as his name would suggest) his native tongue. It is a pity that he did not see his way to keep to his original title of Ueber die Trugwahrnehmung. Some modification of it, such as the heading of this notice, would form a better guide to the contents of the book than two words which, as used by the author, both mean exactly the same thing.

THE GREAT HYMN.

The Dies Iræ: On this Hymn and its English Versions. Part I., "The Hymn." By C. F. S. Warren, M.A. (Skeffington.)

No part of the Catholic liturgy has set a deeper mark upon a multitude of minds than the sequence from the Mass of Requiem. There is hardly to be found a collection of hymns used by any body of Christians which does not contain some more or less adequate version of it; and among those to whom by right it belongs it may be suspected that the priests and religious of both sexes who more or less directly trace to it their vocation might supply a diocese.

Its authorship is most generally attributed to one of the earliest of St. Francis' sons, Thomas of Celano, who was born at the close of the twelfth century; but the friar's claims have been at various times disputed in behalf of St. Gregory the Great, St. Bonaventure, and Thurston, Archbishop of York. A later writer is alone in suggesting Cardinal Frangipani. Besides the authentic text to be found in the Roman Missal, two principal variants are extant: these are the version preserved from a sepulchral slab in the Church of St. Francis at Mantua, and that discovered at Zurich among the papers of a priest, one Hammerlein, in the fifteenth century. The Mantuan Marble prefixes four stanzas to those of which the authorised version consists: they are sad doggerel. The six stanzas added by Hammerstein are better, but are not worth quoting. It may here be observed that the best hymnologists doubt the genuineness of the stanza of couplets ("Lacrymosa dies illa . . . Pie Jesu domine, Dona eis requiem") which concludes the Roman version.

English and American renderings number 135, of which the former class comprises seventy-two. Of these, twenty-nine are ascertained to be from Catholic pens, and thirty-four from Anglican; Dissent contributes five. The Church of England is represented by two bishops—of whom the late Archbishop of Canterbury was one—three deans, an archdeacon, and a couple of canons, besides the laymen and the inferior clergy. It is curious that Cardinal Newman, so far at least as appears, never ventured himself upon the attempt. Joshua Sylvester, who died in the early years of the sixteenth century, was the first to English the poem, following the Mantuan Marble. Crashaw, afterwards a canon of Loreto, wrote a version, which he intitled "In Meditation of the Day of Judgment." Patrick Carey's translation (1651) was the first attempt at a literal translation in which the original triplets are preserved. It was published with "Trivial Poems and Triolets," "at Mrs. Tomkin's command"; a lady of whom history relates nothing further. Samuel Speed, grandfather of the historian, sent forth a version from Ludgate Prison, in reparation for his Fragmenta Carceris—a series of poems of which even their author could not pretend to think that they tended to edification. In 1696 appeared the version diversely attributed to Lord Roscommon and to Dryden. Jeremy Taylor, moved by admiration of Evelyn's "Lucretius," besought him to attempt the task. Scott's rendering appeared in "The Lay of the Last Minstrel." By his unfamiliarity with theological Latin he was handicapped in his attempt; but in spite of his inaccuracies, his stanzas won their way into sacred anthologies and hymn books down to Ancient and Modern. "The watchers about his death-bed," Lockhart writes, "very often heard distinctly the cadence of the Dies Iræ." Among later translators are Canon Bright, Dean Stanley, Archbishop Benson, Dr. F. G. Lee, and, of course, Dr. Irons, through whose version the public has its principal acquaintance with the poem.

In form, it will be remembered, the poem is a series of triplets of eight-syllable lines, the ictus trochaic, and the rhymes double. It seems now to be admitted that, in order to reproduce the simple stateliness of the original, the triplet—"the threefold blow of the hammer on the anvil"—must be preserved; the trochaic rhythm is almost by consent changed into iambic movement; rests the question of the double rhyme. The English language furnishes a large number of double rhymes, it is true, but they are of few types. Thus in Chandler's, the first attempt to reproduce the double rhyme, of the seventeen triplets nine are rhymed with participles and three with other parts of verbs; in Dr. Irons's rendering the numbers are seven and four; in an American version, by a Mr. Heisler, as many as fourteen stanzas end in "-ing." The two-word rhyme appears in a few versions, not always happily. Take these two lines by Dr. Crookes, of Philadelphia:

"Then the scroll shall be unfolded Wherein's written what each soul did,"

—which, as a rendering of

"Liber scriptus proferetur,
In quo totum continetur,
Unde mundus judicetur," leaves something to be desired. Mr. Justice O'Hagan's desperate attempt to rhyme regions with obedience is eloquent of the difficulties which wait upon the attempt.

The present author has taken the stanzas one by one, and from the multitude of versions before him has selected the most typical, pointing out, with excellent judgment for the most part, their differentiating qualities. Finally, the method of rendering the crucial words is numerically classified. The fourth stanza is difficult:

"Mors stupebit et natura,
Cum resurget creatura,
Judicanti responsura."

Here the first line gives the impression of a complete change of order, the cessation of the former course of things. This is perhaps complicated by a reference to the Apocalyptic announcement of Death and Hell cast into the lake of fire. So thought Crashaw, and wrote :

"Horror of Nature, Hell, and Death !"

and Dr. Coles, who substitutes Hell for Nature. Father Caswell has "Death and Time"; Archbishop Benson, "Earth and Death"; and Mr. W. H. Robinson daringly writes "Death and Life." This is his stanza :

"Death and Life astonished view
Every creature rise anew,
Rise to meet the judgment true."

"Stupebit," again, is not easy: "stand at gaze" is well used by the old Rosarists. Dean Stanley finely writes :

"Nature then shall stand aghast Death himself be overcast."

Finally "creatura" is the occasion of many differences. It variously appears as "creation," "creatures," "the pale offender" (Lord Roscommon), and "the buried ages" (Father Caswall).

The difficulty of finding double rhymes is curiously exemplified in an American version of the next stanza ("Liber scriptus profetur. . .," quoted above):

"Forth is brought the record solemn;
See o'erwrit in each dread column
With men's deeds the Doomsday volume."

Canon Bright's version is good :

"Lo, the book before Him laid,
Wherein all things are displayed,
Whence the judgment must be made."

A tendency to diffuseness, most alien from the gravity of the original, manifests itself in Mr. Abrahall's garrulous lines, quoted with approval by Mr. Warren :

"Opened, lo, that book whose pages
Bear the record of the ages,
Precepts trampled, warnings alighted,
Love with thanklessness requited;
For whate'er stands there recorded Recompense is now awarded."

"Patronum" in the verse—

"Quid sum miser tunc dicturus,
Quem patronum rogaturus,
Cum vix justus sit securus?"

has proved a crux. The word in legal terminology signifies "advocate," "counsel"; renderings, therefore, which imply, as Dr. Irons implies, the idea of intercession or mediation must be set aside as wanting in accuracy. Of the few who express the correct idea is Drummond of Hawthornden in the crab-like verse :

"O, who then pity shall poor me,
Or who mine advocate shall be,
When scarce the righteous pass shall free?"

and perhaps Mr. Wallace in the verse :

"What shall be my pleading tearful,
Where shall I get counsel cheerful,
When the just almost are fearful?"

if we may suppose "counsel," in line 2, to appear bewigged.

Hastening on to the final stanza, we have space only for the pleasant rendering of Mr. Epes-Sargent, an American barrister :

"When, that day of tears impending,
From his ashes man ascending
At Thy bar shall be attendant, Spare him, God, spare the defendant";

with which Mr. Warren humorously compares Dr. Coles's :

"When I enter death's dark portal Feebly beats the pulse aortal."

Among the innumerable attempts to translate into the Anglo-Saxon tongue this mediæval meditation are to be read many fine lines, but it would seem as though the fine poem were still to seek. The force of the original is too often lost by diffuseness and periphrasis, its simplicity hidden beneath superfluous ornament, its hammering objectivity watered down, particularly in the modern and Protestant versions, into invertebrate sentiment. But Mr. Warren's pains have resulted in a very creditable treatise, which it has been a pleasure to read.

A BYWAY OF HISTORY.

Spanish Protestants in the Sixteenth Century.
Compiled from the German of C. A. Wilkens, Doctor of Theology and Philosophy, by Rachel Challice. (Heinemann.)

HITHERTO there has existed in the English language no adequate account of the abortive Protestant movement in Spain in the sixteenth century. The present work will, to some extent, supply this want; but unfortunately not so completely as might have been the case. The German original appeared in 1888, and it was apparently not long afterwards that the translator undertook the task of rendering the book into English.

"Seeing that the subject was little known in England, and that the material was chiefly drawn from Spanish, Italian, and German writers, it seemed a pity that it should be a closed book to those interested in Protestantism who are not conversant with the German language."

This being so we are rather surprised to learn that we have not the whole of Dr. Wilkens's work in the present translation.

"Unfortunately, when completed, the book was considered too ponderous for general readers, so the original translation, although still intact, has never been published. The interest now awakened in the subject of Spanish Protestantism by the present Church Reform movement in the Peninsula made me feel that the valuable information contained in Dr. Wilkens's work was a light hidden under a bushel, so I have, with the author's consent, reduced the translation of the book to half its original size, and compiled it in a form more adapted to the general reader."

All historical students will deeply regret that this course has been adopted. Seeing that the present volume contains less than two hundred by no means closely-printed pages, a book of twice the length can hardly be described as "ponderous"; and it is difficult to believe that any reader really interested in the subject would not have been glad to possess the work in full.

In its present shape it certainly displays, in parts, an incoherence and want of connexion which seriously detract from its value; but this defect would, no doubt, be made less manifest if we had the whole of the original before us.

We are left, in fact, with a series of interesting but isolated biographical sketches of the leaders of Spanish Protestantism, while the history of the movement as a whole, which Dr. Wilkens's work, from its original title, may be presumed to have contained, is somewhat difficult to gather from the present abridgment.

At no time could Spain be said to present a promising field for the dissemination of Protestant ideas.

"Of all the kingdoms of the empire, Spain appeared the most secure from the invasion of Lutheran thought. The history of the country, the character of the people, the influence of the priests, the clerical power of the Crown, and the vigilance of the Inquisition, all seemed impregnable bulwarks of Catholicism."

Nevertheless, as early as 1521 the authorities found it necessary to take precautions against the introduction of Protestant books, and

"two great casks of Lutheran literature, bound for Valencia in a Flemish vessel, were discovered and publicly burnt in the marketplace of San Sebastian. But what was forbidden to Spaniards at home could not be kept from those who resorted to the universities of France and Germany."

Many of these students became imbued with the reforming views which were in the air. The story of one of these, Juan Diaz, as told by Dr. Wilkens, presents many romantic features, but is too long for detailed quotation. He was, finally, treacherously assassinated in Germany by his own brother, who was a priest.

Another exile, Francisco de Enzinas, was the author of the first Spanish translation of the New Testament.

Gradually the new views began to find adherents in Spain itself, in spite of all the vigilance of both civil and ecclesiastical authorities. We are rather surprised to find that some of the Reformers went considerable lengths in the Protestant direction without formally withdrawing from the Church. The most remarkable of these cases is that of Constantino Ponre de la Fuente, who was a priest and a preacher in the Cathedral of Seville. It is astonishing to find that for many years he was able to publish a series of theological writings in which he was entirely silent about all the distinctive Catholic doctrines, and in some of which the Protestant drift of his opinions was manifest; and yet he was "offered the dignity of Doctor of Divinity at Malaga" by Philip II. himself! He fell at last into the hands of the Inquisition and died in a dungeon, but his long impunity is very remarkable. It was apparently about the middle of the sixteenth century that an organised Protestant congregation was formed in the city of Valladolid. The leader of the movement was Augustin Cazalla, who had been a Court preacher, and whose family were rich and influential. His brother Pedro also became a convert to the Lutheran doctrines, and the members of several noble families joined the society, which met in the mansion of the Cazalla family. For some time they managed to escape detection, but discovery was bound to come sooner or later. The news reached Charles V. in his retirement at Yuste shortly before his death, and aroused all the bigotry which had now completely dominated his mind.

"He saw danger ahead. 'He who hesitates is lost,' was the burden of his letters to the Regent, to Philip, and the Grand Inquisitor. . . . He now, therefore, called upon them to act in that prompt and severe manner which befitted the gravity of such an offence against the Church as well as the State."

Charles did not live to witness the accomplishment of his wishes, but they were effectually carried out under his successor.

Two autos-da-fé on a wholesale scale—the first on May 20, 1559, and the second on October 8 in the same year—extinguished Protestantism in Valladolid. They were followed by similar holocausts in Seville and other cities, which "proved the final death-blows to Spanish Protestantism in the sixteenth century."

THE YOUNG IDEA.

Children's Ways. By James Sully, M.A., LL.D. (Longmans & Co.)

IN 1895 appeared Prof. Sully's Studies of Childhood. Since then, the child has become more and more recognised as a fit subject for examination, the result of inquiries being no longer interesting only to psychologists, but to the reading public generally. Recognising this fact, Prof. Sully has extracted from his large volume a smaller one of less than half its size, written in popular language and enriched by new matter; so that it is now possible, by the light of Children's Ways, for every parent of intelligence to observe for himself the growth of mind in his own family. Prof. Sully comes with his highly trained intellect to the help of the ordinarily observant father, and placing before him such phenomena of child life as is within the scope of every one to collect he stimulates his eye. Yet the book before us is less scientific than human. Prof. Sully can point to his large volume as a solid contribution to psychology: in this little off-shoot, or child, of that work he is more untrammelled, more amusing and amused, more sympathetic. The professor gives way to the father, yet without a total forgetfulness of his profession. "I hope," he says in the preface, "that the result may succeed in recommending what has long been to myself one of the most delightful of subjects to many who would not be disposed to read a larger and more difficult work, and to draw on a few of these, at least, to a closer and more serious inspection of it." There may be danger in the unskilful study of children, but we can confidently affirm that all fathers and mothers that are interested in Prof. Sully's pages will afterwards be increasingly interested in their family.

Prof. Sully's observations, and the observations of those to whom he has gone for assistance, cover the ground very thoroughly, although there is not a mother in the United Kingdom who could not (of course) offer him better examples than any that are used. For the purpose of those who wish to be reminded of what it was like to be a child, the book is admirable. Here in sequence are the joys and fears, disappointments and triumphs, rebellions and doubts, honesties and deceptions, which go to make up the child's round. Prof. Sully passes all in review. The chief impression left is the delightful and irrecapturable oddity of the childish mind. Every step we take from infancy brings us nearer to prosaic commonplaceness. The dullest man or woman might, as a child, have said exquisitely audacious things—little gleaming fragments of unconscious poetry, daring and quite unanswerable heresies. Alas, the child is not the father of the man intellectually, or the world would be filled with poetry and humour. Many children have, at one time or another, expressed dissatisfaction with a scheme of Providence which did not arrange a perpetual kitten; similarly there are adults who have now and then wished that a perpetual child might fall to their lot. Compared with children, men and women are so burnt-out. It is mainly Prof. Sully's store of anecdotes and instances that lead us to the foregoing reflections. He has chosen well, and his pages are a little treasure-house of good things. Many appeared in the Studies of Childhood, but some are new, and all are fitting and well found. One or two fill us with increasing wonder at the childish mind. Thus: "A mother once remarked to her boy, between five and six years old, 'Why, R—, I believe you are kinder to the animals than you are to me.' 'Perhaps I am,' he replied; 'you see they are not so well off as you are.'" Again: "A little boy had been quarrelling with his sister Muriel just before going to bed. On kneeling down to say his prayers, and noticing that Muriel was sitting near and listening, he prayed aloud in this wise: 'Please, God, make Muriel a good girl,' then looked up and said in an angry voice, 'Do you hear that, Muriel?' and after this digression resumed his petition." Another child, a little girl whose grandfather had just died, prayed that God would mind and shut the door, because grandpapa "can't stand the draughts." We like, too, the little girl, aged three and a quarter, who asked her mother, "Please, mamma, will you pin this with the greatest pleasure?" But Prof. Sully's best discovery is the boy of eight, who put it to a "distinguished biologist": "Mr. —, Mr. —, if God wanted me to be good, and I wouldn't be good, who would win?" A biologist would need to be very distinguished to extricate himself gracefully from this corner. Posers are indeed so common in the nursery that a book of suitable replies or fences might well be compiled. This question, for example, occurs to most children, and has never yet been answered: "Father, why don't God kill the devil? and then there would be no wickedness in the world."

But Prof. Sully is content merely to record and classify, he does not advise. This, we think, is a pity. The book would be many times increased in value if it were made of real use to parents in the extremely difficult and perilous task of bringing up their children. The close attention which Prof. Sully has given to the subject must have fitted him to offer very many hints which fathers and mothers would be glad to have. We regret that he has not done so.

PEMBROKE.

A History of Pembroke College, Oxford. By Douglas Maclean, M.A. (Oxford Historical Society.)

THIS latest publication of the Oxford Historical Society adds a third to the valuable series of college monographs begun by Mr. Brodrick's Memorials of Merton College and Prof. Fowler's History of C.C.C. Such works of mingled piety and antiquarian enthusiasm cannot be too highly commended; they provide quarries of material for the history of the University which Mr. Clark, or Mr. Rashdall, or somebody will undertake in the future. It need hardly be said that Pembroke does not bear quite the transcendent importance of either of its two predecessors in the series. It has not, like Merton, the prestige of the prerogative college, nor is it, like Corpus, the monument and record of a great age of spiritual and intellectual awakening. As Pembroke, indeed, it dates only from 1624, in which year the Charter of Foundation was given by James the First, and the necessary endowment supplied by the gift of two gentlemen quos honoris causa nomino—Mr. Thomas Tesdale, of Ludwell Manor, and the Rev. Richard Wightwick, of East Ilsley.

The name of the college was taken from the Chancellor of the day, William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, the same whom Mr. Sidney Lee will not have to be the "W. H." of Shakespeare's Sonnets. But the munificence of Tesdale and Wightwick and the less costly patronage of King and Chancellor really did little more than give a new status to a house of education already of long standing. Both before and after the Reformation, Broadgates Hall had been a famous place of resort for law students, and Mr. Maclean has wisely included this earlier phase of the institution within the scope of his history. One may, perhaps, put down to the position of Broadgates as a "feeder" to the Inns of Court the somewhat remarkable number of men of letters which the Hall and its successor, the College, produced during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Strictly academic studies are chiefly represented on Mr. Maclean's bead-roll by William Camden, historicus ille plane immortalis, afterwards headmaster of Westminster College and pedagogue to Ben Jonson. But poets and wits appear in far greater profusion. John Heywood, epigrammatist and writer of interludes; Sir Edward Dyer, idyllist and Rosicrucian; Sir Fulke Greville, the friend of Sidney; the dramatists George Peele and Francis Beaumont; that extremely pleasant divine, Richard Corbet, Bishop of Oxford and of Norwich—all these, and others of less note, find their due and ample commemoration in the pages of the volume before us.

Of course it was in the eighteenth century that Pembroke reached the height of its fame. Doctor Johnson was perhaps the greatest, and certainly by far the noisiest man of letters of his age, and Doctor Johnson shed upon Pembroke a lustre in whose glory the College still lives. His rooms are pointed out to the gaping freshman, and his tea-pot and his cider-mug adorn the common-room. Johnson paid many visits to his old college in later years, as the reader of Boswell is aware, and here he gallanted Miss Hannah More around the buildings, and talked Gargantuan philosophy with the precocious and whimsical Henderson. "Madam," he said, "we were a nest of singing-birds"; though, indeed, of that brood, besides Johnson himself, only Shennstone remains known to fame; nor does the lyric suggestion which the metaphor calls up appear in modern ears precisely an appropriate one for the sonorous verse of the great lexicographer.

Mr. Maclean has performed his task with thoroughness and zeal, and has added to his main narrative numerous and interesting biographical sketches of the principal persons whom he has had occasion to mention. His account of the early buildings and topography of Broadgates is remarkably full and learned, but rather bewildering without the assistance of maps and plans more elaborate than those he has furnished. The immense mass of details with which he has had to deal makes verbal errors almost inevitable. Palsgrave's Acolatus, on p. 97, should be Acolastus, and Lord Brooke's Caelia, on p. 101, should be Caelica. But Mr. Maclean has deserved well of his college and of historical students in general by the happy accomplishment of a difficult and laborious undertaking.

SCOTLAND'S CARPET.

Wild Flowers of Scotland. By J. H. Crawford. (Maqueen.)

MR. CRAWFORD has lit upon a good subject, but has done it scant justice. If the author were not disposed to treat his subject in a strictly scientific manner, at least an orderly account of it might have been expected. Here the flowers of spring and summer are first described, then the author passes to those of the cornfields, woodlands, and mountain-tops, and finally descends to the southern uplands of the Borders. His style is as irritating as his arrangement. He bids us accompany him on his walks, and instead of soberly gathering what he discovers, he runs in front, to speak metaphorically, rushes at some flower and gushes over it like a girl. Thus he has produced an egotistical gossip book, not without some repetition here and there. It was natural that being a Scotchman he should expatiate on "the gowan," but it is possible that his readers should weary even of gowans. Who is the better for the following fine writing on the botanical name of the wood anemone?

"The wood is still. The woodland storm no more troubles the sheltered glades where the anemones dwell than the lash of waves reaches the depths of ocean. Far overhead the wind bends the topmost branches and sings a spiritualised version of the ruder song of the sea. Those who find it growing in the wilds may call it anemone, and those who come across the self-same plant in the woods may call it memorosa; and both will then be satisfied."

Certain places in Scotland boast that they speak English better than those whose mother-tongue it is. Perhaps they may admire another specimen of the author's style:

"The dry slope of woodland bank is inviting. One can drink in the exceeding loveliness of such surroundings better when he is lying down. The shadows over the current and up the far bank fall so pleasantly across the spirit. Only in so far as there are spirit shadows can we see their beauty. No tracery in Nature is more delicate than that above, except that shadow tracery of twigs and bursting buds below. One can scarcely help being beautiful in soul while he lies here. He is only reflecting."

Such mawkish reflections would have led Dr. Johnson at once to place Mr. Crawford among the "thousand other old women and fanatic writers of memoirs and meditations." The reader resents, when he wishes for botanical lore, being entertained with discursive sentiments of this kind.

It would be wrong, however, to dismiss Mr. Crawford without a word or two of commendation. His remarks on garden-escapes remind lovers of flowers of what they must have often noticed on the banks of rivers. He dwells upon the flowers which Queen Mary is supposed to have planted at Craigmillar Castle, and of those introduced by the monks at Balmerino. The plants of Caithness, too, are well described. Thanks to the sandstone formation they match, to a certain extent, with those of Orkney. He does not, however, allude to Dick's discovery of hierochloa borealis. Nor does he dwell upon the mildness of climate in North-West Sutherlandshire, thanks to the Gulf Stream.

As there is no chalk in Scotland, a large class of plants is absent. Thus it boasts no convolvulus, traveller's joy, or bryony. In the West of England the "horse gowan" is called by a much prettier name, the "moon daisy." "Poppies do not mass," adds Mr. Crawford, "like marguerites." In Devon we have seen many a corn-field which was a veritable Acelanda with them. There is a good deal of observation in the author's remarks on "links" (such as those at St. Andrews), and sand dunes, such as those which St. John describes so pleasantly, on the Moray Firth.

Best of all, perhaps, because any account of them delights a botanist, are Mr. Crawford's pages on the Alpine plants of Scotland. He who would see these plants must be prepared to climb and to rough it on Lochnagar and Ben Lawers, Caenlochan and Glen Doile, which are the Perthshire, Aberdeen, and Forfar regions for their growth. The author enters enthusiastically into the delights of gathering and cherishing these Arctic wildings. And he wisely is very indefinite in naming localities, for commerce has long been on their trail. Plant-sellers and gamekeepers know their value, and too often tear them up to sell them into a precarious existence on lower ground. Everyone must agree with Mr. Crawford that the owners of these mountain peaks ought religiously to protect these interesting wild plants. The Swiss are beforehand with us in legislation of this kind, as seen in the case of Edelweiss. Specimens ought not to be grudged to botanists, but wholesale abstraction from this Arctic flora should be sharply repressed. To lose a station for one of these singular relics of a forgotten vegetation is to take away just so much from the attractions of Scotland.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Foreigner in the Farmyard. By Ernest Edwin Williams. (Heinemann.)

MR. WILLIAMS has marshalled some startling figures, and successfully brings home to the mind of even the most careless reader a sense of the rapidity with which the produce of our English harvests is being displaced by that garnered from foreign fields. When, however, he begins to draw inferences from his statistics, and to suggest remedies, he is less satisfying. His whole book is a plea for a protection, but he is well aware that the British public is not likely to submit to a bread-tax merely to enable landlords to raise their rents. To meet this difficulty Mr. Williams would establish Land Courts to fix rents judicially, and thus enable the tenant-farmer to secure for himself the full benefit of the higher prices which Protection would bring. The tenant-farmers have more votes than their landlords, but not for the beaux yeux of the gallant yeomen is the vaster British public going to vote for a dear loaf. In this time of depression it is somewhat comic to hear Mr. Williams talking of the power of the landlords "to fix rents as they please."

Our author remarks that "the foreign competitor is not burdened with tithe." This is as true as it is irrelevant. Suppose a farm is let at 20s. an acre, and that the tithe is 2s. an acre, how would the abolition of the tithe help the farmer in his competition with the foreigner? The landlord would be two shillings in pocket, and that would be the only result. Mr. Williams is apparently under the impression that if the tithe were remitted the farmer would benefit, but on what grounds it is impossible to conjecture. Even he would hardly propose to confiscate the property of the parsons or the lay impropiators simply to make a present of it to the farmers. To rob the ancient owners of the tithe would be bad enough, but it would be simply grotesque to use the confiscated tithe as a gratuitous endowment for such a comparatively nomad class as are ordinary agricultural tenants. Again, in dealing with the land-tax, our author evades the obvious difficulty. He points to the anomaly and the inequalities of the tax, and strongly urges that the Government should sweep it away. The difficulty he fails to meet is this—that many landlords have made sacrifices in order to redeem the tax and clear their estates. Are these men to get nothing while their less careful neighbours are set free at the public expense? The apparent injustice of such a proposal has hitherto been fatal to every proposal for change, and it is worse than useless to ignore it.

The Old Ludgings of Stirling. By J. S. Fleming, F.S.A. (Scot.). (Eneas Mackay.)

THIS well-printed and sufficiently well-illustrated quarto is intended to form a record of such of the old residences of nobility, clergy, and civic officers in Stirling as have not yet been described. Mr. Fleming's gleanings are a heavy one. He has found about twenty old houses and taverns that were worthy of the double attention of his pen, for Mr. Fleming illustrates his book himself. His has been no hurried piece of book-making, nor is it, on the other hand, very elaborate. He does not discuss architectural technique, but is content to carefully draw a house, and tell us what he has been able to find out about its internal arrangements and its tenants. Some of the houses he describes have disappeared since 1850, when he first began to fill his sketch-book and note-book—a vindication of the usefulness of his work. Most, however, still stand, and alike collectively and individually they are of considerable interest to students of Scottish history. They show, for instance, the limited area of old Stirling. "We find no remains of buildings," says Mr. Fleming, "bearing marks of an earlier period than the eighteenth century, outside the limits, comprehending an area including Broad-street, St. John-street, Spittal-street, and Baker-street to the Infirmary, St. Mary's Wynd to the King's Stables, with an exception to be hereinafter noted." Throughout most of the sixteenth century Stirling was the abode of the Regents. Lennox, Mar, Morton, and Moray all lived here, with their train of church dignitaries and commissioners. A "crow-stepped" gabled house, still seen on the north side of Broad-street, was the lodging in 1529 of James Kirk, Commissioner to the Earl of Argyll, and afterwards of William Graham of Panholes. The town clerks of Stirling necessarily had their comfortable "ludgings." Town clerk Norie lived in a Dutch-looking house in Broad-street, for the domestic architecture of Stirling took many a hint from Holland, with which country the town had a direct communication by water. Norie built his "ludging" in 1671, and we learn that he was a discreet man. He ought to have been; he inscribed no less than three mottoes on his outer walls: on the first flat you may read (in Latin): "Wisdom is the tree of life" and "A good conscience is a brazen wall"; and against the second flat, "Glory to God alone." The "ludgings" of Provost Stevenson, Forrester of Logie, Moir of Leckie, Bailie Beauchop, James Bowie, and other Stirling worthies of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, are passed in review by Mr. Fleming, who writes careful matter-of-fact accounts of each that leave nothing to be desired except, perhaps, a gleam or two of humour, such as the subject would seem to promise. The book well deserves its strong list of local subscribers; but it stands not the less securely on its merits. Apropos of Mr. Fleming's evasion of architectural details, we note that the same publishers announce an architectural and more expensive work on "Old Stirling" by Mr. John W. Small.

New Zealand Rulers and Statesmen. From 1840 to 1897. By William Gisborne. (Sampson Low.)

THIS new and greatly expanded edition of Mr. Gisborne's work will rank as a careful, authoritative history of New Zealand under British influence and rule. Many Englishmen, we imagine, entirely overlook the fact that this history dates only from 1839, when the action of the New Zealand Company in sending Colonel Wakefield to purchase land from the natives, and found a settlement, provoked the Colonial Office into recognising the possibilities of these long lovely islands of the Antipodes. Captain Hobson was sent out as consul, and the drama of half a century began. The problems which have beset the governors and British representatives in New Zealand in lessening urgency since 1840 have been, as Mr. Gisborne reminds us, many and knotty. It is a little appalling to think that the Treaty of Waitangi, on which British authority in New Zealand may be said to rest, is not even a name to the average Englishman, and that "the mutual relations of the Crown, the natives, and the colonists" have been things little heeded in England. But England has supplied the men who settled these matters on the best and surest foundation; and we may always console ourselves with the faith that in time of emergency England's appreciation of the conditions of life in her remotest colony will be as acute as it will be sudden. Mr. Gisborne's book takes the only possible form of a series of biographical sketches of the administrators of New Zealand, and a feature of the book is the number and excellence of its portraits. One figure in the procession has a home literary interest. Mr. Alfred Domett, who was for thirty years a New Zealand politician and administrator, is still remembered by a few as a poet of some pretensions. Mr. Gisborne justly describes his epic poem "Ranolf and Amohia" as "a comprehensive and accurate record of natural history, of scenery, and of aboriginal life in New Zealand . . . clothed in facile verse." Browning and Tennyson each praised the poem. With Browning Mr. Domett enjoyed a close friendship, and the query—

"What's become of Waring Since he gave us all the slip?"

was prompted by Domett's sudden departure to New Zealand in 1842.

The Young Pianist. Part I. By Helen Hogg Kelly.

As there are so many pianoforte tutors or instruction books the authoress in her brief introductory remarks explains the appearance of yet another. She looks upon the simplest tutor as "beyond the comprehension of beginners." Good teachers, of course, well understand the necessity of giving certain explanations in addition to those contained in any instruction book. As, however, all teachers are not properly qualified, it is well that some one, like Miss Kelly, who has evidently had experience, should show how to make the study of music easy and attractive. The description and use of both treble and bass staves from the outset are excellent; the study of the names of the notes becomes much simpler. Whether the practising of the scale before five-finger exercises is altogether wise seems certainly open to question. The Young Pianist, or rather the first part, will prove of good service. The work is published by J. Heywood, of London, Manchester, &c.

The Age of Milton. By the Rev. J. Howard B. Masterman, M.A. (Bell.)

PROF. HALES has not been very successful in mapping out the series of little handbooks of which this forms a part. The Age of Milton is a peculiarly meaningless title. It does not suggest the chronological scope of the book, for, as a matter of fact, Milton's more important work, though treated here, falls properly within the Age of Dryden, which forms the subject of a companion volume. Nor is Milton the true centre from which to view the history of Caroline literature, because, though in it, he was hardly of it. "His soul was like a star and dwelt apart," so that his age does not naturally fall under him, as, for instance, in Prof. Herford's admirable little sketch, the Age of Wordsworth falls naturally under Wordsworth himself. Much the same is true of Shakespeare, and if Prof. Hales wanted his successive volumes to coincide with successive waves of literary tendency, he would have done better to replace the Age of Shakespeare and the Age of Milton by the Age of Spenser and the Age of Donne. Shakespeare and Milton, as outside and above their ages, might really have had volumes to themselves. It is, perhaps, to this unfortunate demarcation of the subject that Mr. Masterman's failure to put any real unity into his book must be attributed. A third of it consists of an account of Milton, which adds nothing to what has been said fifty times before; the rest is made up of brief notices of contemporary writers, which are always jejune and not always correct. The two pages on Henry Vaughan contain at least as many errors of fact. And of bringing out general principles or pointing the student to the trend of things there is very little attempt. We doubt whether such handbooks, distinguished neither by freshness of design nor especial felicity of treatment, really serve any useful purpose, and they seem to multiply like mushrooms. The volume was originally undertaken by Mr. J. Bass Mullinger, who contributes an introduction and a few other pages.

The Letters of Cicero to Atticus. Book I. Edited by Alfred Pretor. (George Bell & Sons.)

EVERY scholar will welcome the third edition of this excellent little book. Mr. Pretor has added to it an appendix, in which he deals in masterly fashion with the later criticisms of his text, and particularly with those points on which he differs with Prof. Tyrrell. We are glad to see that he has not imitated Mr. Jeans in rendering Cicero's Greek phrases into French—a course which, to our mind, can only be excused by the theory that Cicero's Greek was used as ineptly and as awkwardly as the French of a female novelist.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

The Christian. By Hall Caine. (W. Heinemann.)

To be quite honest I must confess that my literary conscience is pricking me. It hints that I had no right to enjoy the reading of this book so much as I did. For now that I have laid it down and thought about it calmly for a day I find myself in the mental attitude of the man who reflects at breakfast over last night's melodrama. I perceive that the story which excited me had not the inevitable flow of life, but was stuck together, deftly enough, by a master of effects. I perceive that the dozens of characters which form the "cast" of The Christian cross each other's paths as continually and as conveniently as though London were no bigger than the Adelphi stage. In short, I am conscious of having been cheated of my sighs by a story that has no more reality than the annual autumn production at Drury Lane. Yet why should I grumble? I have sighed and laughed, and if I had had tears to shed I believe I should have shed them. And after all, why should we despise a good melodrama? Many of us would be happy enough to live in a world of which Mr. George R. Sims was the creator.

The plot of the book is the old one, which is never stale; the antagonism between love and duty, the flesh and the spirit, the lower and the higher life. I am afraid, judging from the title, that Mr. Hall Caine meant John Storm—the Christian—to be the central character of the book. Unfortunately, Storm is merely a foolish fanatic, a stage apostle, without a pennyweight of brains behind his blazing eyes. But Storm interfered only occasionally with my enjoyment; for Glory Quayle, with whom Storm is unwillingly in love, is alone worth the money. Storm comes from the Isle of Man to be a curate in a West End parish, full of enthusiasm for self-sacrifice. Glory comes from the same place to be a hospital nurse. She writes thus of herself in one of her letters home—they are really delightful letters, the letters of a living woman:

"Talk about two natures in one, I've got two hundred and fifty, and they all want to do different things! Ah me! the 'ould Book' says that woman was taken out of the rib of a man, and I feel sometimes as if I want to get back to my old quarters."

John Storm is soon disgusted with his fashionable vicar, who showed a want of charity towards a hospital nurse who had got into trouble with a gentleman. There was a tempestuous scene:

"His eyes were wild, his voice was hoarse; he was like a man breaking the bonds of a tyrannical slavery."

"You called that poor child a prostitute because she had wasted the good gifts which God had given her. But God has given good gifts to you also—gifts of intellect and eloquence with which you might have raised the fallen and supported the weak, and defended the down-trodden and comforted the broken-hearted—and what have you done with them? You have bartered them for benefices and peddled them for popularity; you have given them in exchange for money, for houses, for furniture, for things like this—and this—and this! You have sold your birthright for a mess of pottage, therefore you are the prostitute."

Somehow, while reading this, my thoughts turned instinctively to Wilson Barrett. Of course these remarks ended Storm's career as a fashionable curate, and in his passion for self-sacrifice he went into an Anglican monastery. This is what Glory has to say about him:

"Oh, haven't I given you the 'newsies' about John Storm? There are so many things to think about in a place like London, you see. Yes, he has gone into a monastery—communication cut off—wires broken down by the 'storm,' &c. Soberly, he has gone for good, seemingly, and to talk of it lightly is like picking a penny out of a blind man's hat. Of course, it was only to be expected that a man with an upper lip like that should come to grief with all those married old maids and elderly women of the opposite sex. Canons to right of him, canons to left of him, canons in front of him—but rumour says it was John himself who volleyed and thundered. He wrote me a letter when he was on the point of going, saying how London had shocked and disappointed him, and how he longed to escape from it and from himself at the same time, that he might dedicate his life to God. It was right and true, no doubt; but wherefore could I not pronounce Amen? He also mentioned something about myself, how much I had been to him; for he had never known his mother, and had never had a sister, and could never have a wife. All which was excellent; but a mere woman like Glory doesn't want to read that sort of thing in a letter, and would rather have five minutes of John Storm the man than a whole eternity of John Storm the saint."

That bit of one of Glory's postscripts gives you the key of the whole situation.

Meanwhile Storm is trying to eliminate the flesh in the monastery, and Glory is doing "different things." She is dismissed from the hospital, she takes lodgings with a baby-farmer, serves in a tobacco shop, performs on Sunday evenings at the foreign clubs in Soho, goes on the music-hall stage, and finally becomes an actress and a success, preserving her purity all the time by that admirable anti-septic, a sense of humour. Storm, leaving the monastery, sets to work in a fury of reforming zeal at a mission church in Soho, loving Glory all the time, and loathing her worldly life. At last he decides on a crowning act of self-sacrifice, and determines to take the place of Father Damien on the leper island. Moreover, he wants Glory, who has confessed her love, to accompany him. And Glory in an exalted moment consents:

"Are you sure—quite sure? Am I asking too much of you? Don't let us deceive ourselves—think—"

"Let us talk of something else now." She began to laugh. "Look at me, John—don't I look well to-day?"

"You always look well, Glory."

"But isn't there any difference—this dress for instance?"

Then his sight came back, and his big eyes sparkled.

"How beautiful you are, dear!"

"Really! Do I look nice then, really?"

"My beautiful, beautiful girl!"

Her head was thrown back and she glowed with joy.

"Don't come too near me, you know—don't crush me."

"Nay, no fear of that. I should be afraid."

"Not that I mustn't be touched exactly."

"What will they think, I wonder, those poor lost creatures, so ugly, so disfigured?"

"And my red hair. This colour suits me, doesn't it?"

"Some Madonna, they'll say; the very picture of the Mother of God herself!"

"Are you—are you afraid of me in this frock, dear? Shall I run and take it off?"

"No, no; let me look at you again."

"But you don't like me to-day, for all that."

"I?"

"Do you know you've never once kissed me since you came into the room?"

"Glory!"

"My love, my love!"

"And you," he said, close to her lips, "are you ready for anything?"

"Anything," she whispered.

At the next moment she was holding herself off, with her arms stiff about his neck, that she might look at him and at her lace sleeves at the same time. Suddenly a furrow crossed his brow. He had remembered the Father's warning, and was summoning all his strength.

"But out there I'll love you as a sister, Glory."

"Ah!"

"For the sake of those poor doomed beings cut off from earthly love we will love each other as the angels love."

"Yes, that is the highest, purest, truest love, no doubt. Still —"

Still Glory could not rise to the height of that great argument; she preferred—naturally—her leading rôle at the theatre. And Storm, in an access of fanaticism, decides to kill her body to save her soul. The midnight visit of Storm to Glory is a remarkable bit of writing. I would gladly quote it, but it is too long, and I refuse to mutilate it.

The story ends in the only possible way. Storm fails, of course, to reform society; indeed, he gets himself killed in the attempt; and I, being unregenerate, and impatient of donkeys who mean well, am glad.

I have an uneasy suspicion—from an author's note at the end—that Mr. Hall Caine has a moral up his sleeve. I hope I am mistaken. Taken on its merits it is a striking story; but it is quite impossible to feel any sympathy with the "Christian," who is simply a fool who happens to be religious. Your attention, however, is gripped at the outset, and held throughout. It is not until you begin to think the matter over that you notice the paint splashes, the violent colouring, the strained effects. And then it doesn't matter much. For as a bit of scene-painting The Christian is a superb picture.

* * * *

The Fascination of the King. By Guy Boothby.
(London: Ward, Lock & Co.)

The Fascination of the King belongs to what may be described as the "Anthony Hope" order of romance. Unfortunately it is not written with that author's saving grace of humour. The Marquis of Instow, who enacts the now familiar rôle of a nineteenth century English nobleman, who finds himself against his will plunged into a whirlpool of exciting and dangerous adventure, has not that lightness of touch which endears his prototype (or at least one of his prototypes) to me in the earlier chapters of the Prisoner of Zenda. Instow, in fact, has a deadly solemnity, even a certain pompousness, about him which robs him not a little of my sympathy. But those who have a passion for adventurous fiction will find plenty to their liking in Mr. Boothby's new book. In it they will be introduced to a mysterious king of the Médangs, of uncertain parentage, Marie I. by name, who has built up for himself an independent kingdom, somewhat in the manner of Rajah Brook of Sarawak (whose bones now rest in a little Devonshire churchyard), somewhere in the Hinterland of Annam. Needless to say, those wicked French, whose greed of colonial aggrandisement need not be commented on here, cast envious eyes on this new kingdom; collisions take place between their troops and those of Marie I., and war is declared. After this we have alarms and excursions, in which Instow, whose sister the king has married, acquits himself in the most heroic fashion, and everything winds up happily. Further particulars I will not give lest I betray too much of a not very complex plot. There is one point on which I am inclined to quarrel with Mr. Boothby. His fascinating monarch is at times deplorably colloquial. "You have hit the nail on the head this time, Roche," hardly seems a dignified speech for a monarch addressing his commanding officer at a council meeting. In fact, the book as a whole is markedly deficient in style. The account of the ambush by which the French Army is surrounded and almost annihilated by the generalship of the excellent Instow is a fair example of Mr. Boothby's writing, and as such I quote it:

"Almost as my repeater struck half-past eleven, an officer whom I had stationed at the end of the pass came hurrying along to inform me that the enemy were about to enter it. A few moments later there burst upon my ear the sound of voices, and with a suddenness that startled me the advance guard of the enemy appeared in sight. Scarcely more than fifty yards behind them came the main body, chatting and laughing, without any thought of a surprise. I waited until they were exactly opposite me, and then, crouching behind a rock in order that the tiny flame might give them no warning of our position, lit a match and set fire to the rocket. With a long hiss, and scattering a trail of sparks, it rose into the air, and at the same instant two hundred and fifty rifles rang out, followed an instant later by a similar number.

Anything like the horror and confusion of the next few minutes no man could possibly imagine. The terrified troops in the gully below knew neither what to do nor which way to turn. Their ranks were completely disorganised, while volley after volley was being poured into them from the hillside above. They tried to advance, but were met by Denton's fire; they tried to retreat, only to find themselves assailed by the third party; and all the time my detachment was raking them from mid-between. The air was filled with cries and curses, the rattle of rifles, and the shouting of orders. Dante's Inferno would scarcely have compared with it."

There are occasionally rather careless slips in the book. A plain twenty-nine miles to the westward of a city could not conceivably be reached by an armed force on foot in four hours, even by the shortest of short cuts, especially in a night march. And it is certainly undeniable that you would not help a man who had never been to Venice to picture for himself the Bridge of Sighs by telling him that it spanned the Grand Canal, because it doesn't. These, however, are but small points. At the same time, I do not think that Mr. Boothby's story is a very triumphant opening for the busy publishing season that is to follow the long interregnum of the Jubilee.

* * * *

A Bride's Madness. By Allen Upward.
(Arrowsmith.)

This is a detective story of the conventional type, in which the detective comes from Scotland Yard, takes his orders from casual earls, runs after a clue for two or three hundred pages, and finds himself where he least expected. The opening chapters will excite your curiosity. When the express arrives at Glasgow a saloon carriage remains with drawn blinds, and an unclaimed pile of luggage is left upon the platform. Guards and porters wonder, and finally investigate. Within is found a drunken man asleep. Awakened, he is asked by the guard what has become of the young lady known to be travelling with him.

"Hardly were the words out of his mouth when they were answered by a low moan which caused his comrades and himself to start violently, and turn their eyes simultaneously to a narrow door in the end of the saloon, which gave admission to a smaller compartment used as a dressing-room.

The partially aroused drunkard followed the direction of their eyes, and heard a second feeble moan issue from the inner compartment. The effect seemed to be almost instantly to sober him.

"A very distressing thing has happened," he said, rising unaided to his feet, and speaking in tones which, though still husky, were fairly distinct; "it has completely upset me, and made me ill as you see. The excitement she has passed through lately has been too much for my poor wife. I have reason to fear that she has gone out of her mind."

Then we have the murder of the gamekeeper on a west country estate, and it is the task of this story to connect the two incidents, as Wilkie Collins might say. Mr. Allen Upward connects them. But the trail of the conventional detective story is over it all, and I don't believe a word of it. Somehow, when I find a detective in a story I am sure that I shall be reminded of the tales rendered so popular by the Family Herald. The detective finds out the weak points of an author. Mr. Allen Upward has proved by A Crown of Straw that he can write. I wish he would.

THE NOVELS OF MR. MEREDITH.

We take the following extracts from the thoughtful article on Mr. Meredith, which appears in the new Quarterly Review. The writer, it should be said, finds much to demur to in Mr. Meredith's style, and thinks that "his judgment is not equal to his genius." He is in all things too intellectual: "A writer to deserve the epithet great should be master of a various power, a various charm; he should subdue us by sympathy, by enthusiasm, by wit, by reason, by an appeal to the heart as well as by an appeal to the head; Mr. Meredith hammers too exclusively at our intelligence." The writer thinks that by his recent attempts to prune his novels of excrescences "Mr. Meredith virtually acknowledges the recklessness of his methods." He even suggests that Mr. Meredith was taking a side-glance at his own work when he described Dumas' novel, The Cantatrice, in the following terms:

"No clever transcript of the dialogue of the day occurred," we are told; "no hair-breadth 'scapes, perils by sea and land, heroisms of the hero, fine shrieks of the heroine; no set scenes of catching pathos and humour; no distinguishable points of social satire, equivalent to a smacking of the public on the chops, which excites it to a grin with keen discernment of the author's intention. She did not appeal to the senses nor to a superficial discernment. So she had the anticipatory sense of failure; and she wrote her best in perverseness."

Despite these strictures, all through his article the writer does splendid justice to Mr. Meredith's achievements. Here is a passage in which the writer passes from the consideration of Mr.

Meredith's style to his description of Nature, and thence to his delineations of women :

"Mr. Meredith's style has charm, but an occasional, a fitful charm. We do not contend that there is a hidden grace in such phrases as 'her meditations tottered in dots,' 'swings suspended on a scarce credible guess,' 'infrigidated a congenial atmosphere by an overflow of exclamatory wonderment,' 'women whose bosoms can be tombs,' or 'head performed the negative,' or 'resumed its brushing negative,' or in any of the phrases usually quoted in derision of Mr. Meredith's style. For a deliberate artist he can be terribly uncouth; but though eccentricities may mar a character, though they may mar a style, they are not necessarily inconsistent with charm. Mr. Meredith plays the coquette with his readers, and estranges them that he may display his power of reducing them once again to subjection. Much, indeed, of the charm of his style consists in this—that it is suffused with poetry. He began as a poet; and it is not difficult, more especially perhaps in his transcripts of Nature, to discover the poet behind the novelist. Passage after passage will recur to his readers in which he has rendered with a poet's fidelity, with a poet's felicity, the more elusive aspects of a scene, its air and stay. No poet has with more penetrating insight realised the unity, the larger harmony which, without moral or spiritual loss, includes man in Nature. The atmosphere of Nature's varying moods, and their magnetic influences upon the soul, these, the proofs of that harmony, he has set himself to delineate in his verse. The subtle effluences of a morn of May, the autumnal chill of November that damps to the bone, the virago morn on which the wind has teeth and claws, all these equally he is glad to have known; they belong to the great order of things. And because he is a poet Mr. Meredith is the closest observer of Nature among all our novelists, the closest observer and the most minute painter among them.

'February blew south-west for the pairing of the birds. A broad warm wind rolled clouds of every ambiguity of form in magnitude over peeping azure, or skimming upon lakes of blue and lightest green, or piling the amphitheatre for majestic sunset.'

'Rain was universal; a thick robe of it swept from hill to hill; thunder rumbled remote, and between the ruffled roars the downpour pressed on the land with a great noise of eager gobbling.'

'South-western rain clouds are never long sullen. . . . they rise and take veiled features in long climbing watery lines; at any moment they may break the veil and show soft upper cloud, show sun on it, show sky, green near the verge they spring from, of the green of grass in early dew.'

But if Mr. Meredith's transcripts of Nature belong to poetry, there are passages in his description of women that belong to it no less. His admirers are indeed always willing to stake his reputation upon the boyishness of his boys and the womanhood of his women. And they are not wrong. The author of 'Richard Feverel' and 'Harry Richmond' is, without doubt, a supreme delineator of boyhood; he has probed it to the centre. And despite the reservations we have still to make in respect of our author as a literary artist, we must register a conviction that in his portraiture of women he is without a rival among English novelists. The reference to Shakespeare made in this connexion by Mr. Meredith's admirers is a trite one, but it is not unwarrantable. When one thinks of Shakespeare's women, and the wonderful procession begins to pass before the eye of the mind, it is difficult to believe that anything at all comparable will ever be seen again. And, indeed, nothing at all comparable ever will be seen again, yet if one thinks of some of them singly: of Juliet, who could 'teach the torches to burn bright'; of Constance, who 'will instruct her sorrows to be proud'; of Portia, 'the true and honourable wife' of Brutus; of Rosalind, the forest-maid, who plays the forester with such consummate delicacy and grace; of Perdita, the country child, as fresh and beautiful as her own flowers drenched in the bright dews of heaven; of Viola, the silent; of Olivia, the stately; of Cleopatra, who could 'make death proud to take her'—if we call up to memory some of these marvellous portraits by Shakespeare, though the possibility of any general comparison dies away with the mere mental enumeration, it may yet perhaps justly be said that among Mr. Meredith's portraits there are some which the fierce light of the comparison cannot injure, there are some imagined and presented so similarly that we are even forced to make it. Letitia Dale, 'with the romantic tale upon her eyelashes'; Clara Middleton, 'the dainty rogue in porcelain,' 'who gives one an idea of the mountain echo'; Diana, all air and fire, worthy the name of the quivered goddess; Renée, with her Southern blood and wilful graces; Emilia, the simple girl and passionate patriot; Lucy, a fairy princess, a magic enchantment to the eyes of the new Ferdinand; the soft-eyed star of love, Ottilia, noble in heart and name; to deny that these are near of kin to the women of Shakespeare is indeed possible, but Justice and the Graces forbid it."

The writer concludes by remarking that "there is no living writer whose genius could be more fitly wedded to the perfection of the printer's art"; and he goes so far as to say that Messrs. Constable's new edition is, "in its way, as individual and decorative a product as are the creations of Mr. Meredith's imagination."

SELECTED NOVELS

HURST & BLACKETT'S LIST.

NEW WORK BY EDITH E. CUTHELL.

Now ready, at all Booksellers', in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d.

IN CAMP and CANTONMENT: Stories of Foreign Service. By EDITH E. CUTHELL, Author of "Only a Guardroom Dog," "The Wee Widow's Cruise," &c.

New and Important Work, in 1 vol., small 4to, extra cloth, gilt top, price Half-a-Guinea.

WOMEN NOVELISTS of QUEEN VICTORIA'S REIGN.

A Book of Appreciations. "The Sisters Brontë." By Mrs. OLIPHANT.—"George Eliot." By Mrs. LYNN LINTON.—"Mrs. Gaskell." By EDNA LYALL.—"Mrs. Craik." By Mrs. PARR. And other Essays by CHARLOTTE M. YONGE, ADELINA SHERBURN, Mrs. MACQUOID, Mrs. ALEXANDER, and Mrs. MARSHALL.

NEW WORK BY CAPTAIN S. H. JONES-PARRY.

In 1 vol., demy 8vo, with Portrait of the Author, price 12s.

AN OLD SOLDIER'S MEMORIES. By S. H. Jones-Parry, J.P., D.L., late Captain Royal Dublin Fusiliers, Author of "My Journey Round the World," &c.

"The author is to be thanked for a budget of stories, told with soldierly frankness, humour, and kindness."—Academy.

NEW EDITION, CONDENSED, REVISED, AND WITH MUCH NEW MATERIAL. Now ready, in 1 vol., large crown 8vo, with Portrait of Lady Hamilton, gilt top, price 6s.

LADY HAMILTON and LORD NELSON. An Historical Biography, based on Letters and other Documents in the Morrison Collection. By JOHN CORDY JEAFFRESON, Author of "The Real Lord Byron," &c.

NEW AND POPULAR NOVELS.

NEW NOVEL BY DR. GEORGE MACDONALD.

Now ready, at all Booksellers' and Libraries, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

SALTED with FIRE. By George Macdonald, LL.D.,

Author of "Robert Falconer," "Sir Gibbie," &c.

"The novel throughout reveals in all its power not only the literary beauty and genius, but the moral excellence of all the author's former efforts."—Dundee Advertiser.

A FLAME of FIRE. By Mrs. Haweis, Author of "The Art of Beauty," "Chaucer for Children," "The Bride's Garland," &c. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"'A Flame of Fire' deserves commendation for a certain picturesqueness and vigour of writing, for strongly-conceived incident, and for the bold incisiveness of its descriptive passages."—The Globe.

BROKEN THREADS. By Compton Reade, Author of "Take Care Whom You Trust," "Who Was Then the Gentleman?" &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is bright comedy all through Mr. Compton Reade's story, with just so much serious incident as is necessary to keep the book from being frivolous or trifling."—Scotsman.

THE SILENCE BROKEN. By G. M. Robins (Mrs. Baillie REYNOLDS), Author of "The Isles of March," "Her Point of View," &c. 1 v., small crown 8vo, 2s.

"An interesting little character-sketch, involving a ghost story of real charm and pathos. Mrs. Robins's style has distinction and force, nor does she lay her colours on too thickly."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The tale is a thoroughly interesting one, and exceptionally well told."—Whitehall Review.
"The scene where the silence is broken is written with power, and the effect of the haunted house is weird and impressive."—Manchester Guardian.

BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY AND SEASIDE.

WORKS BY THE LATE MRS. OLIPHANT.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION, uniformly bound in 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth, price HALF-A-CROWN. Now ready at all Booksellers'.

ADAM GRAEME.
LAIRD of NORLAW.
AGNES.
LIFE of IRVING.

A ROSE in JUNE.
PHOEBE JUNIOR.
IT WAS A LOVER AND HIS LASS.

The following Cheap Editions are now ready. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, red cloth, price Half-a-Crown.

GRANDMOTHER'S MONEY.

By F. W. ROBINSON.

NO CHURCH. By F. W. ROBINSON.

MARGARET and her BRIDESMAIDS. By the Author of "The Valley of a Hundred Fires."

THROUGH the LONG NIGHT. By Mrs. E. LYNN LINTON.

BARBARA'S HISTORY.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

LORD BRACKENBURY.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

THE VALLEY of a HUNDRED FIRES. By the Author of "Margaret and her Bridesmaids."

HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

The following Obstinate Case of Indigestion of Twenty Years' standing, with Pain after Food, Loss of Appetite, and Loss of Flesh, was completely cured by Guy's Tonic. Read the statement carefully:

"58, Caledonian Street, Leeds.

"I have pleasure in stating the following facts with regard to the great benefit my wife has received from a course of Guy's Tonic.

"I have been married twenty years, and for the greater part of that time she has suffered from Indigestion, and has not been able to eat any other flesh meat except mutton, and that only sparingly. She has tried all sorts of medicines without any lasting results, and one of the leading Doctors in this City told her she would always be Dyspeptic

"Her Appetite failed her, and she began to lose flesh. I came across one of your Advertisements in which a similar case was mentioned, and I sent out and got a bottle of Guy's Tonic; I then got another, and now have the satisfaction of saying that Guy's Tonic put her all right; and her appetite is such that she can eat a dry crust with relish.

"I think Guy's Tonic only wants to become more widely known to be highly appreciated by all who suffer from Indigestion and kindred Ailments.

"B. W. HORSMAN."

All Chemists and Stores sell Guy's Tonic.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's SWISS MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 3.

To clean the teeth properly, remember that they must be brushed up and down, as well as backwards and forwards, and something used on the tooth-brush that will penetrate to the crevices and inter-spaces. Ordinary tooth pastes and so on are of no use for this. Some of them would be all right "if it wasn't for the spaces in between"; but SOZODONT and SOZODONT alone will keep these spaces clean. The spaces matter: bits of food can't lodge on the front of the teeth: it is the spaces that hold them:

Another thing is, that SOZODONT sweetens everything it touches; it is so agreeable to use, and makes the mouth feel so nice afterwards, that you find it no trouble to clean the teeth twice a day; and twice is the proper number of times--night and morning. SOZODONT gives you sound teeth, healthy, rose-red gums and breath that is always sweet. Sold everywhere at 2s. 6d.

HALL & RUOKEL, Proprietors, New York.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1897.

No. 1319, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

MR. HALL CAINE has got the start of the majestic world of letters. When nothing is being published he issues fifty thousand copies of his new novel. We do not know whether to regard this as the opening event of the autumn publishing season, or as an event by itself. It is certain that the issue of fifty thousand copies of this novel will give a fillip to business in nearly every bookshop of any pretensions in the kingdom. The story, we note, is divided into four "Books," entitled respectively: "The Outer World," "The Religious Life," "The Devil's Acre," and "Sanctuary." The period of the story is the last quarter of the present century. Mr. Caine appends the following explanatory "Author's Note" to his story:

"It will be seen that in writing this book I have sometimes used the diaries, letters, memoirs, sermons, and speeches of recognisable persons, living and dead. Also, it will be seen that I have frequently employed fact for the purposes of fiction. In doing so I think I am true to the principles of art, and I know I am following the precedent of great writers. But being conscious of the grievous danger of giving personal offence, I would wish to say that I have not intended to paint anybody's portrait, or to describe the life of any known society or to indicate the management of any particular institution. To do any of these things would be to wrong the theory of fiction as I understand it, which is not to offer mock history or a substitute for fact, but to present a thought in the form of a story with as much realism as the requirements of idealism permit. In presenting the thought which is the motive of The Christian my desire has been to depict, however imperfectly, the types of mind and character, of creed and culture, of social effort and religious purpose, which I think I see in the life of England and America at the close of the nineteenth century. For such a task my own observation and reflection could not be enough, and so I am conscious that in many passages of this book I have often been merely as the mould through which the metal has passed from the fires kept burning round about."

The twenty-five-shilling edition of Prince Ranjitsinhji's The Jubilee Book of Cricket is a very handsome volume, and in all its editions the book is secure of a welcome. The portrait of Prince Ranjitsinhji "hooking a short-pitched ball on tife wicket" is a beautifully executed photographure, and the easy attitude of the Prince in this movement makes it suitable for the frontispiece portrait. The illustrations to the book are one of its notable features, consisting as they do of instantaneous photographs of many of our finest players. "Storer Waiting for the Ball," "Lilley at the Wicket," "W. L. Murdoch's Under-leg Stroke," "Richardson in the Act of Delivery," "Gunn's Forward Drive between Mid-off and Extra-cover," "Lord Hawke Cutting," "W. G. Grace Forcing the Ball on the On-side"—these are a few out of the dozens of subjects chosen. In a prefatory note the author acknowledges assistance received from Mr. W. J. Ford, Prof. Case, Mr. C. B. Fry, and others. As is well known, the book is dedicated by permission to "Her Majesty the Queen-Empress."

With Prince Ranjitsinhji's book comes—"to share the triumph and partake the gale"—Cricket, by W. J. Ford, with contributions by F. G. J. Ford, Tom Richardson, and M. C. Kemp. This is a reprint, with slight alterations, of the article on Cricket in Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen's Encyclopædia of Sport. But the value of the booklet is diminished by the fact that Prince Ranjitsinhji's chapter on Batting is omitted.

From Mr. Elliot Stock comes a reprint of Captain Cuellar's Adventures in Connacht and Ulster, A.D. 1588. This narrative of the Spanish Armada has been dealt with already by various writers. Here it is discussed by Mr. Hugh Allingham, a member of the Royal Society of Antiquaries (Ireland). Cuellar's narrative is presented at the end of this slim book in a translation by Mr. Robert Crawford, M.A.

The week has produced some dozen small works of various kinds. Crime and Criminals is a book of notes on, and portraits of, criminals by Dr. J. Sanderson Christison, and is published in Chicago by the W. T. Keener Company. The writer distinguishes three classes of delinquents: the insane (defective in reason); the moral paretic (defective in self-control); and the criminal proper (defective in conscience). After Death is a book of essays by Lilian Whiting, whose previous collections under the title of The World Beautiful we have had occasion to notice favourably. Miss Whiting's new book deals more closely than her others with the subjects of death and the future life; it has been inspired, indeed, by a bereavement. Several books useful to tourists reach us. The Shakespearean Guide to Stratford-on-Avon appears to have been compiled with great care by H. Snowden Ward and Catherine Weed Ward. It is also well illustrated from photographs. The writers protest against the idea that prohibition prices rule in Stratford-on-Avon, where, they contend, there is now hotel and lodging-house accommodation to suit every class of traveller. Murray's Handbook of Travel-Talk achieves its eighteenth edition. The book is divided into fourteen groups of subjects, and arranged in the order in which the traveller is likely to become concerned with them. The vocabularies provided are English, French, German, and Italian. Messrs. Whittaker's new guide, What to Say and do in France, gives information on railways, vehicles of all kinds, cafés, theatres, naturalisation, etiquette, and social customs, marriage, law, educational matters, &c., &c. It should be specially useful to intending residents in France.

Messrs. Smith, Elder's new and cheaper edition of the late John Addington Symonds's Renaissance in Italy makes progress. The third volume, dealing with Fine Arts, is issued, and the completion of the work by the issue of four more volumes may be expected by November.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- A TEST OF THE TRUTH. By Oxoniensis. Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d.
- THE KINGDOM OF GOD AS SET FORTH HISTORICALLY AND PROPHECIES IN THE ENGLISH BIBLE. Elliot Stock. 1s.
- LITTLE CATECHISM OR LITURGY. John Murphy & Co. (New York).
- THE OBLIGATION OF HEARING MASS ON SUNDAYS AND HOLIDAYS. By Rev. J. T. Roche. John Murphy & Co. (New York).
- THE ENGLISH CHURCH, THE PRIEST, AND THE ALTAR. By Francis Peck. Lawrence & Bullen.
- THE SPIRITUAL PRINCIPLES OF THE ATONEMENT. By John Scott Lidgett, M.A. Charles H. Kelly. 5s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- CAPTAIN CUELLAR'S ADVENTURES IN CONNACHT AND ULSTER A.D. 1588. By Hugh Allingham and Hugh Crawford. Elliot Stock. 2s.
- SIR WALTER RALEIGH. The Stanhope Essay, 1897. By John Buchan. B. H. Blackwell. 2s. 6d.

ART, DRAMA, POETRY.

- MODERN PAINTERS. Vols. I. and II. New Edition in small form. By John Ruskin. George Allen.
- THE EPIC OF OLYMPUS. By Charles Rathbone Low. Digby, Long & Co.
- A DIVAN OF THE DALES. By Swithin Saint Swithaine. Digby, Long & Co.
- SONGS AND SHADOWS. By E. M. Beresford. Digby, Long & Co.
- THE TEMPLE DRAMATISTS: EDWARD III. Edited by G. C. Moore Smith, M.A. J. M. Dent & Co.
- AFTER HER DEATH. By Lilian Whiting. Sampson Low.
- THE BOOK OF TRIPPI. By J. A. Goodchild. Kegan Paul. 6s.
- PROCEEDINGS OF THE ROYAL COLONIAL INSTITUTE. Vol. XXVIII, 1896-7. Published by the Institute.

FICTION.

- UNRELATED TWINS. By Belton Otterburn. Digby, Long & Co.
- THE OCTAVE OF CLAUDIUS. By Barry Pain. Harper & Brothers. 6s.
- IN CAMP AND CANTONMENT. By Edith E. Cuthell. Hurst & Blackett. 3s. 6d.
- IN A WEB OF GOLD. By Rita Russell. Digby, Long & Co. 1s.
- PENTATHLON. By D. C. Parkinson. Digby, Long & Co. 1s.
- SHIBOLETH. By Katharine Renell. Digby, Long & Co. 1s.
- BY STROKE OF SWORD. By Andrew Balfour. Methuen & Co. 6s.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

THE SHAKESPEAREAN GUIDE TO STRATFORD-ON-AVON. By H. Snowden Ward and Catherine Weed Ward. Durbarn & Ward.

SIGHTS BY THE SEA: SEASIDE AND COUNTRY SKETCHES. By Clement Scott. Lawrence Greening & Co. 1s.

EDUCATIONAL.

FRENCH STUMBLING-BLOCKS AND ENGLISH STEPPING-STONES. By Francis Tarver, M.A. John Murray.

DRILL ON THE ESSENTIALS OF FRENCH ACCENT AND ELEMENTARY SYNTAX. By Victor Spiers, M.A. Simpkin, Marshall. 1s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE JUBILEE BOOK OF CRICKET. By K. S. Ranjitsinhji, William Blackwood & Sons. 25s. and 6s.

CRIME AND CRIMINALS. By J. Sanderson Christison, M.D. The W. T. Keener Co. (Chicago).

TUBERCULOSIS, OR FLESH-EATING A CAUSE OF CONSUMPTION. By Josiah Oldfield. The Vegetarian Publishing Office.

ANCIENT CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH READERS (Cheap Issue): PLINY'S LETTERS. By Rev. A. Church, M.A., and Rev. W. J. Brodribb, M.A.—EURIPIDES. By William Bodham Donne. Blackwood & Sons.

CRICKET. By W. J. Ford. With Contributions by F. G. J. Ford, Tom Richardson, and M. O. Kemp. Reprinted from "The Encyclopedia of Sport." Lawrence & Bullen. 6d.

A HANDBOOK OF TRAVEL-TALK. Eighteenth Edition. John Murray.

PRO PATRIA. By Jean Delaire. Digby, Long & Co.

WELLS CATHEDRAL. By the Rev. Canon Church. Isbister & Co. 1s.

WHAT TO DO AND WHAT TO SAY IN FRANCE. Whittaker & Co. 1s.

THE CHAIRMAN'S MANUAL. Elliot Stock. 1s.

OUTLINES OF THE HISTORY OF CLASSICAL PHILOLOGY. By Alfred Gudeman. Ginn & Co. (Boston, U.S.A.).

NOTES AND NEWS.

THE season just over has been for the Print Collector, on the whole, wonderfully barren. Neither at Christie's nor at Sotheby's has a single collection of the first order offered itself for distribution under the hammer. There have been, naturally, some isolated examples of fine prints; Rembrandts, whenever they have occurred in at all decent condition, have shown no signs whatever of diminution of value; and there has been one record price, or something like it, in the sale of a Dürer, the "St. Jerome" of that master—the St. Jerome in the open air, not the one in the cell—going for £290.

BUT, putting aside the foolish prices still given by buyers who are hardly connoisseurs for coloured prints (which in the very nature of things are neither fish, fowl, nor good red herring), the most remarkable feature is the high level of prices reached by the best modern, if not exactly the best contemporary, etching. Méryon, for instance—the great master of the last generation, whose place is now assured by Rembrandt's side—is sought for eagerly at good prices, directly anything of his that is tolerably fine in state and condition comes into the market. Quite recently at a sale of no especial character—a sale, we mean, by no means remarkable for the general fineness of the impressions submitted—excellent prices were fetched for that which was good, £18, for instance, being paid for the small print of the "Rue des Mauvais Garçons," and £22 for the famous, if forbidding, little "Stryge."

AMONG the Seymour Hadens there was lately offered the larger and rarer of that etcher's two plates of "Kensington Gardens," which went for £22, while for the much extolled "Shere Mill Pond" the bid reached thirty guineas. There have not been many Whistlers, but nine guineas seems now no uncommon price for that master's larger visions of either Battersea or Putney Bridge—we speak, of course, of the charming old wooden structures, now no more—while for what may be described as an everyday set of the "Twenty-six Etchings," chiefly Venetian, and which the Dowdeswells published only a few years ago at fifty guineas, about eighty guineas is easily realised. A picked set, or one that has belonged to a famous collector—well, that, of course, would be a different affair!

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Daily Chronicle, who has been inquiring into the sales of photographs of living men and women, offers some melancholy figures with regard to the demand for authors and artists. Compared with the ladies and gentlemen of the stage, authors and artists are not to be considered. Mr. Hall Caine, it seems, is occasionally bought; and, entirely without authority, the statement is made that in country places he is still selling as well as Shakespeare; but no other writer is required, except Miss Marie Corelli, and she consistently refuses to be taken.

A COPYRIGHT performance of the play which has been founded by Mr. Hall Caine on his novel The Christian took place at Douglas, in the Isle of Man, on Saturday last. Seats were priced at a pound each, and eleven o'clock in the morning was the hour chosen. Mr. Hall Caine took the part of John Storm, Miss Hall Caine was Glory Quayle, Mrs. Hall Caine was Polly Love, Master Ralph Caine was Brother Andrew, and Mr. William Heinemann enacted the Father Superior.

AMERICAN publishers would seem to have an odd idea of the control of English literary papers. We have just received from a Chicago firm the following request, which is, we hasten to say, quite out of our power to grant:

"To the Editor, ACADEMY, London, England."

"DEAR SIR,—We send you a copy of the Third Edition of Gudeman's Outlines of the History of Classical Philology, which we hope you will review in the Athenæum."

MR. ROTHENSTEIN'S gallery of English Portraits, which Mr. Grant Richards publishes month by month, grows in interest. The current number contains lithographed drawings of Mr. Lecky and Mr. Sargent. It requires no small courage to limn Mr. Sargent, who has himself so superbly set on paper the heads of some of his friends; Mr. Rothenstein, however, has done creditably, although we have seen better work from his pencil. The portrait of Mr. Lecky is, apart from its own merits, useful as a corrective of Mr. Reed in Punch. It shows us the historian not without nourishment.

The author of the slight biographical note writes: "If he has published a volume of verse, that is an amiable indiscretion which may more grievously be laid to the charge of many another public man; but, had he an enemy, that enemy could find no charge more serious to bring against this profoundly accomplished and courteous gentleman."

AN interesting experiment in the illustration of Dickens is being made by Mr. C. D. Gibson, the American draughtsman, and Mr. Phil May. Mr. George Allen has arranged for a new edition of the novels with pictures by these artists, and Mr. Gibson is now at work on Martin Chuzzlewit, Mr. May on David Copperfield. The result is certain to be interesting, although it is difficult to think of Mr. Gibson's presentment of Sairey Gamp.

POPULAR authors nowadays must expect to be used for strange purposes. But we have never met with a stranger than that to which a photograph of Ian Maclaren has just been put by an American doctor. We have before us a little monograph on Crime and Criminals, by J. Sanderson Christison, M.D., published at Chicago this year. It consists of a series of studies and portraits of jail types—delinquents who have come under the author's observation in American asylums. By way of frontispiece we find the portrait of the author of Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush, to serve as "a type of the normal look, features, and contour of head," or the standard from which American criminals have unhappily fallen.

MR. RUSKIN has himself given up writing, but the business of making new books out of his old ones continues to flourish. The latest announcement is that a volume consisting of the Bible references which occur in Mr. Ruskin's pages is to appear.

THE title of Mark Twain's new book, which was given some time ago as "The Surviving Innocent Abroad," has been altered to More Tramps Abroad.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Glasgow Evening News gives the following latest information from Craigenputtock: "The other day I paid a visit to the old Dumfriesshire farmhouse of Craigenputtock, where Carlyle wrote his Sartor Resartus. The farm is still in the hands of the Carlyle family, the present occupant being a grand-nephew of the sage. This gentleman—who, by the way, in features as well as in manner, suggests a striking likeness to his illustrious relative—speaks not too cordially of the way in which his farm and steading are overrun at this season by 'pilgrims.'"

"In the neighbouring village of Dunscore," continues the writer, "there still survive a few of Carlyle's contemporaries. These aged worthies think little of Tam, as they call him. They remember him only as a 'soor-tempered body' who did not get on too well with his brother, the then farmer of Craigenputtock, and they are fond of illustrating the 'cussedness' of the sage by telling of an occasion when, having quarrelled with everybody about the place, he drove off one night in a 'huff' to Dumfries and refused to come back again. Few Scotch people think of visiting the place; all the 'pilgrims' are English, American, or foreign."

From Craigenputtock to Abbotsford is a natural transition. Mrs. Maxwell Scott, who knows more about Sir Walter Scott's home than any one living, has written of it in a volume which will appear this autumn under the title The Making of Abbotsford.

A new edition, consisting of ten or twelve volumes, of the works of Mr. James Whitcomb Riley is to be published in America this autumn. Mr. Riley is the most popular and the most admirable of American domestic poets; he writes of home life in a delightful homely manner, humorously, tenderly, playfully, and with true feeling. In this country two or three of his volumes have appeared, but their success has been retarded by the dialect in which much of his best verses are written, and the peculiarly American character of the work. But notwithstanding this, Old-Fashioned Roses, published by Messrs. Longman & Co., found many readers.

THE New York Book-Buyer has a story of the literary beginnings of a lady who has since become well known as a writer. Failing to impress editors in any other way, she sent a bundle of "Jokes" to a comic paper, asking what remuneration was offered. The reply was that the proprietors were able to offer only "glory." The lady wrote back giving permission for her contributions to be used on the understanding that the glory should be forthcoming. When her paragraph appeared, the editor not only gave her matter "top of column and best of display," but, in a page and a paper made up of unsigned contributions, they gave her name in full, her street and town and state address, and all in large type, at the foot of her humorous productions. "Verily," she said, "this is glory with a vengeance."

A new poem by Mr. Kipling, entitled "The Feet of the Young Men," will appear in the Christmas number of Scribner's.

MR. SAMUEL KINNREAR, of the printing establishment of the Blackwoods, has been giving the Scotsman more reminiscences of his career. In his last letter he recalls a curious mistake committed by Sir Archibald Alison towards the end of his History of Europe. In his account of the funeral of the Duke of Wellington the historian wrote, through sheer absence of mind, that one of the pall bearers was Sir Peregrine Pickle, meaning Sir Peregrine Maitland. The name of Peregrine is so rare, and it goes so naturally with Pickle, that the error was easily made; but it is odd that no one should have noted it before the volume was issued. Eventually the discovery was made, and the edition had to be recalled for the cancelling of the sheet.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

THE recent illness of M. François Coppée, whose health, if we may judge from his frequent flight to the coast, is at best precarious, draws attention to the work of this extremely popular and simple poet. M. Coppée is a complete proof that mediocrity may be crowned with the glory of triumph in France as well as in England. There are people who can only enjoy mediocrity: second-rate poetry, second-rate prose, second-rate art and music, second-rate sentiment, second-rate society, and second-rate wine. It is well this large class of inoffensive beings should find the sort of thing they want in books as well as out of them. Happily for them the second-rate article everywhere abounds, and here in France its academical high priest is the amiable, the kindly, and sentimental François Coppée—interpreter of all the humble and domestic emotions in well-meaning but commonplace verse; transcriber of every-day ideas and somewhat trite observation in the least-lettered of French prose. For this he has been selected, perhaps not altogether unwisely, for immortality, and the obsequious multitude cheerfully address him as cher maître. It is a glory to be master in something, and this dear sentimental Coppée is past master in the ordinary. But pray note the capriciousness of academic choice, and say if the professional tasters of literature are a whit less incalculable and inexplicable in their choice than the capricious voice of public opinion. Théophile Gautier, the supreme charmer, the writer of chiselled verse and dazzling prose, the exquisite impeccable artist, was rejected by the Immortals because in his youth he wore a scarlet waistcoat (he might have worn none, and left his genius undiminished) and cultivated a Merovingian shock of hair. George Sand, at the height of her glory, the first great prosauteur of her day, was actually refused a prize because of her morals, while Musset, her lover, with even less to boast of, and who was rarely sober to boot, sat placidly among the immaculate Forty! Where Sand, Balzac, Dumas, and Gautier were not admitted, M. Coppée, the laurelled and applauded, has his armchair of honour!

However, no poet ever wore his laurels more modestly; and it is a gratification to think that part of the official reward belongs to the man's homely virtues, his quaint goodwill to all men except politicians and Germans, his pity and sympathy in face of every form of pain and sorrow, his good-nature and cheerfulness, and the spirit of pleasant humility in which he receives the contempt of younger poets. I daresay he nourishes the private conviction that the younger poets who despise him are all wrong, but he conceals it with imperturbable geniality, and begs them, in grandmotherly prose, to think more of Lizette and less of their problematical souls; to gather flowers in the woods with the ever-accommodating grisette, instead of racking their tortured brains for new definitions of a decadent state of mind.

It may fitly be retorted that M. Coppée is greatly too pre-occupied with the charms and the virtues of the grisette himself. His conviction that the humble are the salt of the earth carries him too far, and his enthusiasm for a girl and a handbox lands him in singular absurdities. The sincerity of a woman's love-letter he judges by the quantity of mistakes in spelling and the illiterateness of the style. A girl's uncovered head out of doors is to him proof of every virtue and charm. With a grisette who takes a lover it is invariably a matter of heart in M. Coppée's esteem, whatever evidence the class may sometimes furnish of cupidity, heartlessness, or cruelty. By reason of their station, one might say of their morals even, they are sure to make better wives, better mothers than the educated woman. Not that M. Coppée is in the least immoral, quite the contrary. But he is opposed to the bourgeois tooth and nail, with reason sometimes, though reason is the very last thing to pre-occupy such a partial observer as M. Coppée; whereas the grisette he cherishes as the sparrows of Paris, cheering, harmless, twittering creatures, to be smiled upon and befriended. For he is what he would call himself, a gamin of Paris, having been born here in 1842, and professedly not understanding or caring much for anything outside Paris.

His literary career opened at twenty-four with Le Reliquaire in 1866, but it was not until the appearance of his first play "Le Passant," in 1869, that he achieved popularity. His plays, like his prose and verse, are quite second-rate; but, as he has written, "they have charmed awhile this age of opera-bouffe and middle-class drama." His admirers regard him as the Teniers of verse and the Gerald Dow of prose, and if the odour of the pot-au-feu and Lizette's skirt are somewhat insistent in his works, his sincerity and geniality may be said to make amends. His contes have none of the grace, the art we are accustomed to associate with the conte. They do not exceed the level of our own magazine short story without distinction or beauty. What, for instance, could be more trite and mawkish than the Orgue de Barbarie, more ineffective than Le Convalescent, more commonplace than the Dreamer's socialistic thoughts at the aristocratic dinner? All this forms the favourite reading of the multitude.

In his Franc Parler, collected articles from the Journal, a fast little paper, Coppée is hardly at home; he is more interesting, not by the variety or unexpectedness of his fugitive work, but because here we have the kindly, commonplace man instead of the commonplace artist. One feels almost a prick of remorse in criticising adversely a man so incapable of wounding a fellow, such a cheerful sentimentalist, so soft-hearted a poet. If he is not complex, meditative, intellectual, artistic—he is at least thoroughly humane, as he shows in a few feeling pages on the respect of human life. To those who dream of a better state of things for the poor and suffering, he writes:

"Humble poet, I can bring to their work nothing but my emotion at the sight of suffering. It is not to be disdained, however, for it is sincere. . . . Nothing can be done for the unfortunate and the despairing but through kindness, pity, the appeal to hearts. . . . The noise of Raspahol's pocket thunder will not stifle the words of those who, like me, have ever raised their voice in behalf of the weak and the little."

His feeling on the terrible Panama scandal is a loyal and manly outburst:

"For money! There are—and many!—who have sold their vote, their conscience! And if to-morrow we were attacked, if we had to unroll the national standard, it might be asked, Is there a hand pure enough to seize the staff? . . . For money! And that at a time when the just cry of the unfortunate is lifted more threateningly than ever; when the rich, far from increasing their treasure, should, under pain of the worst misfortunes, prepare themselves for fraternal division, for sacrifice! For money! Ah, one murses upon the honourable and holy poverty of Aristides. What do I say? One even reaches regret of the days of mourning and disorder when at least a few still possessed some virtue, when, while Jourde, the Communist, was master of the Bank, his wife went to the public laundry to wash, herself, the family linen."

In the teeth of the Marquise de Castellane's splendid gift to Paris, Coppée, so susceptible to the beauty of generosity, must regret the lines that follow on the death of her father, Jay Gould, however merited he may feel them to be.

On the politicians he is justly and consistently hard. Here are two meetings in a morning he briefly describes. One of the heroes of the Panama scandal, exasperated by the freedom of allusions and criticism in the Press and in the drama, threatens interdiction all round:

"Do you know, you are not gay?" I cried. "If we are not to speak of anything in the newspapers and in the theatre, how are we to earn our bread?" He flung me a rakish side-glance, and digging me in the ribs, said: "Bah! There remains pornography. You know very well that we shut our eyes on that ground."

Leaving the worthy deputy, Coppée falls into the arms of a decadent poet, who professedly despises him as a man of letters, but tolerates him as a good fellow:

"Well," asks Coppée, "what is going on in the cenacles?" "We are bewitching one another," he replied most seriously, and then explained the mysterious proceeding to his astounded interlocutor. "You take a toad and you subject it to frightful torture, thinking the while of your enemy with all the intensity of your hate. Within the year your enemy dies of the same sufferings as the toad. It is infallible. As you see me, I am on the lookout for one of these batracians for revenge upon a rival who has supplanted me in the good graces of a woman who keeps a beer-shop. But, alas! the animal is rare in Monsieur-le-Prince-street, where I live."

Asked to enter Parliament, Coppée very properly declined. He once or twice visited the Palais Bourbon, and the tempestuous reunion gave him the impression of a class badly kept by a master without authority.

"It is not much, certainly," he adds, "to be a poet in modern society, and no doubt my claims to the title are weak enough. But even if there should be in the numerous, too numerous poems I have written but a single and slight little bit the reading of which can stir the imagination of a youth, or cause a grisette to dream, I should regard this single drop of true poetry, the extract of my heart, as a work more precious and more essential than the most eloquent discourses of the Tribune, leading to the vote of a capital law or deciding a great event. In good faith, what poet would not rather leave behind him the sonnet of Arvers or the Vase Brisé than to have pronounced all the harangues of Mirabeau?"

An enlarged expression of Fletcher of Saltoun's sentiment.

There is decidedly something winning in this naïve desire of the man of the people to reach the heart of the people, and though there can be no comparison between Béranger the people's singer, and Coppée its versifier, there is this note of accord: both cheerfully belong to their class. Until the Panama horrors, Coppée was a confirmed optimist. Since then his reflections enter a more troubled zone, but he calls upon youth to help spotted France:

"Holla, up there, lock-keeper, father the Future! To your lever and point! Turn the machine. Open wide both gates, forward and backward, and by a thousand diamond sprays, with the joyous rush of the torrent, let in and out the wave of youth to inundate and purify us."

His work may be commonplace, insignificant, except in a couple of powerful plays, but the man's personality is sympathetic by reason of such modest virtues as generosity, compassion, honesty, and disinterestedness.

H. L.

TENNYSON AS DRAMATIST.

It is in some ways curious to note how few modern English poets of the first rank have had even moderate success as dramatists, though so many of them at one time or another have tried their hand at writing for the stage. Lord Lytton wrote tolerable plays, but then he was not a poet of the first rank, while Mr. W. G. Wills was scarcely even a poet of the second. Some two or three of Browning's plays were tried on the stage at different times—"Strafford," "Colombe's Birthday," "The Blot on the 'Scutcheon'"—but most critics (and almost all actors) declared them to be unactable. At least one of Byron's plays ("Werner") was fairly successful in its day, but we greatly doubt if anyone would care to revive it or "Marino Faliero" now. Shelley's "Cenci," curiously enough, has considerable merits as a stage play, in spite of its subject, and in one point at least it is greatly superior to either Tennyson's plays or Browning's, namely, the quality of its blank verse. Tennyson's lines are often feeble on the stage, occasionally even ludicrous, while Browning's have to be taken at a foot's pace if they are to be even moderately intelligible to the audience. Shelley's, on the contrary, have the true dramatic quality. They speak well. Possibly this may be the case with Byron's. We do not know. We can, however, say with certainty that, from a purely literary point of view, as blank verse they are often atrocious. Still, it does not follow that they might not be effective on the stage. There are some faults which stage treatment rather tends to conceal than to bring to light.

It is perhaps strange that where all these poets partially or entirely failed Tennyson should have had a very considerable measure of success. "Becket," as produced at the Lyceum, was undeniably good. "The Cup," too, with the assistance of Sir Henry Irving and the limelight man, developed unexpected dramatic capabilities, and made a very passable drama. The same may be said of "Queen Mary." But, then, it must be admitted that these plays required a very great deal of "editing" to make them actable; and indeed "Becket" was so extensively amended and revised that its stage triumph was at least as much due to him as to Tennyson. Nor does the acting version of "The Cup" follow the original at all too closely, while, we believe, much the same may be said of "The Promise of May" and "The Foresters." "The Falcon," on the contrary, as given by Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, was probably not altered enough, which, together with its inherent dramatic impossibilities, may have accounted for its failure. From all which it may be gathered that Tennyson's success on the stage was not altogether the result of his own unaided genius. A mere glance at the plays as published will show this. Much of them will be seen at once to be utterly unfitted for stage presentation. There are whole scenes in "Becket," for instance, which must be cut bodily out before it can hope to please an average audience; and yet "Becket," even in its original form, is far the most actable of the plays. The fact is Tennyson, in his haste to be dramatist, forgot to be a playwright. He never took the trouble to study stage necessities or to learn the elements of the art of construction. He seems to have flung his story together anyhow, turned it into verse, and chanced the rest. If this was so, the only wonder is that his plays had such small acting possibilities as they did possess. The same is to some extent true of Browning also. He too, knew nothing about the stage or the technique of play-writing. But, then, Browning was born with the keenest dramatic sense. Tennyson was not. Browning saw intuitively the dramatic possibilities of a plot or a situation. With him it was an instinct. And if he had only studied the practical business of the stage he might have been one of the greatest of all dramatists, one whose works would have filled the English theatres for generations. For there never was a man with such a natural gift for dramatic presentment as Browning. All his poems are dramatic in essence, even the most lyrical of them.

Of Tennyson, on the contrary, the exact converse is true. His plays are not so much dramatic as lyrical in quality. Tennyson never properly understood how to deal with what actors call a "big" situation. His hand was feeble, his touch uncertain. Moreover, Tennyson was hardly capable of creating a character. He never did it in all the length and breadth of his poetry. What is Launcelot? A shadow. And Arthur? Still more a shadow. Tennyson could never have drawn a Sludge, or a Guido, or a Waring. He cannot make the most of his plot even when he has one

How feebly the intrigue in the earlier part of "The Cup" is worked out! What a much finer thing, psychologically, Browning would have made of it! Tennyson, fortunately, never tried his hand at a play on, say, Strafford, or he would have bungled it sadly. And "Strafford," among his plays, is Browning's masterpiece. Let us take only one scene of it and see how good it is. In the fifth act the scene is in the Tower. Denzil Hollis enters with a message from the king, which he hesitates to deliver. Strafford is indignant at this, and scornfully suggests that Charles has sent Hollis to arrange for his clandestine escape from the Tower instead of coming openly to set his loyal friend and subject free, and defend him against the world. It is impossible to describe with what depth of feeling and passion this is conveyed. Finally, Strafford declares bitterly that he will not go, in such a way, that he will rather remain in the Tower. Hollis speaks guardedly of his approaching death, and Strafford laughs him to scorn, producing from his breast the king's promise of safety, signed with his own hand. Then Hollis hands him his death-warrant, signed by the king. . . . There is an awful ten seconds of silence, and the paper falls from Strafford's hands as he murmurs:

"Put not your trust
In Princes, neither in the sons of men
With whom is no salvation."

But the horror of the tragedy does not end even here, for Hollis has been attended throughout the interview by a shrouded figure. This figure now advances and throws himself at Strafford's feet. It is the king, and Hollis cries:

"As you hope for mercy,
Be merciful to this most wretched man."

One would not expect anything like this from a lyricist like Tennyson. There are no tremendous moments in his plays. They are pathetic at times—"Queen Mary" especially—and there are effective scenes in them. But when one contrasts them with a masterpiece like this, they pale into insignificance.

This, however, is not the sum of Tennyson's offences as a dramatist. His great offence is that he is not genuine. He is a mere echo. There may be differences of opinion as to Browning's merit, but at least no one can deny that he was always himself. He wrote his plays as he conceived them. He did not feebly copy the plays of somebody else. Tennyson did. And the poet he copied was of course Shakespeare. He simply took the Shakespearean drama as his model and tried to write like it. Shakespeare introduces comic characters at intervals to talk in homely prose as a relief from perpetual blank verse. Tennyson must do the like. Only, whereas Shakespeare's "comic relief" is actable, Tennyson's (in "Becket," for instance) generally is not. Shakespeare's comic characters amuse the audience with, from one point of view, silly puns and plays on words. So must Tennyson's. Here is an example from the first scene of "The Foresters":

"FOURTH RETAINER: . . . I would like to show you, Mistress Kate, how bare and spare I be on the rib.

"KATE: Spare me your spare ribs. . . ."

"FIRST RETAINER: Ay, if he had not gone to fight the king's battles we should have better battels at home."

Can one conceive a more ridiculous piece of Wardour Street? Indeed, the whole of "The Foresters" is a mere Tennysonian "As You Like It," with a damsel playing the man in doublet and hose, the greenwood tree, and the rest of it. Moreover, as if this were not enough, Tennyson must needs put in his plays, probably unconsciously, endless Shakespearean "tags." Every one will remember Julius Cæsar's well-known phrase in Shakespeare:

"Such men are dangerous," and again—

"And therefore are they very dangerous."

Tennyson does precisely the same thing in "Queen Mary."

" . . . therefore is he dangerous.
 . . . he is dangerous every way."

Again, we have in "Julius Cæsar" the splendid passage beginning—

"The last of all the Romans, lie thou there."

On which Tennyson chimes in with—

"Thou last of all the Tudors, come away."

Of course we do not pretend that these are instances of deliberate imitation. Our point is, that Tennyson studied Shakespeare exhaustively as a model with the worst results, and it is hardly wonderful under those circumstances that, in writing his dialogue, he was haunted, with Shakespearean phrases and lines, and occasionally forgot how near he was steering to them. But it is unnecessary to multiply instances of this. The imitation, conscious or unconscious, is present even in his finest passages.

"How many names in the long sweep of Time,
That so foreshortens greatness, may but hang
On the chance mention," &c.

What can be more pseudo-Shakespearean?

But Tennyson's greatest fault in his plays is his carelessness. At times he writes with a good deal of charm, and even of power, and his lyrical interludes are always agreeable. But his blank verse is not infrequently slipshod, and his diction prosaic beyond belief for one who was, on the whole, so happy an artist in words.

"And all along Of Philip,"

says one lady in "Queen Mary." Again, what more terrible example of how not to write blank verse could you have than this from "The Falcon"?

"COUNT: Bird Babble for my falcon! Let it pass,
What art thou doing there?"

"ELIZABETHA: Darning, your Lordship!"
The average theatre-goer would receive this with shrieks of ribald laughter. Yet it does not appear to be intended to be funny. Here, too, is a speech from "The Foresters," which seems to us to be about as bad as it can well be:

"My guests and friends, Sir Richard, all of you

Who deign to honour this my thirtieth year,
And some of you were prophets that I might be,

Now that the sun our king is gone, the light
Of these dark hours; but this new moon, I fear,

Is darkness. Nay, this may be the last time
When I shall hold my birthday in this hall:
I may be outlawed! I have heard a rumour."

An alderman might improvise a speech in as good blank verse as this at any Lord Mayor's feast.

But enough of fault-finding. The scenes of Tennyson's plays are often adroitly managed (as, for instance, the first scene in "Becket," with the game of chess), and the verse is occasionally effective. One remembers how Miss Ellen Terry thrilled the Lyceum audience with—

"Eleanor of Aquitaine, Eleanor of England
Murder'd by that adulteress Eleanor,
Whose doings are a horror to the East,
A hissing to the West!"

SOME LETTERS OF SWIFT.

It is late in the day for the publication of new letters of Swift; yet into the capable hands of Dr. Birkbeck Hill a little bundle has fallen, part of the material destined by Forster for that eye of the Dean which never progressed further than the first of its three volumes. These letters were written by Swift in the years between 1714 and 1731, when he was Dean of St. Patrick's, to his friend Knightley Chetwode of Woodbrooke, in Ireland, and a first instalment is printed in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly.

Of Chetwode little is known: he was the son of the Dean of Gloucester, and the member of the Oxfordshire family whose seat was at Warkworth, near Banbury. Knightley Chetwode's house, near Portarlington, still stands, and it is pleasant to learn that his descendant who made copies of the letters for Forster's use considered them precious as "an heirloom of honour." To the lover of literature they make, however, not so powerful an appeal. Swift is not by any means at his best in them, at least in those that have as yet been made public. It takes two to make a good letter, the recipient not less than the writer; and when the recipient does not inspire the finest correspondent in the world may fall to a common level. Knightley Chetwode was not another S. Sheridan.

Swift touches politics a little, but not to any purpose. In the main he is concerned with lesser matters: the price of hay, the rascality of servants, the want of horses, all kinds of domesticities, messages to Chetwode's wife "Dame Clyant," and so on. His tone is not cheery, nor is he ever high spirited. Here are some fragments. The Deanery needed much reorganisation when Swift succeeded to it:

"I used to value a good Revenue, because I thought it exempted a man from the little subaltern Cares of Life; and so 't would if the Master were wise, or Servants had honesty and common Sense: A man who is new in a House or an Office has so many important Nothings to take up his time, that he cannot do what he would.

"One Occasion I have to triumph, that in six weeks time I have been able to get rid of a great Cat, that belonged to the late Dean, and almost poisoned the House. An old Woman under the same circumstances I can not yet get rid of, or find a Maid."

In his next letter he returns to the cat and the maid:

"The Bishop of Dromore is expected this night in Town on purpose to restore his Cat, who by her perpetual noise and Stink must be certainly a whig. In compliance to y<sup>r</sup> observation of old women's tenderness to each other, I have got one as old and ugly as that the Bishop left, for the Ladys of my Acquaintance would not allow me one with a tolerable Face tho I most earnestly interceded for it."

Chetwode is expecting Swift to Woodbrooke (where they still show an avenue said to have been planted by the Dean); but many things intervene to prevent the visit. Swift writes:

"You are mistaken, I am no Coy Beauty but rather with submission like a Wench who has made an Assignment and when the day comes, has not a Petticoat to appear in. I am plagued to death with turning away and taking Servants, my Scotch groom ran away from me ten days ago and robbed me and several of the neighbourhood. I cannot stir from hence till a great Vessell of Alicant is bottled and till my Horse is in a condition to travel and my chimney piece made."

Here is a passage turning on one of these visits when made:

"As for judicious John, he is walked off: y<sup>r</sup> cursed good Ale ruined him. He turned such a Drunkard and Swaggerer, I could bear him no longer: I reckon every visit I make you will spoil a Servant."

The following is characteristic:

"I had a very ingenious Tory Ballad sent me printed, but receiving it in a Whig house I suddenly read it, and gave it to a Gentleman with a wink, and ordered him to burn it, but he threw another Paper into the Fire. I hope to send you a Copy of it."

The following messages to Mrs. Chetwode half reveal a very engaging side of Swift's nature:

"Give my Service to Dame Plyant, and desire her to let you know what quantity of Cherryes she has for Brandy; you may steep them in just enough to keep them alive, and I will send you some very good if I can and you will tell me how much. But here I want Jo. I hope Dame found the boys well and that she gave them good Counsell upon the Subject of Gooseberries and Codlings for I hear the eldest had been a little out of order."

And—

"I might have been cheated of my Gingerbread for any thing you s<sup>d</sup> [said] in your letter, for I find you scorn to take notice of Dame's kind Present; but I am humbler and signify to her that if she does not receive by M<sup>r</sup> Foxcroft a large tin pot well crammed with the D. of Omds. [Duke of Ormond's] snuff, holding almost an ounce, she is wronged."

We have another and more momentous reference to the Duke of Ormond in his letter dated August 2, 1715:

"Tho it be unworthy of a Philosopher to admire at any thing, and directly forbidden by Horace, yet I am every day admiring at a thousand things. I am struck at the D. of O— [Duke of Ormond's] flight."

Next month's instalment of this correspondence may be richer. As it is, far and away the best thing in the present batch is this outburst:

"As for news, the D—l a bitt do I ever hear, or suffer to be told me. I saw in a Print that the K— [King] has taken Care to limit the Clergy what they shall Preach; and that has given me an Inclination to preach what is forbid: for I do not conceive there is any Law yet for it."

O FONS BANDUSIÆ!

In August all thoughts of running water are delightful, and Horace's invocation to his loved spring becomes the formula of a prevailing sentiment. No need of commentators here! Leave Bently and Orelli and Dacier to their footnotes; a London water-cart is the best critique on Ode XIII., bk. iii. If behind the water-cart some other vehicle follow so close that its horse receive, he cold rivulets on his fore-legs the commentary will be better, since the tired ox and the ranging cattle were made free of the poet's fountain. Is it sweltering hot in London?—it was sweltering hot in the valley of Ustica. The Bandusian rill gushed with no deceptive coolness; what it promised to the eye it squandered on the palate. And the poet, lolling on its brink, listening to its tinkling and slapping, and all its gentle modes of speech, vowed that his river-head should live in song with the rivers of antiquity; should live with Alpheus, pursuing Arethusa through the astonished deep to a home in the Ortygian valley; with Mæander, rising in the palace of Cyrus and winding by white-walled towns to the Ægean Sea; with Simois and Scamander, falling two ways down Ida to enclose Ilium; with the blue Phasis on whose banks Jason found the Golden Fleece; with Achelous, strong and turbulent, wasting Calydon with inundations and rolling its sands to its mouth; with Peneus flowing "smooth as oil" through Tempe, and imaging the laurel in which Daphne passed from the straining eyes and feet of Apollo. Such fame Horace promised to the spring on his Sabine farm, and he promised it as gaily as if immortality was not harder to bestow than the wine, the flowers, and the kid that he vowed in the same instant. His careful, conscious art might, one conceives, have failed with such a theme, but it did not.

A man who is constitutionally unhappy in hot weather will be apt to let his thoughts run on cool waters and water play of every kind. All the memories and images of refreshing water which his childhood or reading can yield him wait in the ante-room of his imagination, and enter to him in the intervals of discomforting effort. The writer is himself conscious that from a child he has entertained cool, watery visions of this kind. At school he mightily affected "the brook Kidron." It is odd how boys fasten on what pleases them in their reading, to the exclusion or distortion of contexts. Thus, in the story of Absalom's conspiracy, it befell that the flight of David, his generous command to Ittai to return to safety, and Ittai's generous refusal, the flight of the royal household, the weeping of the people, and the fear that urged them still on—went for nothing beside this single circumstance of the exodus: "The king also himself passed over the brook Kidron, and all the people passed over, toward the way of the wilderness." Toward thirst and hunger and exposure, maybe, that joyless throng pressed weeping; yes, but "over the brook Kidron!" There was that delightful incident. There was the water to see, and the shining pebbles, and the rushes growing up from immersed roots, and the long weeds and water-grasses drawn as far as they could stretch in the cool current. No wonder that a youth in whom hot weather awoke these aqueous sympathies profanely wondered whether "Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus," might not after all be as Naaman said, "better than all the waters of Israel"; cooler, perhaps; deeper, more pellucid, and stealing through darker shades of over-spreading leaves. Would there had been a little more in the story about those rivers of Damascus!

There was a passage, too, in some old reading-book that got a life-long lodgment in the writer's mind. It occurred in a selected piece of Nathaniel Hawthorne's. Therein the town pump of Salem is supposed to be giving an address through its spout, half autobiography, half temperance lecture. Concerning its ancestral history the pump remarks: "In far antiquity, beneath a darksome shadow of venerable boughs, a spring bubbled out of the leaf-strewn earth, in the very spot where you now behold me, on the sunny pavement. The water was as bright and clear, and deemed as precious, as liquid diamonds. The Indian sagamores drank of it from time immemorial, till the fatal deluge of the fire-water burst upon the red men, and swept their whole race away from the cold fountains. Endicott and his followers came next, and often knelt down to drink, dipping their long beards in the spring. The richest goblet then was of birch bark. Governor Winthrop, after a journey afoot from Boston, drank here out of the hollow of his hand. The elder Higginson here wet his palm and laid it on the brow of the first town-born child." How suffocating the schoolroom seemed!

But hot weather, now as then, is to be endured. We may justly allay, but not annihilate, the discomforts of the season. The able-bodied man who abandons himself to baths in summer is condemned with him who hugs the fire in winter. We may not riot in any good thing. Horace sang his fountain's praises temperately, and because the waters that refreshed him were the good gift of the gods, for which praise and sacrifice were meet. Even cold water can be made to minister to a sensuousness that is not quite on the side of the angels. Spenser has a description of a fountain in "The Faery Queen" which, in sheer sensuous portraiture of copious, clear, and refreshing water, tricked and diverted by art, is possibly unrivalled in English literature:

"And in the midst of all a fountain stood
Of richest substance that on Earth might be,
So pure and shiny that the silver flood Through every channell running one might see;
Most goodly it with curious ymagerie
Was over-wrought, and shapes of naked
boyes,
Of which some seemed with lively iollitie
To fly about, playing with their wanton toyes,
Whylest others did themselves embay in liquid ioyes.

"Infinit streames continually did well
Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,
The which into an ample laver fell,
And shortly grew to so great quantitie,
That like a little lake it seemd to be;
Whose depth exceeded not three cubits hight,
That through the waves one might the bottom
see,
All pav'd beneath with jasper shining bright,
That seemd the fountaine in that sea did sayll upright."

But where does Spenser place these extreme water-delights? In the "Bowre of Bliss," what time Guyon had righteously resolved on its destruction root and branch.
For an antidote one may turn to that stanza in Matthew Arnold's "Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse":

"The silent courts, where night and day
Into their stone-carved basins cold
The splashing icy fountains play—
The humid corridors behold!
Where, ghostlike in the deepening night,
Cowl'd forms brush by in gleaming white."

Such fountains are for the soul's fever.
And, after all, the Latin coolness of Horace is August's lenitive. To-day, to suffer from the heat is to take the Ban-dusian Ode on our lips. A lover of Horace in translations, knowing not six words of Latin, told the writer that in the late hot weather he had found himself in his rides and walks about the streets of London repeating to himself the three words—"O fons Bandusiae!" To repeat them was a solace.

THE BOOK MARKET.

OLD BOOKS IN BIRMINGHAM.

"YOU want to interview me," said Mr.
Charles Lowe, the well-known second-hand bookseller of Birmingham;
"then just ask me questions straight from the shoulder."

We were chatting in a café for ease and coolness: Birmingham also has its sirocco.

"Not from the shoulder, please, Mr.
Lowe; I am, like Shakespeare's sicklemen, 'of August weary.' Please recognise my mood. If I should drop a question, and if you should emit an answer, it will be enough. We will sit here a very long time. Let me see, I was wondering whether Birmingham was a good——"

"Market for second-hand books?"

"Thank you, I think that is what I was wondering."

"Yes; I should call it that, most decidedly."

"You are thick on the ground, are you not, Mr. Lowe?"

"Yes; Birmingham is full of second-hand bookshops; but the old stagers are not many—I count them on the fingers of one hand."

"I need not ask you whether you are one of the old stagers?"

"I am. I followed my father, whose shop stood for many years in Colmore-row when Colmore-row was New Hall-street, and was lined with shops instead of offices and hotels. We at last came into New-street, and ten years ago I opened my present shop."

"Is there a strong body of book-buyers in Birmingham?"

"Oh, yes. I call Birmingham a literary city. Men like Mr. Samuel Timmins (we know him here as 'Sam Timmins') lead the way. Mr. Timmins is a Shakespearean scholar and an all round literary man.
Then Mr. Dent, of the Aston Library, is a great bookman and a thorough student.
We have the Midland Institute, and two literary magazines are published in the town."

"You issue a catalogue?"

"Oh, yes; and I do four-fifths of my business through it. Naturally I have accumulated an immense list of addresses, and in any case my catalogue goes to every public library in the kingdom, and far beyond it."

"Do you make a speciality of local histories and topographical works, Mr.
Lowe?"

"Well, we look after such well.
Works like Shaw's Staffordshire, Hutton's history of Birmingham, Dugdale's Warwickshire, Noakes's books on Worcestershire, and Nash's Worcestershire, are always fish to our net."

"Nash's Worcestershire is one of the most expensive of county histories, I have always understood?"

"Yes; but I would take an order to supply it at any time for fifteen or sixteen pounds."

"Have you had any specially interesting customers?"

"Many; Mr. Gladstone has been one, of course."

"And how does he order books?"

"He returns the catalogue marked, with the instruction, 'Send these.'"

"And who else?"

"Mr. Chamberlain."

"Well?"

"Oh, he buys books of reference, useful books. I have sold him many such. Then Mr. Ruskin is another old customer of mine."

"And what was his peculiarity?"

"Well, if he bought £9 16s. worth of books, he would send me a cheque for £10, and say, 'Give the change to the packer.'"

"Thank you; that is delightful, that cools me. He might so easily have sent him a volume of Fors Clavigera."

SCIENCE.

NOW that the programme of the British Association meeting is before one, it is possible to form some idea of the value of the work to be done this year in Toronto.
The first point that strikes me, in looking down the list of papers, is that there is absolutely nothing of sensational interest or novelty in the programme such as there was in the year when Lord Rayleigh and Prof.
Ramsay made their historic announcement of the discovery of argon. On the other hand, there are numerous papers on subjects and by authors already familiar in combination. The lists belonging to certain sections almost suggest a résumé of the exhibition catalogues of the Royal Society soirées during the past season. Of topical subjects, we have a lecture by Prof. Roberts-Austen on the metals of Canada, a paper by
J. Loudon, B.A. (Toronto University), on Canadian standards, one by F. Napier Denison on the great lakes as a sensitive barometer, one on Canadian virgin soils by
F. T. Shute, one by Dr. George Dawson
(Director of the Canadian Survey) on ancient American rocks, about twelve other geological papers—in fact, the papers promised in this section deal almost exclusively with local problems—and a variety of mixed papers in the ethnological and botanical sections. The physiological and botanical sections are especially remarkable for the number of papers by members of American and Canadian universities.

THE presidential addresses, which often contain new speculative matter, are this year, to judge from the titles, much what one might expect. The president of the meeting, Sir John Evans, will deal with the vexed question of the antiquity of man, on which his views are more or less known beforehand. Prof. Forsyth in the mathematical, and Prof. Marshall Ward in the botanical section, offer contradictory views as to the value of utilitarian research in their respective science, the mathematician being scornful of it, the botanist quite the reverse.
Prof. Ramsay, as president of the chemical section, will deal with a subject which at present only exists hypothetically. It is one of the undiscovered elements required to fill up the gaps in Mendeléeff's periodic system.
Prof. Ramsay has been trying to find this "missing link," which, according to his belief, ought to have an atomic weight of 20, a density of 10, and properties similar to those of argon and helium. So far his search has been vain. There are several interesting papers down for the chemical section, but none in the name of Prof.
Dewar. It is stated that the president of the Chemical Society will not be present at the meeting. In the zoological section Prof. Miall, the president, will discourse on the life histories and transformations of animals. In the geographical section Mr.
Scott Keltie will expound the problems of exploration still remaining to be solved.
Dr. Dawson's paper on old American rocks, in the geological section, has already been mentioned. In the section devoted to economic science and statistics Prof. E. K.

Gonner will deal with the labour question and other problems now agitating the social and economic world. Mr. Deacon, president of the mechanical section, has thought out for his subject an ingenious parallel between York, the first city in which the British Association met sixty-six years ago, and the little Canadian village of York, now Toronto, in which the present meeting is to be held. Sir William Turner, of Edinburgh, who presides over the anthropological section, has chosen as his subject "Some Distinctive Characters of Human Structure," and Prof. Michael Foster, president of the physiological section, ends up the list with an historical paper on the advances made in his particular branch of science during the past thirteen years, the period which has elapsed since the Association last visited Canada.

THE opening of the Kent coalfields at Dover comes none too soon, if one may judge by the pessimistic tone of Mr. Hall's latest edition of his treatise, The Coalfields of Great Britain. According to this well-recognised authority the output of coal, which has risen from ninety-eight million tons in 1865 to nearly two hundred millions, is within measurable distance of becoming precarious. As shafts are sunk deeper and deeper in search of fresh seams, the cost of production is continually increased. Plant and machinery become more expensive, ventilation more difficult, delivery at the surface slower, and, finally, the coal itself will become more costly. Already there are famous coal areas in England which Mr. Hull classes as retrogressive, among them the Staffordshire and Coalbrookdale. The Northern coalfields, he says, are rapidly exhausting their strength, and should begin to husband their resources. It is in view of such a crisis as this that a body of wealthy engineers has begun to attack the great belt of coal which runs from Westphalia, under Belgium and the North of France, to South Wales. The Kent coalfields lie deep, but their extent is known to be considerable, and just across the Channel, at Escarpelle, in the Pas de Calais, the corresponding seams under the chalk are worked at a good profit. The time is probably not far distant when coals will be carried from Kent to Newcastle.

BLACK diamonds lead one on to the white kind. Sir William Crookes's lecture on the diamonds of Kimberley has been published in Nature, and is shortly to appear in a fuller form, with numerous illustrations, as a pamphlet. One of the most interesting passages in it relates to the miners' belief that diamonds fell from heaven. There is less absurdity in this simple faith than might be supposed. Sir William Crookes gives numerous instances of diamonds found in meteorites, including the wonderful field of the Canyon Diablo, in Arizona, where diamantiferous meteorites cover an area of five miles diameter. But the paper is interesting from end to end, and contains little that anyone could fail to understand.

H. C. M.

MUSIC.

MR. ROBERT NEWMAN announces his third season of Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall. They will commence on Saturday evening, August 28, and will continue for a space of seven weeks. Mr. Henry J. Wood will again be the conductor, and this, of course, means that the orchestra, with Mr. Arthur W. Payne as leader, will be in excellent hands. When the Promenade Concerts first commenced, Mr. Wood soon gained a reputation, and one which hitherto he has fully maintained. Mr. Newman sends a list of composers from whose works he will select novelties. Native art will be represented by Miss Amy Horrocks and Miss Dora Bright, and Messrs. W. Hurlstone, Charlton T. Speer, E. German, F. H. Frewin, H. Vicars, and Percy Pitt. Of Russian music there will be no lack. Here is the list of names—the novelties are not yet announced—of the composers: Tscharkowsky, Cui, Liapounow, Glazounow, Rimsky-Korsakow, Napravnik, Moussorgsky. France is represented by Miss Augusta Holmes, M. Gabriel Fauré, M. C. M. Widor, and M. G. Charpentier.

The list is not quite exhausted, but enough has been given to show that the manager of these concerts is not afraid of novelties. The search after what is new is regarded by some as a "craze." But, if craze it be, it is a sensible one. And in a series of forty-two concerts there is plenty of room both for the old and the new. Mr. Newman hopes that "many of the works will be found of sufficient interest to take a permanent place in our Concert Répertoire." And in that hope we cordially join.

CORRESPONDENCE.

HERRICK AND MARTIAL.

London: August 6.

In your issue of July 31, p. 89, you notice Flosculorum Fasciculus, by Mr. C. S. Jerram, and quote a rendering he gives of Herrick's lines:

"Fat be my hind, unlearned be my wife,
Peaceful my night, my day devoid of strife;
To these a comely offspring I desire,
Singing about my everlasting fire."

These Mr. Jerram renders thus:

"Nupta indocta domi, pinguis sit vilicus agris,
Sint placidæ noctes, et sine lite dies;
Hic super accedat proles formosa perennem
Quæ cantu celebret, læta corona, focum."

To make the notice complete it should be added that Herrick derived his inspiration, and Mr. Jerram some of his phraseology, from Martial. In his "Epigrams," bk. x., 47, he names the following among others as making for the vita beator:

"Non ingratus ager, focus perennis
Lis nunquam, toga rara, meus quieta."

And "Epigrams," ii. 90, concludes with the lines:

"Sit mihi verna satur, sit non dochesimus
conjug,
Sit nox cum somno, sit sine lite dies."

By the way, how does Mr. Jerram scan accedat in his third line above?

W. F. COBB, D.D.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

Whitehall: August 7.

Mr. Tyler takes refuge in an unworthy quibble. It is quite true that "there is not a single play of Shakespeare of which it can be precisely and definitely said that it was written during the period" 1592-1594. But if we are unable to say, roughly, which group of plays comes nearest to those years and which to the years 1598-1601, then the work of the last twenty years goes for nothing. And, as a matter of fact, there would be very little dispute among any half-dozen competent Shakespearean scholars on this point. As to which group has the greater affinities with the sonnets, that is a question of literary style, and obviously cannot be discussed in the columns of the ACADEMY. But surely there is quite as little pessimism in the 1598-1601 plays—mostly joyous or even riotous comedies—as in those of 1592-1594. The date of Troilus and Cressida is quite uncertain, and I doubt if any of the pessimistic plays can reasonably be put as early as 1601. The tragedies of invective are all a great deal later.

Now, as to the question whether the "bed-vow broke" can refer to "a marriage of Mary Fitton in early youth—possibly a runaway match—which had been set aside as invalid," surely this is a very red-herring of a conjecture. Mr. Tyler himself admits that the evidence of the pedigrees goes to show that the first marriage was that with Captain Polwhele about 1607. From 1595 to the scandal of 1601 the lady was Mistress Mary Fitton, and a maid of honour at Court. But there are two letters from Sir Edward Fitton to Cecil in 1599-1600, on which Mr. Tyler founds this idea of an earlier annulled marriage. The first speaks of a "porcon" due to his daughter from Sir Henry Wallop, treasurer of Ireland, by the non-payment of which she is "hindered." So far the reference may be and probably is to Sir Edward's other daughter, Anne, who was married in 1587. Mr. Tyler does not quote the second letter in full. He describes it as mentioning Mary by name, and as speaking of £1,200 due to Fitton and assigned by him to her. But he does not say that it is called a marriage portion. We do not know what claim Sir Fitton had on the Irish revenue. He may have assigned part of the total sum due to each of his daughters. Or if the first letter refers to Mary, it may concern a contemplated marriage which was "hindered" for want of the portion. Surely such very unintelligible fragments of a correspondence are a scanty basis for an otherwise unsupported theory. Mr. Tyler's other argument, that because Mary Fitton's elder brother married without his father's consent in 1592 therefore Mary may, probably, have done the same thing at the same time is an argument pour rire.

I know Mr. Tyler's book pretty well. There is certainly nothing in the binding—a very ordinary piece of work—to delay my study of it. I can turn to the page where he ascribes to Pembroke a poem of John Donne's, and to the page where he supposes that Pembroke and Shakespeare are the subjects of Ben Jonson's out at Beaumont and Fletcher in Bartholomew Fair. But I have no wish to be acrimonious; I am too anxious to get at the facts; and if Mr. Tyler can give me any real evidence of this supposed early marriage, I will reconsider the Pembroke theory. Though even then, I think that, in the context, it would have shown a want of humour in Shakespeare to talk of a "bed-vow" if he only meant a marriage annulled ten years before. The Cecil papers for 1599-1600 will not apparently get calendared by the Hist. MSS. Commission for some years. Will Mr. Tyler print the second Fitton letter in full, and add to it any other letters from Fitton to Cecil of the same date which may be in the collection? We want to know what the nature of this Irish debt really was.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

MR. BORLASE ON IRISH ARCHÆOLOGY.

Veulettes: August 7.

I am writing away from home and without the advantage of having seen Mr. Borlase's work, so that the following criticism may possibly not be justified as far as Mr. Borlase is concerned, and cannot be supported as amply as I could wish by reference to the texts. I note, however, a statement twice made in the course of your review, due apparently to Mr. Borlase, and, apparently, endorsed by your reviewer, which seems to me questionable in the extreme. It is "that the huge mass of legendary matter which forms the bulk of extant Irish literature was, in its present form, composed or recomposed mainly between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries." Later, this statement appears in the following form: "These voluminous documents mainly composed between the twelfth and fifteenth centuries."

So far, however, from applying to the "bulk of Irish literature," it seems that this statement is intended to apply solely to the so-called mythological cycle, to that body of legend which describes the settlement of Ireland by the races of Partholan, Nemeah, Fribologs, Tuatha Dé Danann, and Milesians, together with their relations both warlike and friendly. Now, whilst it is quite true that texts of this cycle continued to be copied, with alteration of the language and occasional amplification of the subject-matter down to the fifteenth century and beyond, it is equally true that the main lines of the legend are found in texts that go back to the eleventh century. Lebor Gabala as found in the Book of the Dun(ow), tenth century (Poems of Eochaidt hua Flainn), ninth century (mentions in the oldest part of Cormac's Glossary), and eighth or even seventh century (Lebor Gabala as made use of by Nennius in the first quarter of the ninth century). Furthermore, such development of the "mythological" romances as took place subsequent to the twelfth century is essentially romantic and conventional, and is of no more value for determining the original mythological or ethnological factors of the cycle than are the latest Charlemagne or Arthur romances, for the purpose of reaching the earliest form of the Carolingian or Arthurian saga. Valuable for other purposes these romantic developments may be, but for the ethnologist or the historian worthless.

I have no hope of converting my friend Mr. Borlase. But it is well to restate the simple facts of the case. The Irish mythological tales are the mythology of the race, extirpated under the influence of Christian and classic learning, and modified to an extent it is very difficult to determine by the Viking settlement of the ninth-tenth centuries. In their present form they are substantially the composition of tenth and eleventh centuries' antiquaries and storytellers working upon an infinitely older mass of tribal and ritual traditions; in so far as any historic or ethnological data are to be extracted from them at all, as to which I have my doubts, it is the oldest text, and in especial Nennius and the Poems of Eochaidt hua Flainn and Einnias hua Artacain that must be examined. As far as the Tuatha Dé Danann are concerned, I shall in the immediately forthcoming second volume of The Voyage of Bran submit a theory of their nature and original attributes that will, at all events, be in line with present mythological investigation as represented by Mannhardt, Mr. Frazer, M. Merillies, and Dr. Jevons.

ALFRED NUTT.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

Mr. Marion Crawford's "A Rose of Yesterday," (Macmillan.)

"ONE of Mr. Marion Crawford's cabinet-pictures," says the Speaker. "There are certain of his novels which are executed in the heroic style. . . . But, side by side with these gallery works, he has produced a series of delicate paintings on a smaller scale." The story "is told with all Mr. Crawford's refinement and subtlety, and the reader is as much interested in Mrs. Harmon's refusal to yield to Colonel Wimpole's entreaties and sue for a divorce as if he had known the lady all his life. . . . Slight and delicate as it is, there is something in A Rose of Yesterday which makes the book linger with a distinct aroma of its own in the reader's memory." "The peculiar significance of the book," writes the Spectator, "is that we find in it an American writer protesting in dignified and eloquent terms against the laxity of his country's divorce laws, and prophesying social anarchy as the inevitable result of their further relaxation. That this attitude is not assumed out of any selfish regard for men's interests will be readily admitted by all who read the noble panegyric of women at the end of the fourth chapter." It seems to the Chronicle that the author "has scarce displayed the courage of his convictions. He shrinks from allowing his heroine to suffer martyrdom for the faith that is in her. No sooner has Helen written to her husband offering certain arrangements for their future, than she receives a message from America telling her that the man has died suddenly, and that she is free! So does she receive an earthly and material reward for her strenuousness in the righteous cause. . . . 'Be good,' Mr. Crawford seems to say, 'and you shall have not only the satisfaction of your own conscience, but a piece of plum-cake and a glass of nice currant wine as well!'" "As a work of art," says the Telegraph, "A Rose of Yesterday cannot compare with such a masterpiece as the author's Saracinesca. Nevertheless, it is an interesting and suggestive study, built upon the assumption that love is capable of defying time, and that the oncoming of old age is powerless to abate its ardour."

"Audrey Craven." By May Sinclair. (Blackwood.)

"Of the workmanship of this remarkable book," writes the Fall Mall with enthusiasm, "it is difficult to speak in terms of flattery. Audrey's character is drawn with the rarest subtlety, yet with absolute truthfulness. There is nothing superfluous in it, nothing wanting; and the same care is shown in the details as in the contour. It is a strangely fascinating yet repellent figure, and it is no exaggeration to call it a masterpiece of characterisation. Scarcely less skill is shown in the portrayal of the rest of the dramatis personæ, while the finished style, the terse epigrams, the excellence of the story, minister to our delight." The Chronicle will be "more astonished than it has ever been astonished" if it does not hear a good deal more of May Sinclair in the future. Audrey "comes near to being a masterpiece of feminine portraiture." "She was convinced that she had an individuality, and she yearned to develop it. In point of fact, she never had an original idea, a truly spontaneous impulse. 'If you could have cut a vertical section through Audrey's soul you would have found it built up of successive layers of soul. When you had dug through Wyndham you came to Ted; when you had got through Ted you came upon Hardy, the oldest formation of all.'" The Standard notes that "the fault of the story, if a fault it can be called, for it is one of method only, is that it shows a certain lack of emotional force, so that even the crucial scenes leave the reader somewhat unmoved, and gives the impression that the author wrote it from an intellectual standpoint, rather than an emotional one." "Perhaps," it adds, "the book is for the thoughtful reader rather than the hurried: the student of human nature will certainly find it interesting." The Saturday, having praised the characterisation, especially of the woman, soberly observes that "though Audrey Craven is in no sense a great work, it stands out honourably from the mass of rubbish that is put upon the book market under the name of fiction as a clever and well-written story. There is not a line in it that strives at 'smart' writing, but there is an abundance of good English, and now and then a good phrase."

"A CURIOUSLY amorphous book," says the Speaker, "to come from one who could have been described as a great master of English style. . . . We have sentences of personal reference and explanation breaking out in the most unexpected places . . . ; but we search in vain for any careful discussion of the questions really at issue." Comparative mythology which confines itself to language "is only a branch . . . and cannot be regarded as a science adequate to the interpretation of religious belief; for belief cannot live without the institutions which are ever modifying it. . . ." Further, "how far is the comparative mythology of one race [the Indo-European] applicable to all races? . . . Even granting the principles of Mr. Max Müller, to argue from what may be true of a sphere within which his illustrations hold . . . to what is true of all mythology is a step too gigantic for any stride known to logic. . . ." The book "has contributed to our knowledge of its author a little, but less than a little to our knowledge of the science he would commend." The Athenæum laments that "no orderly statement of rival theories is attempted"; that, "large as is the space occupied by polemics, they are ineffectual, because nowhere definite in aim or precise in method; while they constantly irritate by insistence upon secondary or irrelevant points." Special mention is, however, made of the sections devoted to Mordwinian mythology—"the sources from which the author draws his account are inaccessible to most English readers, and the mythology itself . . . is full of interest and charm."

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-
WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS are made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED ORAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Ceteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY.

08 AUG 1897

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1320.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

DAVID NUTT, 270-271, Strand, London, W.C.,
PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS
in all Languages.

New and Standard Books in all Branches kept in Stock or supplied promptly to order.

Foreign Periodicals supplied.

Catalogues and terms on application.
LARGE STOCK OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS
in all Departments of Literature.

LATEST CATALOGUES:—

No. 51 BEMITICA—OLD TESTAMENT THEOLOGY. (1443 lots.)
.. 52, 54 MISCELLANEOUS. (768, 723 lots.)
.. 53 PHILOSOPHY. (940 lots.)

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS,
23, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.

CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application.

DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum),
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.

CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS,
3, Creed Lane, London, E.C.

Calcutta: THACKER, SPRING & Co.

MSS. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 23rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printers
and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 32, or 52-page Journals at one operation.

Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.

Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.

Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen ruled or plain.

ESTABLISHED 1861.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

DEPARTMENT of SCIENCE and ART.

ROYAL COLLEGE of ART, SOUTH
KENSINGTON, S.W.

Visitors: Sir W. B. RICHMOND, R.A.; P. J. SHIELDS, A.R.W.S.
Principal: JOHN C. L. SPARKES, Esq.

The ANNUAL SESSION, 1897-98, will COMMENCE on WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8. Art classes in connection with the college are open to the public on payment of fees. The classes for men and women students meet separately. The studies comprise Ornament and the Figure, with a view to their ultimate use in Design and Composition, and include the study of Plants and Flowers, the Painting of Still Life, and the Drawing and Painting of Ornament and of the Figure.

Candidates for admission who have not passed any examination of the department in freehand drawing must pass the admission examination in that subject.

The Examination will be held at the College on September 28 and October 5 at 11.45 a.m. and 4.30 p.m. on both days, and on subsequent Tuesdays at frequent intervals throughout the session.

Application for further information may be made in writing to the Secretary, Department of Science and Art, S.W.; or on and after October 8, personally to the Registrar, at the College, Exhibition Road, S.W.

By order of the
LORDS of the COMMITTEE of COUNCIL on EDUCATION.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LECTURES ON ZOOLOGY.

The GENERAL COURSE of LECTURES, by Professor W. F. R.
WELDON, F.R.S., will commence on WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 8th,
at 1 p.m.

These Lectures are suited to the requirements of Students preparing for the Examinations of the London University, as well as to those of Students wishing to study Zoology for its own sake. Notice of other Courses of Lectures, to be delivered during the Session, will be given later.

J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.

FOUR SCHOLARSHIPS and ONE EXHIBITION, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £20 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1897-viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology. Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London medical school.

One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.

The Jefferson Exhibition (value £20) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German.
The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation
Examination of July, 1897.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.

For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

RUSKIN.—"THE PRINCIPLES of ART," as defined by Mr. RUSKIN, and illustrated in the Ruskin Museum, is now to be obtained from the Author on receipt of Postal order, carriage paid. Price (with a Photogravure Plates, 688 pp.) 10s. 6d. net.
—Address, Mr. WILLIAM WITTE, Ruskin Museum, Sheffield. Prospectus, with Press opinions, on application.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman,
experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Furnival Street, London, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for FILLING UP about TWENTY VACANCIES on the Foundation will be held on the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th SEPTEMBER
NEXT.—For information apply to the BURSAR, St. Paul's School,
West Kensington, W.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made duly qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1896. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY OFFICE 45 Chancery Lane London.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

LONDON,

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of

PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS

OF

FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

Embracing almost the whole of the Masterpieces of the Great Artists of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, and rich in examples of the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, German, French, and Spanish Schools of Painting.

BRITISH ARTISTS of the VICTORIAN ERA.

Through the courtesy of the owners, the Autotype Company are enabled to publish Autotype Reproductions of several important works lately exhibited at the Corporation of London Art Gallery Guildhall. The Series includes notable examples of:

J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.	D. G. ROBERTS.
DAVID COX.	F. SANDS.
FRED WALKER, A.R.A.	J. PETTIE, R.A.
S. COOPER, R.A.	Etc.

The Reproductions, printed in permanent sepia pigments, measure about 18 inches longest line, and are sold at the uniform price of 12s. each.

SELECTED PICTURES from the PARIS SALONS.

A NEW SERIES of REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS in the NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON

THE ENGLISH SCHOOL of LANDSCAPE PAINT-ING.

Autotypes after TURNER, CONSTABLE, GIRTIN, COTMAN, CRONE,
DAVID COX, CLARESON STANFIELD, CECIL LAWSON, etc., etc.
Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproductions of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples of specially designed patterns made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the house of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION
and thus lessen the Cost of Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

Now OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.
48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and at BARTON ANGLAS, MANCHESTER.

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS,
BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COL-
LECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE
AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—
ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—
NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CON-
TINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS
ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW
BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF
BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND
AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—
BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED,
AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE
CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

	s.	d.
FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE* ... ..	8	6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	4	6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE ... ..	2	6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES
the large EXPORT AND EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS,
the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS
NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line
Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print
Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

OF THE

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the
FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by
over 80 pages,
whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenaeum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

NOTICE.—The SECOND EDITION of "POT-POURRI
FROM A SURREY GARDEN," by Mrs. C. W.
EARLE, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d., having been immediately exhausted, a THIRD EDITION has been put to press, and will be ready next Wednesday.

From the SPECTATOR.—"Space fails to show the excellence in every department of Mrs. Earle's practical advice; but no woman who loves her house, her garden, and her children should fail to read this book."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON ... ..	November 14
JOHN KEATS ... ..	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... ..	" 28
TOM HOOD ... ..	December 5
THOMAS GRAY ... ..	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ... ..	" 19
SIR WALTER SCOTT ... ..	" 26

	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON ... ..	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ... ..	" 9
LEIGH HUNT ... ..	" 16
LORD MACAULAY ... ..	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHEY ... ..	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..	February 6
CHARLES LAMB ... ..	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ... ..	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ... ..	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..	March 6
EDMUND WALLER ... ..	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS ... ..	" 20
JOHN MILTON ... ..	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER ... ..	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN ... ..	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ... ..	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG- FELLOW ... ..	" 24
ANDREW MARVELL ... ..	May 1
ROBERT BROWNING ... ..	" 8
THOMAS CARLYLE ... ..	" 15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ... ..	" 22
CHARLES DICKENS ... ..	" 29
JONATHAN SWIFT ... ..	June 5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ... ..	" 12
WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..	" 19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ... ..	" 26
ALEXANDER POPE ... ..	July 3
DOUGLAS JERROLD ... ..	" 10
FRANCIS BACON ... ..	" 17

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.

(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocoaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL of Munich,

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process:
For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 4, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY DR. ALEX. MACLAREN.

MOST RECENT, crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s., post free.

THE BEATITUDES, AND OTHER SERMONS.

"Dr. Maclaren's new volume will be received with special warmth, as containing an excellent exposition of the Beatitudes. Dr. Maclaren's work is always full of thought and knowledge and power, intensely evangelical, and unfailingly fresh."—British Weekly.

Uniform with the above, price 5s. each, post free.

CHRIST'S "MUSTS," and other Sermons.
"Dr. Maclaren is our ideal preacher."—Expository Times.
"Masterly, beautiful, inspiring."—Methodist Recorder.

THE UNCHANGING CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"The work of a master of pulpit oratory."—Freeman.
"Distinguished by the finest scholarship and the most exquisite literary finish."—Christian Leader.

THE HOLY of HOLIES: a Series of Sermons on the 14th, 15th, and 16th Chapters of the Gospel by John.

"Every sermon glows with unction, and shows intense power."—Methodist Recorder.

THE WEARIED CHRIST, and other
Sermons.

"They show the same wonderful fertility of apt and beautiful illustrations, the same exquisite use of language, and the same direct heart-searching power which we are accustomed to find in all Dr. Maclaren's works."
Christian World Pulpit.

PAUL'S PRAYERS, and other Sermons.

"For more than a quarter of a century he has held almost an unchallenged position as the prince of pulpit orators.....
The back pews of Dr. Maclaren's church are in the nooks and corners of the earth."—Methodist Times.

THE GOD of the AMEN, and other
Sermons.

"Open the book wherever we may, the temptation to read on and on is very great. The volume is invaluable."
Sunday School Chronicle.

LONDON: ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD,
21 AND 22, FURNIVAL STREET, E.C.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
The Irish Lyre ... ..	143
British Central Africa ... ..	144
The National Movement in the Reign of Henry III. ... ..	145
Educational Books ... ..	146
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	147
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	149
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	149
New Books Received... ..	149
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	150
SHAKESPEARE AS A LONDONER ... ..	151
THREE NEGLECTED BOOKS: 1. "DAGONET THE JESTER" ... ..	152
ART ... ..	153
DRAMA ... ..	154
SCIENCE ... ..	155
CORRESPONDENCE ... ..	155
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	15-50

REVIEWS.

THE IRISH LYRE.

Bards of the Gael and Gall: Examples of the Poetic Literature of Erin. Done into English after the Metres and Modes of the Gael. By George Sigerson, M.D., F.R.U.I. (T. Fisher Unwin.)

AMID much half-knowledge and hasty theorising, such a book as Dr. Sigerson's comes to us with a welcome distinction: it is the work of one who knows. And those who know are apt to be no more than knowing; but Dr. Sigerson, as the crown of his knowledge, has feeling, imagination, taste. He has Celtic scholarship, he possesses the art of poetry, and to these he adds the scientific habit of mind, often, as in Goethe's case, a valuable coadjutor or ally of the æsthetic spirit. The result is a work of extreme interest and no slight importance. He begins his translations with those strange verses of the prehistoric Amergin which, says that most competent judge, Dr. Douglas Hyde, may very well "present the oldest surviving lines in any vernacular tongue in Europe except Greek." He ends at the opening of the present century, toward the practical close of the long and splendid reign of the Irish Celtic tongue, as an instrument of poetry. Himself a "Gall-Gael," he omits to exemplify no kind of Irish poetry written either by the Gael or by their "outland" visitors and settlers, the Gall of the north and west, the Norsemen and the Normans. The list of his sections will show his range and scope: Lays of Milesian Invaders; The Cuchulainn Period; The Fiann Period; Ossianic, Age of Lamentations; The Christian Dawn; Early Christian; Gael and Norse; Gael and Norman, &c.; Seventeenth Century; Eighteenth Century, Patriotic; Eighteenth Century, Songs of the Emotions, &c. It could not be more comprehensive and representative of that great corpus poeticum, the work of a people civilised and cultured at a time when England had no arts, no learning, and no desire for them; when Ireland, as Dr. Johnson puts it, was "the school of the West, the quiet habitation of sanctity and literature"; when foreigners of many nations could write of themselves, as wrote a saint in the eighth century:

"Exemplo patrum, commotus amore legendi, Ivit ad Hibernos sophia mirabile claros."

This is a notable service to general literature and to Ireland, the richly dowered country of which Sir William Temple writes: "I have often observed with wonder that we should know less of Ireland than of any other country in Europe."

Dr. Sigerson's translations aim at reproducing, or, when that is impossible, at suggesting, the metrical, rhythmical, and other technical features of their originals: the orderly alliterations, the interstitial rhymes, the vowel assonances. He has accomplished it with singular success. It is not very difficult to imitate these devices in original verse, nor to preserve them in bald translation; but to preserve them in translations that shall not be bald nor crude is a remarkable feat, and Dr. Sigerson has achieved it. To take a simple example, here is a stanza from a touching poem of the early thirteenth century—a praise of "The Sacred Heart."

"That in Jesus' heart should be
One like me is marvellous;
Sin has made my life a loss,
But His Cross shall speak for us."

Or again, here is "The Blackbird's Song," found by an Italian scholar "on the margin of an ancient MS. of St. Gall's. The monk had been copying, when the merle sang, and he paused to write this little lay" (A.D. 850):

"Great woods gird me now around,
With sweet sound merle sings to me;
My much-lined pages over
Sings its lover minstrelsie.

"Soft it sings its measured song,
Hid among the tree-tops green:
May God on high thus love me,
Thus approve me, all unseen."

Surely, to paraphrase Tertullian, testimonium animæ naturaliter Franciscanæ, as in the case of a thousand Irish saints, from Patrick, Brigid, and Columbkille onward. From two of the earliest of the eighteenth century poems we may take admirable specimens of Dr. Sigerson's power. "The Fair Hills of Eiré" is familiar enough from the beautiful but imperfect versions of Ferguson and Mangan; this is Dr. Sigerson's rendering of its close:

"The dew-drops sparkle, like diamonds on the corn,

Fair Hills of Eiré O!

Where green boughs dangle, the bright apples burn,

Fair Hills of Eiré O!

Behold, in the valley, cress and berries bland,
Where streams love to dally, in that Wondrous Land,

While the great River-voices roll their music grand

Round the Fair Hills of Eiré O!

"O, 'tis welcoming, wide-hearted, that dear land of love!

Fair Hills of Eiré O!

New life unto the martyred is the pure breeze above

The Fair Hills of Eiré O!

More sweet than tune flowing o'er the c. ord, of gold

Comes the kine's soft lowing, from the mountain fold;

O, the Splendour of the Sunshine on them all,
Young and Old,

'Mid the Fair Hills of Eiré O!"

That is the work of a patriot poet in exile; this is by a poet sorrowing for Ireland at home, to whose comfort comes the Spirit of Poetry, thus wonderfully described:

"Brightness of Brightness came, in loveliness, advancing.

Crystal of Crystal her clear gray eyes were glancing,

Sweetness of Sweetness her soft words flowed, entrancing,

Redness and Whiteness her cheek's fair form enhancing.

"Cluster of Clusters, her hair descended flowing,

Swept o'er the flowers in showers of golden glowing;

Round her a raiment more pure than purest snowing,

Lofty her radiant race far beyond our knowing."

One would gladly quote some of the early poems, Christian or otherwise, tremulous with their joy in nature. Saint Columba, saying farewell to Ireland, hardly knows whether he most regrets to leave its beauty or its people: he sings them in one breath:

"Many, west, sweet apples shine,
Many kings and princes fine,
Many snowy-blossomed sloes,
Many oak trees, few the woes."

He loves the pale sea about the Hill of Howth, to sail in his ship Red-Dewy, to see the flash of the gulls' white wings; to listen to the blackbird as he claps his wings for joy; to the lowing kine at "dewy dawn"; to the "cuckoo's call at summer's brink." And the pre-Christian poets are full of a like childlike exultation over the beauty of the world. It is a feature of Irish poetry, in whatever language written, up to the present day, this childlike, not philosophical, delight in nature, its colours, and scents, and sounds. For the rest, there is no such thing as "the Irish style" or "the Celtic note," if by that be meant that a sort of wistful Byronism or passionate melancholy, set to somewhat wild and tumultuous melody, is that style or note. Irish poetry is most various, and it has been marked by an astonishing care for, an amazing skill in, technical accomplishment and dexterity; this often to a disastrous degree. The pioneers of Irish literature seem to have found a subtle fascination in forming language into intricate music, in obedience to complicated rule and law: and the same thing is true of the Welsh. It could result in marvels of difficulty overcome to splendid effect by true poets, as also in obscure and soulless compositions by mechanic metre-mongers and poetastic pedants. That Celtic poetry is essentially a wandering wail, a careless shout, is a fiction, rather dangerous to writers who have the laudable ambition of Celticising themselves. In this by no means voluminous collection they may discover how classical, joyous, and humane has been much of the best

Irish poetry, from "Milesian" days to those of O'Connell.

Dr. Sigerson's introduction and notes are full of arresting points. First, there is the momentous fact that in early Irish literature, and there alone, we can view a primitive European civilisation untouched by Rome: a possibility of too obvious a value to require comment. Then there are the gifts of Irish genius and learning to Europe, as when, in Renan's words, "legions of Irish saints and scholars in the sixth, seventh, and eighth centuries inundated the Continent," bringing with them classical knowledge, philosophy, natural science, artistic crafts of design, and also, as Dr. Sigerson stoutly contends, the gift of rhyme. We think that he hardly makes sufficient allowance for the traces of rhyme in the Greek and Latin classics: indeed, a slight, a very slight, inclination to claim for Ireland the primordia of post-classical literature in matter and form is the one possible blemish upon his book. But that the Irish systems of verse had a great effect upon Continental versification is indisputable: as it is, that to St. Sedulius, "hymn-writer when hymns were rare," as Bard Ethell sings, is the chief credit due. A third point is Dr. Sigerson's valiant championship of the "Danes": and assuredly he batters some grievous breaches in what has commonly been considered a well-fortified position. A more important matter, historic justice apart, is the insistence upon the debt of Norse literature to the Irish—a question in which Dr. Sigerson fully corroborates and accepts the contentions of those eminent Norse scholars, Messrs. Vigfusson and York Powell. Very interesting also are the demonstrations of the occasional influence of Irish poetry upon English up to Elizabethan times, when it was chiefly exercised through the instrumentality of Irish airs, and Drayton, that lover of things Celtic, wrote:

"The Irish I admire,
And still cleave to that lyre,
As our music's mother;
And think, till I expire,
Apollo's such another."

But all these are points for the specialist: for the intelligent public it is enough to read and enjoy the "golden treasury" of Irish verse in Dr. Sigerson's English setting. Comparatively few of the poems will be familiar to the English reader; and some famous and familiar pieces, as the "Dark Rosaleen," he will look to find in vain, doubtless, for sufficient reasons. But he will certainly feel his comprehension of the Irish character in art quickened and enriched, while the Irishman will be disposed to answer the question debated in the Fortress of Finn, "Where is the sweetest music?" with Finn's own answer:

" 'This is Song and this is Music,' Spoke our lofty Leader old;
'Blowing breeze' mid moving banners,
And an Army 'neath their gold.'"

For the book is full of noble Irish exultation and of noble Irish mourning.

OUR CENTRAL AFRICAN PROTECTORATE.

British Central Africa. By Sir Henry H. Johnston, K.C.B. (Methuen & Co.)

IN recent years no English—or must it now be "British"?—name has been more intimately, certainly none more honourably, associated with the African continent than that of the author of this encyclopædic work. If we mistake not, his interest in that part of the world dates from early in the eighties, when the fruits of a visit to the Portuguese settlements on the West Coast were embodied in a valuable monograph on the races of Angola and Benguela published in the Journal of the Anthropological Institute for 1883. Other expeditions rapidly followed to the Congo (The River Congo from its Mouth to Bôlôlo, 1884), and to Kilimanjaro, on the slopes of which six months were spent in studying the natural history and anthropology of the surrounding plateaux and highlands (The Kilimanjaro Expedition, 1886). The experience thus acquired soon received official recognition, and with the Consular work done in the Niger Coast Protectorate (1886-88) was opened a brilliant career of some ten years in the public service, which has been crowned with well-earned honours, titles, and more substantial prizes.

Undoubtedly, Sir Henry's most notable achievement was the restoration of order and the firm establishment of British rule under almost overwhelming difficulties in the Nyasaland region, to which he was appointed Commissioner and Consul-General in the year 1890. At that time the country between the Lower Zambesi and Lake Tanganyika, which in the partition of the continent had been assigned to England, was in a state of all but hopeless chaos, a prey to every imaginable form of political and social disorder—Arab slave raids abetted by Angoni and Yao predatory tribes, almost open Portuguese warfare, more dangerous German intrigues, missionary squabbles, discontented and even disloyal white settlers, famine, pestilence, massacres, and so forth. But our "Pro-Consul" was of the Roman type, and so far from despairing of the land, which still lacked an official designation, he boldly named it "British Central Africa," in anticipation, as he explains, of its future expansion westwards and northwards. The name has been objected to as somewhat "previous"; but no true patriot will blame him for believing in his country's "manifest destiny," although international rivalries have for the present prevented British Central Africa from attaining "the geographical limits to which I had originally aspired, and which would have amply justified its title" (Preface).

Meanwhile, the practical government of the country was undertaken with such vigour and ability that the Commissioner was in a position to announce quite a marvellous transformation in his official "Report of the First Three Years' Administration of British Central Africa, 1894." The bellicose Portuguese were soothed with soft words; German intrigue was nipped in the bud; the Arabs were driven out and have not since returned, while their native allies were either pacified or crushed; the missionaries also at last understood that they must henceforth give up all hopes of temporal rule, and confine themselves to the religious and moral teaching which they had already begun with such excellent results at Blantyre and in other parts of the Shiré basin.

The work under notice may be regarded as an enlargement and continuation to date of that triennial Report, in which all these wonders are recorded in clear, and even eloquent, language. Speaking generally, it constitutes one of the most solid and comprehensive contributions to our knowledge of the "New Africa" that has yet appeared in England or abroad. Some idea of its multifarious contents may be formed by a mere reference to such subjects as the physical geography of the Nyasa region, its history, the slave trade, the missionaries, botany, zoology, the natives and their languages, to all of which separate chapters are devoted. An estimate of its value to students of the country may be had from the consideration that these subjects and several others are dealt with, often at great length, and always at first hand, by a naturalist who has had a wider experience of things African than almost any other living authority.

We have spoken of the author as an eloquent writer. He is often even fascinating, and there are many descriptive passages of great charm and beauty which crop out wherever the subject lends itself to picturesque treatment. Steaming up a steadily flowing river (the Shiré?), the observer notices in mid-stream

"an islet of very green grass, so lush and so thick that there are no bright lights or sharp shadows—simply a great splotch of rich green in the middle of the shining water which reflects principally the whitish-blue of the sky; though this general tint becomes opaline and lovely as mother-of-pearl, owing to the swirling of the current and the red-gold colour of the concealed sand-banks which in shallow places permeates the reflections. Near to the right side of the grassy islet, separated only by a narrow mauve-tinted band of water, is a sand-bank that has been uncovered, and on this stands a flock of perhaps three dozen small white egrets closely packed, momentarily immovable, and all stiffly regardant of the approaching steamer, each bird with a general similarity of outline almost Egyptian in its monotonous repetition. The steamer approaches a little nearer, and the birds rise from the sand-bank with a loose flapping flight, and strew themselves over the landscape like a shower of large white petals."

Amid such vivid scenes we seem to be once more accompanying the late Prof. Drummond on his delightful excursion through tropical Africa. But our author is perhaps more sympathetic, at least with the human elements of his surroundings. He can sympathise even with the Arab slave-dealer, whose occupation is already on the wane, and who recognises the emblem of the new order of things in the British ensign which flutters at the mast-head of the tiny gunboat riding at anchor within a stone's throw of his cabin on the blue waters of Nyasa.

"In his dull way this unlettered man has grasped the fact that, from their own inherent faults and centuries of wrongdoing, Islam and Arab civilisation must yield the place to the religion and influence of the European. He has no prejudice against Christianity—on the contrary, perhaps a greater belief in its supernatural character than some of the Englishmen he entertains from time to time—but if his inchoate thoughts could be interpreted in one sentence, it would be: 'Not in our time, O Lord!' The change must come, but may it come after his death. Meantime, he hopes that you will not drive home too far the logic of your rule. When he is gone the Christian missionary may come and build there; but while he lasts he prefers to see nothing but the ramshackle mosques of his own faith, and to have his half-caste children taught in the Arab fashion. He points out some to you who are sitting in the verandah of an opposite hut, under the shade of a knot of papaw trees; a hideous old Negroid Arab with a dark skin and pockmarked face is teaching them to read. Each child has a smooth wooden board with a long handle, something like a hand-mirror in shape. The surface of this board is whitened with a thin coating of porcelain clay, and Arab letters, verses of the Koran, and sentences for parsing are written on it by means of a reed pen dipped in ink or by a piece of charcoal."

Such pictures are of frequent occurrence, pictures in which not merely the local colouring and outward forms, but the inner soul and the vivifying spirit are depicted true to life. As might be expected from the bent of his studies, the writer devotes much space to this human factor, both in the historical survey, which is admirably done, and in the chapters specially occupied with the physical and mental characters, the customs, beliefs, and languages of the present inhabitants of British Central Africa. It is unnecessary to follow him in his speculations on the origin and evolution of mankind, although a protest might be entered against the assumption that the theory of an Asiatic or Indian cradleland "at present holds the field," unless, indeed, "India" is to be taken in a very wide sense, so as to include Indonesia and, perhaps, some other lands now forming the bed of the Indian Ocean. He stands on somewhat safer ground when he suggests that the present Bantu populations were preceded in Nyasaland by a race "akin to the Bushman-Hottentot type of Negro." The writer himself has met true Bushmen as far north as the 14th parallel on the West African seaboard; he also refers to specimens of the so-called "Bushman stones" picked up at the south end of Tanganyika, and mentions traditions of this primitive race still lingering among the Mañanjas of the Mlanje uplands.

Other evidence might be adduced in proof of the former range of Bushman nomads right up to the lacustrine plateaux, whence our author supposes them to have been driven south of the Zambesi by Bantu immigrants from the North not more than some 2,000 years ago. But it is difficult to believe that the Bantus, whose centre of dispersion is placed somewhere about the Congo-Chad water-parting, were such recent arrivals in South Central Africa; nor are the arguments advanced in support of this view at all convincing. No doubt the Bantu linguistic family, occupying the whole of the area in question, still presents a remarkable degree of uniformity throughout its wide domain. But the same is true also, and even in a far higher degree, of other linguistic families, the Semitic, for instance, which has occupied the south-western parts of Asia for many thousand years, and whose various branches nevertheless betray but comparatively slight signs of disintegration.

Both in this work and elsewhere the author attaches much weight to the fact that nearly all the Bantu peoples have a common name (dialectic variants of Kuku) for the domestic fowl, which was introduced into Egypt from Asia not before 400 B.C.; hence, he argues, "it is clear that the Bantus knew the fowl prior to their dispersal" (p. 480). This is a curious non sequitur, the fallacy of which becomes obvious if we suppose, as is probable enough, that they have also a common name for the manioc plant, for instance, which, nevertheless, was introduced from the New World within the last two or three hundred years. The names of all such useful objects generally spread with the objects themselves from tribe to tribe, from people to people, dispersion or no dispersion. Innumerable cases in point will occur to the student of comparative philology from the Malayo-Polynesian, the Finno-Tatar, the Guarani, the Aryan, and other widespread linguistic groups.

Exception must also be taken to the statement that the Semitic is a development of the Hamitic type, while "the Hamites themselves obviously originated as a superior ascending variety of the Negritic species, from which basal stock had been derived in still earlier times the Bushman-Hottentot group, whose languages—especially that of the Hottentot—are thought by some authorities to show remote affinities in structure to the Hamitic tongues" (p. 54).

Lepsius's suggestion of a probable relationship between the Hottentot and Egyptian (Hamitic) languages was never accepted by any sound philologist, while anthropologists are now almost unanimous in separating the Hamito-Semitic from the Negro division of mankind, and grouping it with the Caucasian, using the term in Blumenbach's sense.

At p. 55 the Bantu migrations southwards are assumed to have taken place "about 1000 years ago," doubtless a misprint for 2000. Attention may here be called to a few other slips or inaccuracies calling for revision in future editions. Monomotapa is still spoken of as "a powerful empire of Bantu Negroes" (p. 56), although it has lately been shown that the word is undoubtedly a personal title, meaning perhaps "prince" or "lord of the mines." In a note the term is properly treated as a title, although the suggested derivations cannot be accepted. We read (p. 56) that "simultaneously with the first Portuguese Conquistadores and mining adventurers came lion-hearted Jesuit missionaries," that is many years before the Order of Jesus was founded; the first missionaries in those parts were Dominicans, such as Dos Santos and others. Another anachronism (p. 62) is a "Zanzibar Sultanate" at the end of the eighteenth century, this sultanate not having been founded till the year 1857. The foundation of the Matabele kingdom also appears to be ante-dated by several years (p. 62), and at p. 89 Katunga, the name of a station in Nyasaland, occurs twice for the mining district of Katanga in the Congo Free State; lastly, why Ci-Nyanja several times for Chinyanja, as at p. 485? which is the proper form according to the orthographic system here adopted.

The work is enriched with a profusion of original illustrations (mostly from photographs and drawings by the author), several useful maps, and a tolerably copious index.

ENGLISH HISTORY FROM AMERICA.

The National Movement in the Reign of Henry III., and its Culmination in the Barons' War. By Oliver H. Richardson, A.B., Professor of History in Drury College. (Macmillan.)

THE reign of Henry III. has been by no means lacking in historians, and its important constitutional aspects have been dealt with by Bishop Stubbs in a manner which may be said almost to reach perfection. Still there was ample room for a little volume like Mr. Richardson's, which, without professing to give a detailed narrative of a period covering more than half a century, attempts, in the words of its author,

"to portray, first, those movements which tended to denationalise the Church and State of England by the perversion of the political doctrines of thirteenth century France and the Empire-Church; and, secondly, those counter-movements which resulted in the complete triumph of the national principle as manifested in the dim beginnings of the revolt from Rome, in the completion of rare unity, and the establishment of the constitution upon a basis both national and popular."

Though his preface is written from Germany, Mr. Richardson's home is evidently on the other side of the Atlantic, and his work does great credit to the present state of American historical scholarship. The neglect of original authorities with which Mr. Freeman once reproached Transatlantic historians in general can certainly not be charged against our author. Besides diligently consulting all the best modern writers on the period, he has made a careful study of the copious contemporary literature, and claims, not without reason, to have endeavoured "to catch the spirit of the time from the pages of the historians who lived among the events which they so vividly describe."

The remarkable analogy between the conflict of the thirteenth century and that of the seventeenth cannot fail to suggest itself to the most superficial reader, and though, of course, there are points of contrast, there are far more instances in which the likeness is most striking; especially there is a very great similarity between the personal characters of the two monarchs against whom the struggle for constitutional liberty had to be waged. In both we see the same combination of private virtues and public vices. Mr. Richardson has well sketched the character of Henry III.:

"Visionary, without the ability necessary to realise his dreams; narrowly pious, without the self-control necessary to stability of character; extreme in his views of royal power, yet incapable alike of inspiring respect in his friends or fear in his foes—he must have drifted if left to himself. But he was not so left. From the very commencement of his reign he fell under influences which seized the salient points of his character and never relaxed their hold."

This might stand, almost without alteration, for the portrait of Charles I. A considerable resemblance may also be traced between the foreign policy of the two sovereigns. In both cases ambitious and far-reaching projects end in the most utter and complete failure, though it must be said that Henry's interference in European affairs proved far more mischievous and disastrous to the country than that of Charles, and was much more directly the cause of the attempt to deprive him of his authority.

The special feature of this reign, and a point in which no other presents an exact parallel since the time of Edward the Confessor, is the predominance of foreign influence. Peter des Roches and his Poitevins were bad enough, the Provencal adventurers who flocked in after Henry's marriage were no better, but far worse than either were the Papal legates, with their ever increasing exactions from both clergy and laity. The "inauspicious alliance between needy Pope and arbitrary king" proved, indeed, of bitter fruit to the country during many miserable years, though finally, by the difficulties in which Henry was involved by his preposterous undertaking to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the Pope in the matter of Sicily, it proved one of the main causes of the great constitutional development which marks the reign.

When the union between the Papacy and the monarchy was so close, it is with surprise that we find a body of men who all over Europe were the most effective agents of the Roman See arrayed in England on the popular side—namely, the mendicant friars, especially the Franciscans. All historians have called attention to the great influence which they exerted in support of Simon de Montfort, but none seem to have been struck with the striking contrast which their attitude presents to that of the continental brethren in the struggle between the Papacy and the Empire, which itself was the main cause of the Papal demands on England for money. The fact, however, is certain that the Franciscans constituted one of the main elements of the most democratic section of the reforming party, and that as a body they adhered to Montfort even after the Papal excommunication. The famous political poem known as the "Song of Lewes" was composed by one of their number, and there is no document of the time which throws a greater light on the views and aims of the national party.

Mr. Richardson has given a careful analysis of the poem, which its importance certainly merits. The distinctness with which the right of resisting a bad king is laid down is very remarkable. "If a prince errs, he should be checked by those whom his injustice has afflicted, unless he himself will correct his mistake." Very striking are the words in which the author of the poem sums up the conclusion of the whole matter:

"First in the rank stands the community. Law reigns supreme over the dignity of the king and is his guide and stay; its absence overthrows the kingdom. The maxim so often cited, 'ut rex vult lex vadit,' is untrue; 'nam lex stat, rex cadit.' The sum of this universal sovereign law is Truth, Charity, and Zeal for salvation; let all royal ordinances be consonant with these; then will the people prosper and the kings will indeed be law."

Mr. Richardson puts a very interesting question when he asks:

"In how far did Simon de Montfort share the doctrines of the poet? Did his theory keep pace with his practice, or was his political action, which forms almost the sole standard of our judgment, based wholly on practical insight, the drift of the times, and his own needs? . . . We know that he received his sympathetic education largely through his intimacy with the leading Minorites, and there exists at least one definite proof that they had speculations in common on such subjects. . . . As a matter of individual opinion then, one may be permitted to believe that De Montfort's political practice was based partly upon political theory; the belief is certainly not inconsistent with any known facts, and there is considerable pleasure in the thought that the man who did so much for the popular liberties of England, and who, according to the view of so many of his contemporaries, fell a martyr to his duty, the cause of God and the Church, died in the light of a dawning faith that the voice of the people was indeed the voice of God."

FOR SCHOOLBOYS.

MR. A. S. WEST'S edition of Bacon's Essays (Cambridge University Press) is furnished with a running commentary of footnotes, in which obscure or archaic words and phrases are interpreted, and quotations from the classics and elsewhere translated. The idea is a good one, and we have on other occasions advocated its adoption in school editions of Elizabethan and earlier English authors. This arrangement enables the general drift of an essay, a scene in a play, or a section of a poem, to be rapidly grasped by a preliminary reading in class, the portion so read being set as a next lesson, to be supplemented by a knowledge of the more elaborate notes at the end of the book. Some of the footnotes here, nevertheless, might surely have been spared. It was hardly necessary, for instance, to explain that "jesting Pilate" is equivalent to "Pilate in derision," or "Doctors of the Church" to "teachers of the Church," or "perfidious and neglecting friends" to "perfidious and negligent friends," and so forth. But what are we to say about the forty pages, or thereabouts, which are devoted to an "Index of Proper Names"? Here, among similar recondite profundities of sacred lore, it is revealed to us that Cain killed Abel, that Elias was none other than Elijah, that Paul was a native of Tarsus, and that Christ was executed during the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate. And in other departments of learning the novelty of the information imparted and the extent of the erudition displayed is not less startling. In geography we discover that "the Andes are a range of mountains in Peru"; in history that "Anselm succeeded Lanfranc as archbishop"; in art that "Apelles was the most celebrated painter of antiquity"; in mythology that "Mars was the Roman god of war" and that "Juno was sister and wife of Jupiter." Then we have biographies of Brutus and Becket, of Nero and Nebuchadnezzar, of Cæsar and Charles the Bold, and, indeed, of any other human being, commonplace or obscure, famous or infamous, historical or mythical, the mention of whose name by Bacon afforded an excuse for netting him or her into this miraculous and motley draught; and so it goes on, almost ad infinitum, quite ad nauseam. Seriously, can Mr. West suppose that those who require instruction of this character are fit or likely to read Bacon's essays? For the rest, the Notes proper are well done and not overdone, and we have remarked in them very little with which to find fault. The exploded form "Publius Syrus," however, appears on p. 191 for "Publilius Syrus"; and on p. 197 Enclosures under the Statute of Merton are confused with those under the Enclosure Acts, which did not begin till the reign of Anne; while to refer readers (p. 232) to some thirty lines of Green's Short History of the English People "for an account of Elizabethan architecture" is clearly absurd.—Mr. R. L. A. Du Pontet contributes to the series of "British Classics for Schools" (Arnold) what strikes us as being the best educational edition of Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome in the field. One or two points only in the Notes call for comment. The King of France could not "elect" an Emperor (p. 165); the explanation of "mail" on p. 145 is inadequate and consequently misleading; the second reference to Livy on p. 156 should be xxii. 57; and there is an evident slip on p. 153, where "maniple" is put for "century."—Mr. E. K. Chambers's Samson Agonistes (Blackie) is, on the whole, a very respectable edition, and appropriate to the purpose it is intended to serve. Here and there in the Notes, though, there occur some strange misconceptions; for instance, a lion rampant in heraldry does not mean a lion springing (p. 83), the original meaning of "brigand" (p. 140) was not a "robber," and there is no book in the Bible entitled "The Revelations" (p. 77). Mr. Chambers's notions about armour, too, are curious. He describes the "vant-brace" or "vambrace" (p. 146) in such a way as to include the "rere-brace," although the correct derivation which he gives of the former phrase should have protected him against this error; he confuses the gauntlet (p. 141) with the mail-mitten; he states that the "brigandine" (p. 140) was a coat of mail, to which it bore not the slightest resemblance; and he lightly rules that the "habergeon" or curtailed hauberk (p. 141) was a breastplate, whereas experts have not yet agreed that the term was ever used in the latter strained sense. Technical terms are better left alone if they cannot be handled in a scholarly manner. —We have also before us several numbers of the Ancient Classics for English Readers (Blackwood). In the absence of any notice to the contrary, these presumably and apparently are verbatim reissues of the original series arrayed in what is supposed to be a more attractive exterior, and may therefore be described as old wine in new bottles. Books of this class, however, unlike wine, do not, as a rule, improve by age. No attempt seems to have been made to bring them up to date.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The Connoisseur. By Frederick S. Robinson. (Redway.)

IT needs, perhaps, a born writer, and not so much a member of the mob of gentlemen who write with ease, to be exceedingly interesting to all the world when holding forth upon the vagaries of collectors and upon the acquisition of objects of art. The Dean who could have written "beautifully about a broomstick" could have written agreeably—nay, even delightfully—at short notice about Hollar's etchings, drawings by Cavaletto, or Louis Quatorze furniture, although there is not the least reason to suppose that Jonathan Swift's knowledge of any of these things was more than very superficial. But the connoisseur is scarcely ever a born writer at all, and when he is, the instinct of the writer, his care for his own art, obliges the writer to dominate over the judge. Unless he is writing upon the particular art-subject which is his special fad—with one man it is Dutch pictures, with another exquisite Prints, and with another Porcelain and precious stones (since these become Art by virtue at least of their treatment by lapidary or jeweller)—he will regard strict accuracy as of less importance to the world than that no one of his sentences should be incomplete, or lacking in rhythm or in charm, or it may be even in humour, and so his essays will be agreeable literary exercises rather than very matter of fact handling of his nominal theme. Now for Mr. Frederick S. Robinson—a son of the well-known expert—there is this to be said: that his position is somewhat between that of charming writer and accomplished dry-as-dust. If his work is not a remarkable instance of literary craftsmanship, it is nevertheless done neatly, or, at the least, flowingly. He does not pretend to put before us an assemblage of undressed facts. He is fairly readable, at all times, and if some of his stories have seen the light before, he yet abounds in interesting anecdote—much of which he owes, doubtless, to his father—in relation to the business of collecting and the vicissitudes of precious things; and if his writing is never either very profound, on the one side, in its displays of accumulated knowledge, nor, on the other, very brilliant in its manipulation of our English tongue, yet is the work careful and creditable; and, if not the connoisseur, then, at least, the intelligent person dipping into a fresh subject, will find much that may entertain him to know and to remember in Mr. Frederick Robinson's handsome tome.

* * *
"TEMPLE DRAMATISTS."—Edward the Third. Edited by G. C. Moore Smith. (J. M. Dent & Co.)

Edward the Third is one of the half-dozen so-called "pseudo-Shakespearean" plays as to which a serious case for Shakespeare's authorship or part authorship can be made out. As a whole, it is a somewhat tedious and uninspired specimen of the historical drama. The first two acts, however, and especially those scenes which contain the famous Countess of Salisbury episodes, are in another vein; and here it is that divers critics have plumed themselves on recognising the hand of the master. Others, again, admitting the merit of the work, but not feeling quite sure about its resemblance to Shakespeare's, have preferred to assign it to some writer of considerable gifts otherwise unknown to us—some "one-playman"—in the terrible jargon affected by Dr. Furnivall. These opposing views, and the evidence for them, are excellently summed up in the careful and scholarly edition now before us, Mr. Moore Smith himself evidently inclining to the view of Capell, that the authorship is "conjecture only and matter of opinion, and the reader must form one for himself." With this, on the whole, we agree, though we doubt whether Mr. Smith has quite laid enough weight on the occurrence of a phrase and a line from the play in the 94th and 142nd of Shakespeare's Sonnets. Mr. Moore Smith thinks that they both fit the context better in the play than in the sonnets. We agree, as regards the line—"Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds"—not as regards the phrase, "scarlet ornaments," which in the play is applied to cheeks, in the sonnet, more appropriately, to lips. But is there any other instance in the Sonnets of Shakespeare cribbing a whole line from someone else's published play? And is it not an unlikely thing for a sonneteer to do? We suspect that the line was in Shakespeare's head, and that he used it twice at about the same time. In any case, as Edward the Third was entered on the Stationers' Registers in December, 1595, the parallel tells in favour of an early date for the sonnets.

* * *
The Counsels of William De Britaine. Edited by Herbert H. Sturmer. (F. E. Robinson.)

This book has been wrought upon long and carefully, but it is a strange product. Mr. Sturmer came upon the title Humane Prudence in a catalogue, and found that it belonged to a book on the conduct of life which appeared anonymously in 1680. He read the book, tracked it through twelve editions, and found out all that he could about it. That did not amount to much, for a somewhat tedious inquiry only leads Mr. Sturmer to suggest that William De Britaine may disguise the personality of John Davies, of Kidwelly (Carmarthenshire), a writer of sufficient note to have found a place in the Dictionary of National Biography. Mr. Sturmer's faith in his theory is so modest that he concludes the whole argument with the observation: "But I think that, whether 'De Britaine' was John Davies or not, his ideas are worthy of preservation." We doubt it. To begin with, the ideas were not so much De Britaine's as other people's. The book seems to belong to that school of ethical collections which had great vogue with our Puritan forefathers, and of which Penn's No Cross, No Crown was the best example. But whereas No Cross, No Crown, derivation though it was, had animation, this book has none. We should be loth to think that Mr. Sturmer's re-writing of it is responsible for this. We are willing to believe that the "hundreds of little alterations, transpositions, and excisions" which he has made have actually enlivened De Britaine's text. Yet turning over these pages we almost sigh for the "printer's errors," and the "extraordinary mélange of styles" of which Mr. Sturmer has so industriously purged the original.

Maxims, counsels, and moral reflections generally, need sauce of some kind. Either they must be beautifully logical and clean cut, or they must disclose a man. But these chapters on Study, Religion, Censure and Detraction, Passion, Riches, the Art of Being Happy, and what not, are to us unreadable. Even the obscure De Britaine admitted they were only a compilation, and having admitted it he cheerfully dispensed with quotation marks. Thus the De Britaine clay is varied with dulled if distinguishable passages of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius. To our rescue comes Mr. Sturmer with a fringe of notes that wanders along the bottom of the pages; but he only deepens our despair when he admits that some of the notes are introduced "in the hope of making the pages look less monotonous than they otherwise might do." We do not think that their monotony could be made less or greater than it is. The book may fulfil its special object of helping the serious "young man, coming of age, or leaving a public school."

* * *
Captain Cuellar's Adventures in Connacht and Ulster. By Hugh Allingham. (Elliot Stock.)

CAPTAIN CUELLAR was a Spanish officer on board the Armada. He was wrecked off the coast of Donegal, and after many "hair-breadth 'scapes" among the "savages," reached the fort of a rebel MacClancy clan, and there stood a siege by the Lord Deputy Fitzwilliam's troops. In the end he made his way to Scotland and so to Antwerp. From here he wrote to a Spanish friend a detailed and racy account of his adventures. This narrative has already been used for historical purposes by Captain Cesareo Duro in La Armada Invincible, and again by Froude in The Spanish Story of the Armada. Mr. Allingham now prints a new and careful translation by Mr. Robert Crawford, together with an elaborate essay of his own in which he discusses the geography of Cuellar's wanderings and various points of archaeological interest that arise in the course of his story. The little pamphlet, for it is no more, makes very entertaining reading. Captain Cuellar, though in rags and fearful for his life, was, like a true Spanish Caballero, not insensible to the charms of Irish eyes. He records, for the envy of his home-keeping friend, how he met many women hermosissimas por todo extremo, and how exceedingly kind they were to him. In other respects, too, he kept his eyes about him, and his observations tell us a good deal about the manners and customs of the "savage" Irish of the sixteenth century. It is curious to read that, "savage" as they were, many of them were able to discourse with strangers in Latin. This is what Cuellar says of their general mode of life:

"They live in huts made of straw. The men are all large bodied, and of handsome features and limbs; and as active as the roe-deer. They do not eat oftener than once a day, and that is at night; and that which they usually eat is butter with oaten bread. They drink sour milk, for they have no other drink; they don't drink water, although it is the best in the world. On feast days they eat some flesh half cooked, without bread or salt, as that is their custom. They clothe themselves, according to their habit, with tight trousers and short loose coats of very coarse goat's hair. They cover themselves with blankets, and wear their hair down to their eyes. They are great walkers, and inured to toil. . . . The most of the women are very beautiful, but badly got up. They do not wear more than a chemise and a blanket with which they cover themselves, and a linen cloth, much doubled, over the head and tied in front. They are great workers and house-keepers, after their fashion."

In the introductory essay, Mr. Allingham, who has an intimate knowledge of the locality, patiently tracks Cuellar's route, and corrects some errors of Froude and others. He adds some interesting remarks upon the nature of the iron treasure-chests which are so often exhibited as relics of the Armada. These appear to have been freely in use over the whole of Europe during the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries, and many of them had probably reached both England and Ireland in the ordinary course of trade long before the Armada came. Others, however, have been recovered from wrecked ships, and are therefore genuine trophies of the great victory.

* * *

Notes on the Painted Glass in Canterbury Cathedral. With a Preface by the Very Rev. F. W. Farrar, D.D. (Aberdeen: University Press.)

THE Dean's preface to this little anonymous book misquotes Milton, but justly points out the worth of such a monograph. The aim of the writer is "to give some account of the changes which have taken place in the arrangement of the old painted glass, and to keep a distinct record of modern additions." Her object has been achieved, though not, perhaps, in the clearest manner. There are signs of carelessness in the text, as where we are referred to a non-existent foot-note (p. 50), or where the North Transept of the choir is called the South Transept (p. 3). Again, the naming and numbering of the twenty-seven plates might with advantage have been connected directly with the plans of the windows given by the author, and with her descriptions of them, rather than with her list of the plates themselves. But these are small, if irritating mistakes, which will doubtless be rectified in a future issue. In the meantime the Canterbury Pilgrim who desires to understand the Cathedral glass and its pious histories will find the "Notes" of great value. The Pilgrim who is also a humorist will be grateful for the reprint of amazing Culmer's account of the destruction of "proud Becket's glassy bones," which were joyously rattled down out of their place, where the "prime Cathedral saint-Arch-Bishop" was "most rarely pictured—in full proportion, with cope, Rochet, miter, Crosier, and all his Pontificalibus."

* * *

The Victorian Era in South Africa. By H. A. Bryden. (African Critic Office.)

ALL through the prolonged crisis of the past two years there has been great need of a handy and compendious history of South Africa, giving in small compass the outlines of what has gone on since the beginning of the century. Mr. Bryden has undertaken to fill that want, and though his sketch of South African history really starts with the Queen's accession, it is quite sufficient, for there is nothing in the present situation which cannot be explained by a reference to the history of the past sixty years. In 1837 only the Cape Colony, which then occupied the extreme south of Africa, was a British possession, and north of it was an uninhabited wilderness tenanted chiefly by vast legions of game and by lions. The great trek of the Boers to the north took place just at the time the Queen came to the throne, and with that anti-British movement the politics which culminated in the present crisis may be said to have had their rise. Mr. Bryden summarises the period in ninety easily read pages, and in addition to giving the bare outline of facts, shortly indicates the tendency of each successive movement and its ultimate bearing on the present situation. This he does with great impartiality, saying all he can—many people will think too much—in favour of the Boers, though he evidently is no great admirer of the race. There are some sad stories of Colonial Office ineptitude and ingratitude in the little book, but it is just what the newspaper reader needs to enable him to get a just appreciation of questions of the day. Two portraits of the Queen, in 1837 and in 1897, are frontispieces to the volume, the value of which is increased by maps of South Africa in the same years, and by a very useful little index.

THE BOOK MARKET.

"IN REPLY."

THAT everyone is out of town is almost the only fact to be chronicled in the book trade. Still The Christian and Prince Ranjitsinhji's book must be selling somewhere, and must also have been subjects of much remark among booksellers. It occurred to me to write three or four letters to as many booksellers asking for reports on the only matters on which I could trouble them with inquiries with any show of reason. Two large London booksellers, who, I trust, have enjoyed their holidays or are on the brink of doing so, have replied as follows. The first, writing from the West End, says:

"The two leading books of the week have, undoubtedly, been The Christian and Prince Ranjitsinhji's Jubilee Book of Cricket. Considering it is the dull season, and a large number of our customers are out of town, we have done remarkably well with both books. The fact, however, that the former work has appeared in the Windsor Magazine has militated against its sale in book form. The many criticisms, pro and con, upon the work will tend to promote its sale. Ranjitsinhji's Cricket is so full of interest to all lovers of the game that it will continue to sell well for some time. The édition de luxe does credit to its publishers, and will shortly become a scarce book. One other work, The Choir Invisible, is selling well."

My second correspondent, whose report refers to more central London, writes:

"The publication of Ranjitsinhji's Jubilee Book of Cricket and Hall Caine's The Christian in August has been a great help to the book trade, the 6s. edition of the former having been sold out by the publishers in three days. We have had the mortification of sending customers away, as a fresh supply is not yet forthcoming, the publishers apparently experiencing considerable difficulty in coping with the enormous demand. On the other hand, we hear that 50,000 copies have already been printed of The Christian. The get-up of the Prince's cricket-book (6s. edition) is disappointing, many of the illustrations being anything but good, the page is ugly and the margins are very small. There are, however, two éditions de luxe, on larger paper, both of which are well done, though rather too thick and heavy."

"The persistent booming of The Christian before publication has had a distinct effect on the demand, which far exceeds that for the Manxman."

"The leading writers of fiction are still keeping up their popularity and making many new friends among the holiday-seekers. Among books more especially in demand we notice the following:

"The Chevalier d'Auriac. By S. Levett Yeats.

"An African Millionaire. By Grant Allen.

"Dracula. By Bram Stoker.

"Mr. W. H. Jacobs' Many Cargoes continues to sell well; perhaps its stories of coasting life appeal to the seaside visitor. Captain Mahan's books are also selling well now. We may look forward to a very full and busy publishing season, so many books having been held over from the spring. Trade generally is quiet, but holiday literature is going strong."

Our Brighton correspondent writes:

"Prince Ranjitsinhji's Jubilee Book of Cricket has had a very large sale in Brighton, especially the 25s. fine paper and the popular 6s., this fact being perhaps due to the fact that one of the collaborators to the volume is attached to the staff of the leading bookseller in Brighton and Hove."

"Mr. Hall Caine's Christian is having a fairly good run among our literary subscribers, but the consensus of opinion appears to be that the production is not up to the previous standard of Mr. Hall Caine's books."

"Guide-books (English and Foreign) still enjoy a steady sale. Other sales dull in the extreme."

The expectation of a big publishing season is general; and by the end of next week there should not be wanting signs of its definite beginning.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

An Altruist. By Ouida.
(T. Fisher Unwin.)

Ouida's new book is not precisely a novel, for it is almost entirely a discussion of socialistic opinions, nor is it a pamphlet, for it does not advocate any view; perhaps, on the whole, it is less unlike one of "Gyp's" sketches of social life than anything else. At all events, it is exceedingly different from the author's usual work, yet exceedingly characteristic in its attempt to reconcile her sympathy for all noble aspirations with her settled conviction that well-bred people ought to have an ornamental setting. The story is briefly this. Wilfrid Bertram, a young gentleman who is first cousin, nephew, or godson to most of the peerage, has acquired communistic theories which he propounds in print to the world and orally to such of his relatives as will listen to him. Naturally the relatives scoff or get angry according to their various temperaments, but unanimously disapprove. Bertram, however, has concealed the worst blow that is in store for them. He proposes to contract marriage with a young person of blameless character, whose mother, Mrs. Brown, is a thriving laundress. The marriage is to be the result of principle, not of inclination. The crisis begins when Lord Marlowe, one of the most unbridled scoffers, discovers Bertram à tête-à-tête with his fiancée, and by injurious comments goads the Socialist into an avowal of his purpose. In the same morning an anarchist orator is arrested in Hyde Park for being drunk and disorderly. Bertram goes to assure the constable of his personal knowledge that the man is a total abstainer. Unfortunately, however, facts are against that view. He returns sadly home, only to find his valet, whom he esteemed so highly that contrary to all socialistic principles he retained his services, engaged in pillaging his jewel-case. On the top of these agreeable experiences, in comes a lawyer with the announcement that a little-known Italian cousin has just died leaving Bertram heir to an immense property in England and Italy. This is the last straw, and a heavy one. "Sir," says the aggrieved Socialist, "do you mean to insult me?" Fortunately, however, there is an acceptable alternative. In the event of Bertram's failure to accept the inheritance, it goes to Magdalen College, Oxford; and this is an arrangement which the philosopher can contemplate with equanimity. Accordingly, to the consternation of his friends and relatives, he refuses to have riches thrust upon him. Luckily for him, Miss Annie Brown, for motives highly creditable to her head and heart, releases him from his engagement; and Miss Cicely Richards, a charming young lady of his own class, who throughout has administered the most violent snubs to all scoffers, definitively approves his decision. Then in the last scene of the small volume comes the happy termination. A letter appears, written by the Italian cousin on his death-bed, in which that gentleman explains that, being himself cut off in the unrepentant bloom of his wickedness, he is nevertheless conscious that he is wicked; he has read Bertram's paper, The Age to Come, admired (platonically) its principles, and therefore bequeathes his property to a man who will do his duty by the tenantry. What is Bertram to do—stand by his refusal and let Magdalen profit, or go back on it and take up the duty to be done? He appeals to Miss Cicely: she decides for respecting the dead man's wishes, and as the lawyers have not yet acted on Bertram's refusal, the matter is easily settled, and we are given to understand that the pretty young lady will help the earnest young man. So no principles are compromised, no incongruous marriage is made, and the young gentleman remains in his native station as dispenser to the poor of this world's blessings.

Let it be granted that in real life things do not, as a rule, fall out so conveniently; granted, also, that Wilfrid Bertram is the most rabid type of prig, ignorant and conceited; and granted, finally, that the book, with a great appearance of argument, proves absolutely nothing. Nevertheless, it is never dull, and there are a good many things in it that show a true knowledge of the world. Mrs. Brown, Annie's mother, is a purely theatrical type; it would be hard to invent anything more wildly improbable than the scene in which she begins a discussion with Lady Jane Rivaux and the sympathetic Cicely in Hyde Park, and breaks it off to advertise her own business and solicit custom. "Mrs. Brown," says Cicely; "ah, that rare name! you must certainly be the mother of Annie." But, conventional as she is with her Adelphi dialect, Mrs. Brown has some very good lines to speak. She has been asked to advise Bertram on the dilemma—to accept or reject the inheritance. "Take it," she says.

"Mrs. Brown," says Bertram, "your daughter would not say so."
'Likely not, sir. She's a slim snippet of a girl as haven't felt any of the weight o' livin' yet. When she hev, she'll know that a full money-box is the softest pillar one can lay a tired head on any night.'"

And here is a dialogue between Annie and her betrothed, in which it will be seen that Annie talks very shrewd sense; what Bertram says is no more a caricature than the rest of his utterances:

"Oh, why do you want love? It is something so vulgar, so unspiritual, so indicative of an unoccupied mind! I have the highest respect for you, which I am about to prove in the strongest manner that any man can from his sentiments."

'Yes, I know, sir; but—but—'

'But there are finer sentiments than love!'

'Perhaps there are, sir, for the gentry. But love's poor people's feast; the only one they ever knows all their days. And—you—don't love me?'

It is a pity that Ouida thought it necessary to make Bertram such an incredible prig; but it is quite sound to emphasise the truth that a prig may be heroic on occasion—in defence of his priggishness. The defect of overcharging all effects seems incurable with this lady, and that is easily understood; but I am amazed that such an experience of authorship should not have convinced her that accuracy in small points is desirable. Au bout des lèvres is very odd French. "As for taxation, it is the arc of Toryism," is a strange looking sentence. "Lubies" is not an English word, though printed as one. Max Nardau is unfamiliar. Lord Southwold (who, by the way, is very well sketched) is described as a "choleraic, but amiable person." This gentleman wore for a watch-chain his "poor old Hector's steel collar. How he'd thresh out five acres of turnips before luncheon." Surely to work through one turnip field of such reasonable dimensions before even the earliest lunch is no great achievement for the most elderly pointer. However, in these matters Ouida is incorrigible; and she is always readable, though An Altruist is by no means equal, for instance, to The Massareenes.

* * * * *
The Octave of Claudius. By Barry Pain.
(Harper & Brothers.)

By those who like Mr. Pain's work, this, his first long story, has been waited with some eagerness. He has proved himself, during the years in which he has been writing, the possessor of much fancy and invention, unusual readiness, a whimsical and humorous point of view, and a style always crisp and clear and often distinguished. Hitherto he has not publicly attempted anything but fantastic tales and comic or satirical sketches. In The Octave of Claudius, his first novel, Mr. Pain has not, I think, succeeded. At the outset the reader is led to expect two things—a mystery, and minute humorous social observation; and in the end he comes short of both. The mystery is averted by a catastrophe; the human nature is never deeply studied. The book, in fact, never quite makes up its mind what it will be—a fatal fault.

Here are the first four sentences:

"Mrs. Wycherly was not quite old. She seemed always to be keeping one foot on the tail of her youth; the poor thing squeaked, but could not quite break away. In her conversation she would often drag you, all tremulous, with her into the confessional, where you found to your disappointment that she had no sins, only errors of diet. She was by way of being a woman of the world, with the world left out."

It is as well, perhaps, that such a tension is not sustained throughout the three hundred pages that follow, but here, surely, the author implies a promise that ought to be kept. A first page should give some kind of keynote to a book; yet once Mr. Pain has passed the threshold he practically takes leave of epigram; Mrs. Wycherley becomes nothing, a mere shadow, unworthy of this prominence, an obstacle between the reader and Claudius; and social observation gives place to melodrama and mystery. With the introduction of Claudius the story, as story, begins, and Mr. Pain warmly attacks his task. Claudius is a young gentleman weary of life, who is picked up by Dr. Gabriel Lamb, a fanatic vivisectionist, in a London suburb; nursed back into health by him; and finally bought, body and soul, for a dark and terrible experiment in exchange for eight thousand pounds and eight days to spend it in. Mr. Pain's avowed theme is the story of those eight days—that octave; but he has made Dr. Gabriel Lamb so intensely mysterious that his most admiring readers will look upon this interval only with impatience. As on the night of Claudius's return to Dr. Lamb, the night preceding the great experiment, the doctor is murdered by his wife, the story, to all who are interested in the mystery rather than the intervening eight days—which is to say, to forty-nine out of every fifty readers that it gains—closes as a "sell," a variant of The Lady or the Tiger. I view it in this way myself. I feel that I have been Mr. Pain's victim; although at the same time I believe him honestly to have meant to put his strength into the account of the eight days.

None the less, even if there were not this irritating anxiety to get through that period, the book would not attract me. Mr. Pain has not enough interest—to use an idiomatic phrase, he is not "keen enough" on people—to make a good novelist. His point of view is too whimsical, too humorous: he has too little sympathy; he needs to be more intent and serious. There is excellent writing in the book, but one never forgets that it is the result of artifice. One is not convinced. It is not made clear to me that Claudius would sell himself to Dr. Lamb. Mr. Pain alleges it, but he does not prove it. Nor has Angela the breath of life. Burnage is a clever study, although too much space is given to him. The triumph of the book is Dr. Gabriel Lamb, who, though he reminds me alternately of The New Arabian Nights and the scientific stories of Mr. Wells, has yet an individual being. Here is a scrap of one of his conversations with Claudius, preparatory to the offer concerning the great experiment:

"Ah, Sandell, it is well enough that we should look backward—from man to the anthropoid ape, from the ape to the original bird or reptile; but to look forward is better. We are not at the end yet. I see—yes, in my mind's eye, I actually see—this new humanity. It walks erect, cringing to no mystery. It holds the keys of life or death—of heaven and hell. It is the master of its fate, makes its character, moulds its physique, has just what intellect it wills. And all that may happen if I will tell it, as I hope to tell it, some two or three things."

I strongly advise Mr. Pain to leave pictures of middle-class society to others, and confine himself to fantasy, grim or comic. He has rare gifts in that direction.

* * * * *

By Stroke of Sword. By Andrew Balfour.
(Methuen & Co.)

It would be fair, perhaps, to begin with Mr. Balfour's full title: By Stroke of Sword; a Romance taken from the Chronicles of Sir Jeremy Clephane, King's Justice and Knight of the Shire of Fife; Overlooked by Master Judas Fraser, Dominie of the Parish of Kirkcoun, and Rendered into a More Modern English by Andrew Balfour. To those who are initiated there is rich promise in such an opening; a promise well supported by the table of contents. It is not, however, immediately fulfilled, for the two first paragraphs of the story (which is a matter of over three hundred pages, of five hundred words apiece) run thus:

"It seems strange to me, Jeremy Clephane, that at such an age as it hath pleased God that I should reach—and He knows it is not a small one—I should take upon me to set on paper those strange wanderings, and yet stranger escapades, which have fallen to my lot.

I say that it passes my comprehension that it should be so, and would, without doubt, have passed that of many I once knew, though truly but few of them had much at the best, but as it happens they have one and all gone to their own place, albeit many a one of them hath wagered with me that I should go before him; but whither am I wandering?"

Dull books have begun after the same long-winded fashion; and "How on earth can I have patience to read a book written like this?" says the reader to himself, feeling that were it not for the table of contents and a certain business-like air which the volume wears he would be for laying it aside and turning again to Lorna Doone for the genuine article. Such, I will admit, was my own attitude. But, instead, I skipped a page or so and came to Chapter II.—"Of the strange man who dwelt upon the shore"—and after that all was well. Singularly well, indeed. Mr. Balfour's romance is a banquet of good things: he knows all the favourite dishes of the lover of boys' stories, and he has included a sufficiency of each. We have the man of enormous strength, continually in peril and always extricating himself by cunning, wit, and "De Cusac's wrist-stroke"; we have land fights and sea fights; we have piracy and Papist plot; we have Dons and hidden treasure; we have rough jests and rude snatches of song; and there is also the inevitable maiden—beautiful Marjorie Bethune—but very wisely Mr. Balfour admits her only at the beginning and end of the book, and though the hero of course weds her they nobly abstain from caresses in public. In short, it is not too much to call By Stroke of Sword the best book to give boys that has been written since King Solomon's Mines. Thackeray is said always to have offered the same delicacy—apricot tart—to boys who lunched with him. I can recommend By Stroke of Sword to all hesitating fathers and uncles as quite as safe a rule in presents. It is certainly gory enough, but blood shed three centuries ago in a good cause can harm no one. This is the kind of thing:

"With bill and hanger, pistol, pike and rapier, crew fought crew, till the red blood ran in streams in the scuppers, and a pile of dead lay upon the deck, while oaths and curses, yells and groans filled the air, and once more the round shot from the galleon came crashing aboard, striking down Englishmen and Spaniards alike. Good luck! within five minutes' time I had slain three men and come within an ace of being killed, while I was stained with blood and wounded on the head by a splinter. I saw Simon hurl a don fairly overboard, and heard old Hocus shouting his war-cry."

Mr. Balfour's period is the reign of Good Queen Bess, who, indeed, figures in the book, as also does Sir Francis Drake. To write about such a time without the plentiful slaughter of Spaniards would be a disgrace.

What is lacking to the story is a coherent plot and any definite progress towards an end; but in the eyes of boys these faults will be atoned for by the profusion of exciting adventures. The printers, by the way, should have been more careful about quotation marks.

* * * * *

The Tombstone Treasure. By Fergus Hume.
(Jarrold & Sons).

If anyone ought to write a good detective story it should be Mr. Fergus Hume. There are, I know, people who shoot out their lips at The Mystery of a Hansom Cab. But it was a mystery; and that's the point. Mr. Fergus Hume, to be quite frank, has no more style than a bill-broker. But the mystery of that murder in the cab held you from start to finish, if you had any of the elementary emotions left in your nineteenth-century soul—because the author knew how to build a plot. Now you may have noticed that many men, so soon as they have discovered that they can do one thing well, instantly set to work on the attempt to do something quite different. Wherefore Mr. Fergus Hume, having discovered that he can write a story which will float a publishing company on its plot, insists upon writing stories which would sink a syndicate in its style. The Tombstone Treasure is a Georgian story, and is concerned with a sum of money reported to have been hidden by "Wild Ralph" who died in sixteen hundred and something. The clue to the hiding-place lies in Wild Ralph's epitaph, which runs:

"Here lyeth one who from hys birth
Numbered y<sup>n</sup> yeeres but VI. of VII.,
Monies hee hadd not when on earth,
But layed up al hys spoiles y<sup>n</sup> aire."

From this the wicked French Marquis, the melancholy Oswald (who descends from Ralph, and has no prospect of making a decent living unless he solves the riddle), and the sprightly Lady Sue try to find their way to the treasure. You know who found it. You would yourself find the way from the tombstone in the churchyard to the hidden treasure before you got halfway through the book. And that is my grievance against Mr. Fergus Hume. I know that the man who shouts "encore" is both ungrammatical and unfair, and that a man who writes one good story is not necessarily capable of writing another equally good and entirely different. But if Mr. Fergus Hume will sit down quietly and dovetail another plot as complicated and mysterious as the hansom-cab murder, and make a book of it, I will buy the book and not worry about discount.

* * * * *
The Eye of Istar. By William Le Queux.
(F. V. White & Co.)

Mr. Le Queux, in his latest story of African adventure, has found a way out of the great difficulty which besets writers of his class. Instead of making his hero one of those adventurous Englishmen whose characters are becoming increasingly difficult to differentiate from the host of previous heroes of fiction of the same type, Mr. Le Queux chooses for his principal character a Mohammedan. This, with the scene of his story—Central Africa, from the Soudan to the Niger—gives opportunities for unlimited "local colour," of which the author avails himself somewhat to excess. The Eye of Istar is, probably, not intended for adult readers. It is of the school of Mr. Haggard's She, and is crammed with hazardous adventures. I do not think it a particularly good specimen of its class.

AN OLD "PROPERTY" OF FICTION.

THE BULL, THE GIRL, AND THE RED SHAWL.

THE following amusing study of one of the most venerable of the novelist's "incidents" appears in the New York Critic above the signature of Mr. Charles B. Loomis:

"There is no incident in all the realms of literature, from the 'penny dreadful' up to the three-volume novel, that has afforded so much material for the pen of the writer of fiction as the delightful episode of the bull, the young girl with the red shawl, and the young girl's lover. Sometimes the cast includes the lover's hated rival, but the story may be told without using him.

It is thirty-odd years since I first came across this thrilling adventure in the pages of a child's book, very popular at the time. How well I remember how my young blood—to be exact, my seven-year-old blood—thrilled as I mentally watched this frail girl, with a start of just three feet, lead the tremendous and horribly savage bull in a three-hundred-yard sprint, only to trip at last on the only obstruction in the ten-acre field; how, just as the bull reached her, she flung her red shawl a few rods to the right; how, the bull, leaving her, plunged after it; how she, weak and trembling, ran to the stone wall and managed to vault it just as her lover, a brawny blacksmith, who had seen the whole affair at too great a distance to be of immediate service, reached the wall and received her in his arms. 'Oh, Kenston,' she murmured, 'you have saved my life!' and then she fainted—and I believe the bull ate up the shawl. At any rate, its part in that particular story was ended.

I have always felt that, thrilling as this scene was, it had not been worked for all it was worth; but an extensive reading since then has brought me to the conclusion that, first and last, it has been worked for its full value.

The next time that I read the enthralling narrative, I was some years older, but the memory of the other telling was still fresh within me; and so, when, in the second chapter, I read about a savage old bull, one Hector, the property of Squire Flint, the meanest man in the county—not that his meanness had anything to do with the story, but it is one of the conventions that a savage

SELECTED NOVELS

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

Each Work complete in One Volume, crown 8vo, 6s.

UNCLE BERNAC: a Memory of the Empire. By A. CONAN DOYLE. With 8 Full-page Illustrations.

RODNEY STONE. By A. CONAN DOYLE. With 8 Full-page Illustrations.

THE WHITE COMPANY. By A. CONAN DOYLE. Eighteenth Edition.

CLEG KELLY, Arab of the City. By S. R. CROCKETT, Author of "The Raiders," &c. Thirty-second Thousand.

THE SOWERS. By Henry SETON MERRIMAN, Author of "With Edged Tools," &c. Fifteenth Edition.

THE WAYS OF LIFE. Two

Stories: 1. MR. SANDFORD. 2. THE WONDERFUL HISTORY OF MR. ROBERT DALYELL. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. With a Preface entitled "On the Ebb T.de."

THE LADY GRANGE. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND.

SIR GEORGE TRESSADY. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. Third Edition.

MARCELLA. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. Sixteenth Edition.

CAPTAIN CASTLE: a Tale of the China Seas. By CARLTON DAWK. With a Frontispiece.

CHEAP EDITIONS OF STANDARD WORKS.

Handy Volumes, printed in clear bold type, on good paper.
Each Work complete in One Volume.

Fcap. 8vo, picture boards, 2s. each; or limp red cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN. With Edged Tools. From One Generation to Another.

By the Author of "MOLLY BAWN." Molly Bawn. Phillis. Rosemoynne. Mrs. Geoffrey. Portia. Doris. Airy Fairy Lillian. Lady Brankmere. Beauty's Daughters. Loys, Lord Beresford, and Other Tales. Green Pleasure and Grey Grief. Faith and Unfaith. Undercurrents.

By GEORGE GISSING. Demos: a Story of Socialist Life in England. A Life's Morning. Thyrsa. The Nether World. New Grub Street.

By the Author of "MEHALAH." Mehalah: a Story of the Salt Marshes. Court Royal. The Gaverocks. John Herring. Richard Cable.

By W. E. NORRIS. Heaps of Money. Mademoiselle de Matrimony. Mercac. Adrian Vidal. No New Thing.

By HAMILTON AIDE. In That State of Life. Mr. and Mrs. Faulconbridge. Penruddocks. Morals and Mysteries.

By the Author of "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN." Romantic Tales. Domestic Stories.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

NOVELS TO BE READ.

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

BY F. MARION CRAWFORD.
Sixth Thousand.

A ROSE OF YESTERDAY.

OBSERVER.—"Mr. Crawford has built up a story which for true pathos and delicate sentiment is as good as anything we have read for some time."

GLOBE.—"A piece of refined workmanship, fresh from the hands of an artist..... 'A Rose of Yesterday' is one which will retain its full measure of fragrance and charm."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.
Ninth Thousand.

TAQUISARA By F. Marion Crawford.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Cannot fail to be read with interest and pleasure by all to whom c'ever characterisation and delicate drawing make appeal."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ROBBERY UNDER ARMS."
Seventh Thousand.

MY RUN HOME. By Rolf Boldrewood.

ATHENÆUM.—"Rolf Boldrewood's last story is a racy volume. It has many of the best qualities of Whyte Melville, the breezy freshness and vigour of Frank Smolley, with the dash and something of the abandon of Lever..... His last volume is one of his best."

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.—New Volume.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock" Edition, gilt sides, back and edges, 5s.

THE PIRATE and the THREE CUTTERS. By

Captain MARRYAT. With Illustrations by EDMUND J. SULLIVAN, and an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, LONDON.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

bull shall be owned by a cross, crabbed, and thoroughly stingy man—I say, when I had read thus far, my pulse quickened. Inexperienced as I was, I somehow sensed the coming situation. I seemed to know as by clairvoyance that, however limited the heroine's wardrobe might be in some respects, there was one article of apparel that she surely possessed, or would possess, in time to meet the exigencies. True enough, in the very next chapter, her maiden aunt, a saintly old lady of ninety, died and bequeathed to her sorrowing niece a red pongee shawl of great value—as a bull-enrager. The book had seemed prosy at the start, but now that I knew what was coming, and that it was that that was coming, I read on breathlessly.

Needless to say that, in the next chapter, the young girl fell in love with a strapping young fellow, who immediately proposed—that they take a walk. How well I knew, though they did not, where that walk would lead them. The mad bull—in this case it was mad, although any old bull will do, mad or not—was rampant in a lot, a mile south of the young girl's house, and they started to walk due north; but I knew full well that they would need to cross that particular pasture before they got home; and a few pages later found them climbing over the stone wall into the bull's domain, and then they walked along, intent only on their new-found happiness. The day was chilly (in the middle of a particularly hot July), so that the girl could have an excuse to wear her red shawl. Now, having brought two of the actors on the stage, the cue was soon given to the bull, and in a moment the happy lovers, feeling the ground tremble beneath their feet, turned and saw Hector, his horns gyrating with rage, his eyes bulging out, and his head lowered as he thundered along, straight for the pongee bequest. To take her under his strong arm and to rush forward were the only things for the young man to do, and he did them; and then, the rest ran as per schedule. I believe that in this case the young man threw the girl into a tree and then plunged down a woodchuck's hole. At any rate, the girl was unharmed. That is the one unalterable formula in constructing these bull stories: save the girl unharmed. You may break the young man's leg or arm, and you may do what you will with the bull, but the young girl must come through unscathed.

It was years before this "moving incident" ceased to hold me, and in that time how many changes were rung on it. Once only was the red shawl absent, and I wondered how in the world the bull was to be infuriated, as he was a singularly mild beast in the earlier chapters and on May Days had been festooned with garlands. Then, too, the girl was in deep mourning—for her lover! But the ten-acre lot was all right, and as the author was a clever man, I felt that he would find a way to run the act with a small cast and no properties. So I read on, and after wondering, together with the girl herself, what could have caused the peaceful old bovine to chase her, tail up and head down, the full length of a particularly long pasture, she and I found out, when she realised, that, the day being sunny, she had picked up her cousin's parasol, which was, necessarily, of a brilliant scarlet. She had no lover, for, as I say, he had died—two chapters before the book was begun; but she did have presence of mind, and so she inserted the point of the parasol in the bull's mouth and then opened it, and while he was extracting it with his forepaws, she reached the fence and vaulted it in the usual way.

The possibilities of the incident are by no means exhausted, and so far from 'Amos Judd' being the last story in which it was used, I saw it in a tale published this month; and this time with the full paraphernalia of hated rival, lover, red shawl, and all; but for me it had lost its zest. To be sure, if they would make the hero an athlete and have him bravely stand his ground, while the girl climbed to the top of an enormous elm, and then, just as the bull lowered his head to toss him, have the hero jump high in the air and make the bull pass beneath him, and as he reached ground again, seize the bull, not by the horns, but by the tail, and, swinging it three times around his head, dash it against a tree and stun it—that is, if its tail were securely welded to its body—there would be an original treatment of the subject. And if its tail were but loosely fixed to it, the hero could pull it out, and the bull, filled with chagrin, would walk off dismayed and humiliated.

But pending that form of the story, I am studiously avoiding all novels that contain heroines with red shawls, or that make early reference to fierce bulls, or that speak of a certain ten-acre lot, peculiarly adapted for lovers' peregrinations."

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 1.

The teeth are not cleaned healthfully and properly by attending merely to the part that you can see. Almost anything will keep that right—even plain water. It is the spaces between the teeth that gather stray pieces of food, which decompose and inevitably lead to tooth-ache and destruction of the teeth by decay.

Only one thing in the world properly cleanses the spaces between the teeth, and that is SOZODONT, the fragrant liquid dentifrice.

It is so important to health to have, and keep, sound teeth, and so great a personal attraction to have a sweet, clean breath, that it seems a small matter to be punctual in the use of SOZODONT, which is sold everywhere (in neat Toilet Case) at 2/6. No one who, having a sound set of teeth, uses SOZODONT regularly has ever had the tooth-ache or lost a tooth by decay.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

Mends Everything.

LE PAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co., Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co., and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition, London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use.

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber, Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums, Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers'

Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron.

Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s.; Pints, 3s.; and Quarts, 4s. 6d. each; and in bottles for family use at 6d. and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order. Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1897.

No. 1320, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Office: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

THE advantages of education and of that culture which Matthew Arnold wished might become more and more widespread are not admitted by everybody. They are not admitted by Mr. Nicholas Christian, who has written a book which he describes as "A Study in the Real Decadence," and entitles That Tree of Eden. Mr. Christian deplors the physical degeneration which he believes to be the accompaniment of popular education, and still more the decline of religious faith, for which he considers education a vain substitute. In an "Apologia," the author writes:

"Our position is that education en masse, and by forced marches, spells disaster, not so much in the immediate present as to succeeding generations. In every generation there is so much force stored up. . . . Nature sternly insists that this force shall not be impaired. If it be impaired by vice or hard conditions of life, or any similar causes acting on the great scale, the race dwindles, becomes weak, falls into the condition of hewers of wood and drawers of water for stronger and more virile races. Force upon any individual, or any number of individuals, conditions under which the physical basis is not allowed fair play, and you will look for many generations of that individual, or group of individuals, in vain. Under the strain of cultivation and culture, in conditions far above any possible average that could be attained in the most favoured Utopia, we see the higher strata of our existing society continually dying out, being renewed from the unexhausted humanity below. Raise all the individuals in that unexhausted reservoir to a similar state of culture, and your race will collapse as if smitten with the pestilence."

Concerning religion, Mr. Christian writes:

"Catastrophe always has fallen on a nation that has lost the spirit of worship, the inner and subtle significance of religion. For, truth to tell, religion is the one thing which gives us the sense of proportion in the life we lead, which restrains us from projecting forward our own obscure and ridiculous personality until it shuts out the vision of all other and more beautiful objects."

Books about Shakespeare—so they be sincere—have a kind of prescriptive welcome. The latest, Shakespeare, Puritan and Recusant, has been written by the Rev. T. Carter to prove that John Shakespeare, of Stratford-on-Avon, was not only no Papist, but so advanced a Protestant as to deserve the name of Puritan. The book has an introduction by the Rev. Principal J. O. Dykes, who writes:

"If Mr. Carter's reading of the elder Shakespeare's life can be justified, the poet was, at all events, reared in a 'Puritan' home. The presumption which would thence arise—that the aims of the advanced Protestants, as they commanded the sympathy of Shakespeare's earlier contemporary, Edmund Spenser, and claimed the powerful pen of his younger contemporary, John Milton; so they retained a hold on the mature intelligence of a greater than either—is one which there is little or nothing that I know of in his writings to outweigh. . . . Those who recognise in the advanced Protestants or early Puritans under the Tudors the men who in their day embraced most faithfully the ideas of a new era—the men of freest thought and keenest sympathy with pure and true religion—will find the suggestion no less natural than welcome 'that William Shakespeare was the child of a Puritan and Bible-loving home.'"

American explorations in the East in the interests of archaeology are watched in this country by only a limited and a learned public. But the volumes in which Mr. John Punnett Peters has begun to narrate the adventures of the University of Pennsylvania expedition to Babylonia in the years 1888-1890 may hope for wider recognition. The work, of which the first volume is before us, is well supplied with illustrations and maps. A second volume will follow, each bearing the title of Nippur. Before the explorations here detailed Nippur was scarcely known except as having been an important place in Babylonia. But, says Mr. Peters:

"We found that Nippur was a great and flourishing city, and its temple, the temple of Bel, the religious centre of the dominant people of the world at a period as much prior to the time of Abraham as the time of Abraham is prior to our day. We discovered written records no less than 6,000 years old, and proved that writing and civilisation were then by no means in their infancy. Further than that, our explorations have shown that Nippur possessed a history extending backward of the earliest written documents found by us, at least 2,000 years."

A seventh edition of Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons' Authors and Publishers, rewritten, and with additional material, reaches us. The first edition of this manual appeared in 1883. Questions affecting the relations of authors and publishers have, perhaps, lost something of their acuteness since then, but on the authors and publishers are more numerous than ever. It is still true, as is pointed out by the editors of this work, that

"there seems to be some special fascination for a considerable proportion of the community in matters connected with the production of literature, and even with the methods of the manufacture and distribution of books; and the large measure of interest shown by successive generations in the reminiscences of authors, and in the details of their work, indicates that the quidquid agunt scriptores is felt to possess a greater general importance than attaches to the doings of workers in other divisions of human activity."

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

ART, POETRY, DRAMA, BELLES LETTRES.

SAUL, A TRAGEDY, AND OTHER POEMS. Vol. II. By Paul John. Mowbray & Co. (Oxford).

SELECTIONS FROM THE POEMS OF TIMOTHY OTIS FAINE. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

REALISM AND ROMANCE, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By the late Henry Macarthur. R. W. Hunter (Edinburgh).

SCIENCE.

ELEMENTS OF THE COMPARATIVE ANATOMY OF VERTEBRATES. Adapted from the German of Dr. Robert Wiedersheim by W. N. Parker, Ph.D. Second Edition. Macmillan & Co. 12s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY.

CITIZEN BIRD: SCENES FROM BIRD-LIFE IN PLAIN ENGLISH FOR BEGINNERS. By Mabel Osgood Wright and Elliott Conner. The Macmillan Co. 6s.

FICTION.

ONE HEART ONE WAY. By W. Rousbeck Storer. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

WHERE THE SURF BREAKS. By Mary F. A. Tench. Hurst & Blackett. 6s.

'Twas IN DEROLL DONEGAL. By Mac. Downey & Co. DOWNEY'S SIXPENNY LIBRARY: MR. MIDSHIPMAN EAST; ESMOND; BAIL; FRANKENSTEIN; THE O'DONOGHUE; OLIVER TWIST.

THE DIAMOND BANGLE. By Lillie Crane. Digby, Long & Co. 1s.

THE WORSHIP OF LUCIFER. By Mina Sandeman. Digby Long & Co. 3s. 6d.

FROM THE LAND OF THE SNOW-PEARLS: TALES OF PAGET SOUND. By Ella Higginson. The Macmillan Co.

A WOMAN OF MOODS: A SOCIAL CINEMATOPHORE. By Mrs. Charlton Anne. Burns & Oates. 5s.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

NIPPUR; OR, EXPLORATIONS AND ADVENTURES ON THE EUPHRATES. By John Punnett Peters, Ph.D. Vol. I. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

EDUCATIONAL.

CICERO PRO PLANCIO. Edited by H. W. Auden, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

LESSONS IN ELEMENTARY BIOLOGY. By F. Jeffery Parker, D.Sc. Macmillan & Co.

MODEL DRAWING OF TRUE PRINCIPLES. By William Mann. T. Nelson & Sons. 5s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ON MANY SEAS: THE LIFE AND EXPLOITS OF A YANKEE SAILOR. By Frederic Benton Williams. Edited by W. Stone Booth. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

AUTHORS AND PUBLISHERS. By G. H. P. and J. B. P. Seventh Edition. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

EPITOME OF THE SYNTHETIC PHILOSOPHY OF HERBERT SPENCER. By F. Howard Collins. Fourth Edition. Williams & Norgate.

THE A B C OF THE X RAYS. By William H. Meadowcroft. Simpkin, Marshall. 4s.

CRICKET LYRICS. By T. Disney. Digby, Long & Co. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE, PURITAN AND RECUSANT. By Rev. T. Carter. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier. 2s. 6d.

THE BEST BOOKS AND THE READER'S GUIDE IN SEPARATE SECTIONS: BIBLIOGRAPHY OF LITERATURE, 5s.; ARTS, TRADES, AND SPORTS, 5s.; GEOGRAPHY, 4s. 6d.; MEDICINE, 2s. 6d.; PHILOLOGY AND ANCIENT LITERATURE, 10s. 6d.; MYTHOLOGY AND FOLKLORE, 2s. 6d.; SCIENCE, 3s. 6d.; ARCHAEOLOGY AND ANTIQUITIES, 2s. 6d.; THEOLOGY, 6s.; HISTORY AND HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY, 4s. 6d.; SOCIAL AND POLITICAL ECONOMY, LAW, AND EDUCATION, 6s.; PHILOSOPHY, 2s. 6d. Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

THE PRINCIPLES OF FRUIT-GROWING. By L. H. Bailey. The Macmillan Co. 5s.

THAT TREE OF EDEN: A STUDY IN THE REAL DECADENCE. By Nicholas Christian. Hutchinson & Co.

NOTES AND NEWS.

FROM Wednesday's Times:

"KIPLING.—On the 17th Aug., at North End House, Rottingdean, Sussex, the wife of RUDYARD KIPLING, of a son."

IN the current North American Review Mr. Edmund Gosse examines the literary history of the last ten years in England and comes to some interesting conclusions. In answer to the question, What can we discover of the form and character of 1887-1897? he replies that the first and foremost fact is that it has been a period of the removal of landmarks. Most generations have some great and venerable writer whom they may honour and exalt into almost godlike eminence. To-day we have none, if we except Mr. Gladstone, who is primarily not an author; Mr. Ruskin, who is no longer vocal; and Mr. Spencer, whose voice does not penetrate to the people. But during the ten years now completed the deaths have occurred of Browning and Tennyson, Tyndall, Darwin and Huxley, Kinglake and Froude, Newman and Jowett—all landmarks and all without successors. The men who should have succeeded some of them have unhappily died too: Matthew Arnold, William Morris, Pater, Lightfoot, Freeman.

THIS fact, that they have not left successors, is perhaps more melancholy than their own deaths, which for the most part occurred in the fulness of years. Mr. Gosse names but two, and these will not attain quite to the position of landmarks—or soothsayers made half supernatural by age—for some time. In Mr. Gosse's own words:

"If Mr. George Meredith is spared to us for ten years more, he will become one of those quasi-fabulous figures which stimulate curiosity so much, and serve so well to keep alight the flame of enthusiasm. But to find a single other name which can conceivably be put in the same topmost rank we must come down to a still younger generation—to Mr. Swinburne and his juniors—and it will be long, indeed, and far into the twentieth century, before Mr. Swinburne, flos juventutis of our poetry, can consent to be venerable."

MR. GOSSE next comes to the prevailing mode of literary expression—the novel. He considers the outburst of fiction under which we now labour to be disastrous, not only because it diverts readers from better things, but because it also turns authors into wrong channels.

"For example, Stevenson, manifestly born to be an essayist and perhaps a philosopher, was dragged, as a magnet draws a needle, to the irresistible rock of story-telling, and Treasure Island, begun as a joke for a boys' newspaper, was made the pioneer of a series of tales to which the author's exquisite style gave the persistence of literature. In Mrs. Humphry Ward a most accomplished literary critic has been lost to us; in Mr. George Moore a candid student of sociology; in Mr. Stanley Weyman a historian of the school of Robertson."

It is almost certain, says Mr. Gosse, that if Modern Painters or The Grammar of Assent or even The History of Civilisation had been published within the last ten years, it would have scarcely attracted any attention at all, outside a narrow circle. It is more than probable that Buckle and Newman, if not Mr. Ruskin, would have resigned themselves to the inevitable, and have tried to present their views and convictions in the form of tales.

An article in the Phonetic Journal, says a correspondent, includes Charles Kingsley among "men of genius" who wrote a good hand. Yet it was Kingsley who so shocked a timid correspondent by the Socialistic extravagance of a postscript which ran: "My station is Wokingham." She read it, "My trust is the working-man."

MOST of the boys and girls who have had the good fortune to read Mr. Kipling's two Jungle Books have laid them aside hoping for more. But it has been reserved for an American boy to put the question to the author. "Dear Clement," was Mr. Kipling's reply—"Yes, I know some more jungle stories, but they are so bad that I am afraid the mothers of the little boys who read the other stories wouldn't want them to read this second crop; this is the reason I have not written them." Still there are one or two good stories for children which have not yet found their way from the serials in which they appeared into a book: the incomparable "Maltese Cat," for example, and a stirring tale of a boy who acted as pilot on the Hooghli.

CONCERNING the very successful invasion of London by American actors, the Critic writes as follows: "It is the raciness of the plays we have sent them that has made them popular. Gillette with his American war drama, Neil Burgess with his Yankee spinster, have taken the town; and now Mr. Charles Frohman tells us that he is going to give them Mrs. Leslie Carter and her great bell-clapper act. Though curfews are not rung in America outside of Nantucket, it is an 'American' idea to have a woman swinging from the clapper of a bell to prevent its ringing. I am sure that heroic scene will thrill the British pit with a new thrill, one that even Wilson Barrett could not give it."

THE moral drawn by the Critic from this success is that if American writers as well as playwrights would achieve raciness, American books would be equally popular here. "It is only the American author, the mere writer of books, who is not getting that appreciation at the hands of English readers that he deserves. Our best writers, they claim, are too much like their own; give them something racy in books, as we have given them in plays, and we shall have no reason to complain." This probably is true. Mr. Bret Harte, for instance, was at one time extremely popular in this country, principally because of the raciness of his work.

Lorna Doone is to be added to the long list of novels obtainable in sixpenny editions.

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. are the publishers. Meanwhile Messrs. Blackwood will shortly issue Mr. Blackmore's new romance, Daniel, which has been running in "Maga," Messrs. Blackwood, by the way, are themselves contributing to the sixpenny editions of fiction by bringing out George Eliot's Scenes of Clerical Life in that form.

IN addition to the selection of the prose writings of the late W. B. Rands, better known under his pseudonym of Matthew Browne, which Mr. Brimley Johnson is editing for Mr. James Bowden, there is likely to be a new edition of his verses for children, the copyrights of which have recently been acquired by Mr. John Lane.

OWING probably to the success of The Sowers, and possibly to the illustrated covers in which the new edition is published, Mr. H. S. Merriman's story, The Grey Lady, which fell comparatively flat on its appearance in 1895, is having a belated season of popularity in America. Two editions have rapidly been purchased since the middle of July.

MR. C. H. SHANNON has been awarded a gold medal of the first class at the International Exhibition of Munich for his picture, "The Wounded Amazon," which appeared in this year's Pageant. Sir Edward Burne-Jones also receives a first-class gold medal for his "St. George and the Dragon" series, and Mr. John Swan for his drawings of animals.

MR. DAVID NUTT has now in the press, and will shortly publish, a book entitled Gossip from a Muniment Room, by Lady Newdegate of Arbury. It contains interesting details in the lives of two Fitton sisters, one of whom married Sir John Newdigate of Arbury, and the other was maid of honour to Queen Elizabeth. The private letters—of which the book is chiefly composed—tell their own tale, and give a curious insight into life behind the scenes of nearly three hundred years ago. Among Anne Newdigate's chief correspondents may be mentioned Sir William Knollys, Sir Fulke Greville, Sir Richard Leveson, and Francis Beaumont. The book will be illustrated from family portraits.

To Be Had In Remembrance is the title of a new anthology of poems concerning the future life, which Mr. Elliot Stock announces for early publication. The volume is edited by A. E. Chance, and illustrated with numerous designs by B. Montagu-Pollock.

MESSRS. JAMES NISBET & Co. will publish early in September another romance of military life, to be entitled The Rip's Redemption, from the pen of Mr. E. Livingston Prescott, whose story Scarlet and Steel recently aroused so much attention among Army men by reason of its strictures on flogging.

SHAKESPEARE AS A LONDONER.

THE pleasantly unusual view taken by Mr. Sidney Lee that, after all, we know a good deal about Shakespeare is not weakened by the fact that the London which Shakespeare knew is an open page to us. The page is mainly John Stow's. Many of Shakespeare's contemporaries, and notably Ben Jonson, have left us vivid, racy pictures of London characters and customs; but Stow's plodding "Survey" enables us to see the whole, and to fit in the parts.

It was, indeed, a literary providence that raised up Stow among the Elizabethans. While they ransacked the world for beauty, the ages for tragedy, and exhausted euphony on their lines, this plain man was mapping out the streets and describing the churches and houses and shipping which constituted the centre and home of this literature, and of the human activities that inspired it and were by it inspired. We may be sure that Stow's love of London was shared by Shakespeare with added depths of love and insight proper to his larger mind. Shakespeare did not behold the London crowds, the palaces of the Strand, and the narrow, bustling alleys of the City unmoved; and to discover, as far as may be, just what he did see, and how he was affected by it, is no idle employment. It has been the employment, at all events, of Mr. T. Fairman Ordish, whose Shakespeare's London, recently published by Messrs. Dent & Co., is, we think, the first careful attempt to draw Shakespeare as a Londoner.

Mr. Ordish has had the wisdom not to fret about disputed facts and dates in Shakespeare's career. He has taken the generally accepted life, and after all no one who admits that Shakespeare was Shakespeare disputes that he spent his best years in London. How and why he came to London we do not know for certain. Supposing the deer-stealing story to be true, it is not clear that Shakespeare came to London immediately after, or in consequence of, that incident. There is some reason to believe that he went first to a village near Stratford. An old tradition had it that he supported himself for a time as a school-master. But to London, sooner or later, Shakespeare must needs have come.

Being yet buoyant he may have been moved to travel thither by nothing more material than that passion to see the metropolis, to plunge into its crowds, and to be "of the centre," which still brings youths of twenty-two up from the counties. It is probable that Shakespeare came to London on foot by way of Oxford and High Wycombe. Even then the lights of London must have flared like "a misty dawn" on the night sky, and we may imagine that Shakespeare's heart throbbed a little as he drew near to the splendid city. Splendid it was. Let the reader look at Visscher's view of Elizabethan London, which Mr. Ordish reproduces as the frontispiece to his book, and declare whether this was not a London in which Shakespeare might have retained, as he did, his love of Nature, and have absorbed also his deep sense of the grandeur of cities, the majesty of law, and the humane influences of commerce.

Visscher's panoramic view, taken from Bankside in the very year of Shakespeare's death, seems like another providential contribution to our knowledge of the man. His personality eludes us. Not the less is it a joy and an education to approach inch by inch through any and every medium to a closer acquaintance with the greatest of Englishmen. And one can spend hours poring on Visscher's minutely careful view of London, and say at least: Thus London looked to Shakespeare! We are standing on Bankside just far enough back from the river for the view to include two curious octagonal buildings, one of which is labelled "The Globe" and the other "The Bear Gardne." Beyond these we see the backs of the houses that fringed the Surrey side of the river from St. Mary Overy westward toward the site of Waterloo Bridge. Over these houses which lie low in the foreground we see the broad river. Visscher seems to have felt its majestic flow, and assuredly he felt its breeze; every sail, and there are many in his picture, is bellying proudly. Beyond, London proper stretches from the Tower to Charing Cross, throwing up its spires against the heights of Islington and Hampstead, and against the sky. London Bridge, sole link between the two banks, seems to groan under its houses and battlemented entrances. The roof of the south gate is like a ghastly pincushion with its traitors' heads stuck on poles. Thence turrets and gables, closely packed, lead the eye across to Fish-street and Cannon-street. Old St. Paul's dominates all. Nor are rolling clouds—not mere conventions of the engraver, but such white cumuli as Londoners might then see in their pure sky, and reflected in their pure river—wanting to a scene majestic and complex enough to have been in Shakespeare's mind when he made Prospero predict the fading of "the cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces, the solemn temples, the great globe itself, yea, all that it inherit."

Several neighbourhoods of London are believed to have been known to Shakespeare with the intimacy which comes of daily routine. The traditions agree that in his first seven years in London he existed, "by very mean employments," in the neighbourhood of Shoreditch. The father of Burbage, the actor, whose children claimed for him the distinction of being the first builder of playhouses, kept livery stables in Smithfield, and it was the custom of the town aristocracy to ride out to the two theatres—the "Theatre" and the "Curtain"—near Shoreditch Church. Shakespeare is said to have looked after the horses while their riders were absorbed in the play.

It may be surmised that in these years, being unattached—for it is certain that he saw little of his wife and children for eleven years after he left Stratford—Shakespeare joined in, or at least witnessed, the sports and pastimes of the town. He must often have walked in Finsbury Fields and seen the train-bands drilling and practising archery at the butts. One student has recently argued that Shakespeare was himself a practised archer. It has been noted that archery terms, correctly used, are scattered throughout the plays. Does not Shallow exclaim on the death of "Old Double": "Jesu! Jesu! dead! a' drew a good bow. . . . Dead! a' would have clapped i' the clout at twelve score; and carried you a forehand shaft a fourteen and fourteen and a half, that it would have done a man's heart good to see." Nor is Mr. Ordish without justification in suggesting that Shakespeare must have enjoyed many a walk northwards through the fields to Islington, Highbury, and to the woods and heaths of Highgate and Hampstead. It is not in the least necessary to suppose that Shakespeare brought most of his knowledge of nature from Warwickshire. Gerard's Herbal names hundreds of wild flowers that were to be found in the fields around London or at Hampstead, and many of these flowers are immortalised in the plays.

It was not long, however, before Shakespeare came further into the town. The theatrical companies of the Earl of Sussex, the Earl of Derby, and the Earl of Pembroke, were performing on the other side of the Thames, and Shakespeare became associated with them. Malone is the great supporter of the tradition that he lived between 1596 and 1608 on Bankside, close to the Globe Theatre, which had been opened there by the Burbages. It should be remembered that the "Globe" was burnt down in 1613, so that the building represented in Visscher's drawing is only the successor of the house that Shakespeare knew. But the Bear Garden, which had no such fate, appears as Shakespeare saw it. There are few more interesting transcripts of Elizabethan life in this quarter than the conversation about the bears, and particularly the notorious bear Sackerson, that takes place between Slender and Anne in the "Merry Wives of Windsor."

If we accept the theory that for some years Shakespeare lived in Great St. Helen's, Bishopsgate, we may accept Mr. Ordish's sketch of his daily journeys to and from Bankside. "Residing at St. Helen's, Shakespeare . . . must have frequently walked . . . along Bishopsgate, down Gracechurch-street (Grass-street, as it was called then, past Eastcheap, over the Bridge to the Clink. At this time, too, the Burbages had another theatre at Blackfriars; and, after attending a rehearsal at the Globe, Shakespeare would walk on past the pike-ponds to Paris Garden stairs, and take the ferry there to Blackfriars." Such surmises of Shakespeare's daily movements are reasonable and refreshing. Mr. Ordish makes an excellent point when he says: "It is probable that, had it been adequately known how many-sided was the life of London as it presented itself to Shakespeare, how full of variety in a small compass, some of the books that have been written to prove he was a lawyer or some other profession; that he must have been on the Continent, especially to Italy; that he must have made an ocean voyage in a ship, or what not; might not have seen the light."

What Shakespeare could not learn from London, from London's river, and from those books of which we know he was a student, he could leave to more learned and less gifted men.

THREE NEGLECTED BOOKS.

I.—“DAGONET THE JESTER.”

It is a pleasant theory to nourish, that every deserving book sooner or later finds its way to those that can love it best. There is fate in these matters; a destiny that leads readers—by devious ways, it is true, and often very slowly, but surely enough—to those authors in whom they find most of that sympathy or attraction which it is the reader's end in life to discover. Some optimistic fatalists go farther and maintain that one always comes to a book at the right moment. Be that as it may, destiny is ever watchful to effect wise introductions. Sometimes her instrument is the reviewer: oftener this meeting grows out of conversations—a new friend always can tell us of a new book: now and then a belated appreciation performs the office; and it is not disagreeable to feel at this moment that it was destiny at our elbow which prompted the eulogy of three unobtrusive but real and individual little works that have never, we think, appealed to as many intellects as they should.

The first is Dagonet the Jester, by the ill-fated Malcolm Kingsley Macmillan, a tender, fragrant little fantasy of a nature very rare in English literature—the story of the Fool, or Jester, of my Lord Sandiacre; of the offence he gave to my Lady and consequent expulsion from the house; of his settlement in the village of Thorn Abbey as a cobbler; of his marriage to Nancy of the inn; of Nancy's change from ripe gaiety to seriousness; and of the bitter end their marriage had, by reason of the irreconcilability of the two natures—he being a child of nature, free of word and deed, untroubled by self-searchings and misgivings, void of offence; and she, though not less void of offence, fearful of impulse, anxious for her soul's good and his, a Puritan at heart. The period of the story is early Stuart, the border line of time dividing Merrie England on the one side and our own conscience-stricken England on the other. The historian is Master Aaron Blenkinsop, a boy of Dagonet's village, and the son of his best friend, Mistress Blenkinsop, and one who, coming under the patronage of the Sandiacres, grew to be a man of learning and a satirical wit.

It is a delicate, kindly fancy, touched with gentle communicative melancholy. The reader who desires a definite plot, or character-drawing firmly done in black and white, will find little to his mind here. The tints are low and faint and suggestion is more than statement. Yet why more persons are not familiar with the book is hard to say. We as a race may require facts boldly or extravagantly set down, but a steadily increasing number among us prefer the quieter way and are continually vigilant for good work. For those who would choose to be whispered to rather than shouted at Dagonet's story should have fascination: the good Aaron who tells the tale has so much of that indefinable quality which we call charm.

The title, truly, is a little misleading. When we see Jester on the cover of a book we expect fun; or, as in the case of Chicot, adventure. But Dagonet offers more tears than laughter. He is not the rich man's Jester or Fool as, outside of Shakespeare (whose Fools are not the least radiant jewels in his crown of glory), he is understood in English literature. Dagonet rises head and shoulders above these. Dagonet is of the greatest, owning kinship with the fool in Lear himself. His was that folly that lies nearest wisdom. Perhaps a better name for it is unpracticalness informed by wit, the negation of the trick of “getting on.” The truest, gayest artists have it. Dagonet himself was an artist, in a day when men could be artists and not know it. He lived his own life.

Lady Sandiacre, being a vain woman blinded by conceit, missed Dagonet's rectifying smile when one night he offered her a quip, and he was straightway led to the confines of the park by his lordship, who, with tears in his eyes, bade the Fool farewell. At this point the story opens. Dagonet then settled down in the neighbouring village to cobble, and to be as merry as God willed amid the insidious beginnings of Puritanism. He lodged with the blacksmith Blenkinsop and Mistress Blenkinsop, the mother of Aaron, who tells the tale; and Mistress Blenkinsop that morning sent to the “George” for a flagon of Burgundy for breakfast, “wishing, as she said, to let Master Dagonet down easily from that high estate to which he had been used.” This Mistress Blenkinsop is a notable figure:

“Dagonet,” said Aaron later, “was born into a world which left confession to the parson. Much of his life was lived before every man was fain to be considered a priest, and when even the priest could look with smiling on May games and May blossoms. My mother was another such forest changeling, and minded her, as Dagonet doth still, of the green and growing earth, though my father could see nothing but the blackness of the Ironsides' empire between our tender lives and the avenging fires of God.”

Thus, we find Dagonet suffering not alone from the invasion of conscience. Mistress Blenkinsop breathed the same air; she, too, was very nigh to Nature's heart. Fiction is rich in good mothers, but few have more charm than this winsome dame. Yet too much even for her, with her indomitable spirit and sense, was the seriousness setting in at that time, and she, too, became troubled in mind and lost her gaiety. With her death the first part of the book, made valuable chiefly by her share in it, closes.

In the second part, twelve years later, we find a new Lord Sandiacre, young and foolish, with Aaron as his secretary. The scene opens with the return of my Lord to his home. He paused at the “George” for liquor, which was brought to him by the other woman of the story, Nancy Cotes, “that beautiful whirlwind,” as Aaron calls her. “When my Lord dismounted she strode up and threw one arm over his horse's neck, looking at us all with a kind of reckless defiance.” My Lord was struck, and Dagonet, standing by, saw it. It was perhaps with a view to her protection that a few days later Dagonet and Nancy were married; and with that step came the beginning of the end.

Dagonet was not for the fetters of marriage, nor had Nancy enough breadth of mind to admit so elvish a nature as her husband's. The Jester was the soul of kindness, but Nancy grew daily more anxious and less and less the beautiful whirlwind. Indeed, the memory of that day when she brought the drinking-cup to the young lord and met his eyes with gaze of equal frankness dwelt with her. The Calvinistic preacher was abroad, damnation was in the air, and weak vessels who had not sinned imagined sins with which to torture themselves. She was another of Puritanism's victims.

In such an atmosphere Dagonet languished and grew faint; moreover, his popularity in the village had gone, he was eyed askance. Scandal was talked of him. Wit was in bad odour, gaiety in worse. Dagonet, Nancy complained, could do nothing for her soul. He could not see. She wished to convince him of her love, but also of her unworthiness, and he would not understand. “He only pats and strokes me with ‘Good child! good child! I do most exceedingly love thee. And what a heart is thine too, Nanny! Be merry and love me as thou canst.’” No wonder that, observing this condition of things, Aaron exclaimed: “Woe unto the prophets of woe! Woe unto those that are ever urging on the poor soul to probe into its sores and its sins, as if a mere thought of evil should float for ever like a cloud before the Mercy Seat.” Aaron's last glimpse of husband and wife together was one cold evening when Nancy's mood was for the moment gay almost as of old:

“Looking in I saw through the cloud of smoke a most singular scene. With his back to me, and dressed in his old jester's suit, sat Dagonet, the married cobbler, drinking in tobacco, and making sharp strokes in the air with his bauble. Facing me, with a window-sill at her right hand, where were set holly-boughs and yew-twigs in a rich confusion, sat Nancy his wife. She had just been giving suck to her little boy, and her right breast shone through the firelight and blue smoke like a sea-foam of a creamy gold, blown suddenly into a glorious orb, and touching the sea-floor like another sun.”

“Be merry, little knave,” Dagonet was saying to his son, “but take to thee early the garment of wisdom and the mask of gravity”; and then Nancy produced from a secret place a little suit of motley for the child, and all were as merry as larks. But of a sudden Nancy's mood changed and she became sober again, and called for a truce to gaiety. It was Dagonet's last trial. He rose and slipped softly out with a bundle in his arms, while Nancy turned to the study of Ezekiel.

“I go to take the air,” Dagonet said, “and spell out on the gravestones the names of some of my dead cronies.” Some while later a suspicion came upon Nancy and Aaron that all was not well, and they set out to look for their friend. They sought in vain; but meeting with one Jock learned that he had but half an hour since talked with the Fool in the churchyard. He carried a torch and was reading the names on the stones. “Oh, for the goodly company of my friends who lie below,” he had said—"Master Blenkinsop and his wife. . . . There will be no such cronies for me again. They reminded me never of my dishonour. And they who are left can think of nothing else." Dagonet was never seen alive again. They found him dead against Mistress Blenkinsop's tomb.

If you like to read a deeper meaning into the story you may. The author, indeed, helps you to it. In the transformed Nancy, so debonair by nature, so free and frank in her youth, and latterly so conscious of her soul's danger, and so timorous of spontaneity, you may discover the beginnings of that morbid desire for safety in the after-life from which so many have since suffered. "The conscience-stricken plaining mother at my side," said the observant Aaron, "was a type of the new woman, in whom the sense of sin was to be the predominant feature." And again, at the end: "For I think ever of the sap of the merry greenwood and the life-streams of England's wanton revelry frozen suddenly in Dagonet's beloved form." We may, indeed, if we like, consider Dagonet the Jester its author's protest against a world whose atmosphere is too bitter for the genial soul of the artist. Many a writer has come to this conclusion—it is native to the artistic temperament—but few have stated it more reasonably. A man had to feel deeply and love England and mankind well to write such a book as Dagonet the Jester. It is a persuasive plea for a franker life, less fearful and more merry: "Woe unto those who are ever urging on the poor soul to probe into its sores and its sins, as if a mere thought of evil should float for ever like a cloud before the Mercy Seat."

ART.

THE TATE GALLERY.

I.

IT might have been hoped that the experiment of a Greek façade in the London climate and London light had been sufficiently proved. In all the hope of the whiteness of the quarry and of the quarried stone, in the confidence of tradition, the new architect, age by age, has made the attempt anew, in indomitable defiance of the smoke, of time, nay of the sun itself. For the London sun does not ride so high that he can be tempted to lodge horizontal shadows under the levels of the heavy Grecian lines; he is a sun wheeling somewhat low—or somewhat low on an average—round the sky, and, therefore, a sun whose shadows are to be caught by the outstanding buttresses and the flying lateral members of the Gothic order. But there they stand, the triumphs of hope over experience, the Greek porticos banished from the upright Southern sun, and water-coloured so dead black at the freakish will of the soot and rain that the question of shadows is quenched on their pediments and among their columns for ever. That capricious aquarelle of the London winter climate takes little account of the hollows and shelters of architecture, and blackens impartially; the structure lodges pallid, grey, half-hearted London shadows that are absorbed in the local black, as the half-sunshine is also. There is no play of natural climate over a blackened building in London upon which the artificial climate of smoke has done its work. Yet here, in the Tate Gallery, is an undiscouraged public building, Corinthian as to its portico, and raised on the horizontal lines of the South, save only that the cupola springs into air in defiance of everything. And for the moment the clear whiteness of the structure, and the sun of summer noon-day seem to justify the old experiment—all looks brilliant. And the architect is to be much commended for making some attempt to suit the scale, and especially the height of his building, to the style. The Tate Gallery is not only in its parts, but in its completeness, fairly proportionate to human life. Therefore it composes well with the river, among other things—nay, with the cloud itself.

Whiteness and a shedding of strong light rule everything within, and the recesses of the domed central hall hold, in sharp contrast, the dark bronzes of the statues—Lord Leighton's "Sluggard" and "Athlete"; Mr. Hamo Thornycroft's "Teucer," of which Millais said that if it were but a little injured, and had been dug up, it would have the respect it would never get to the full, being whole; the "Boy at Play" of Mr. Goscombe John, and the "Perseus Rescuing Andromeda," the buoyant and vivid work of Mr. H. C. Fehr. The "Boy," with its balance and its action, is a work somewhat lacking in beauty, and the sculpture of action is not entirely justified by Mr. Fehr's placing his Perseus on the back of his dragon, which lies crouching upon his Andromeda. The winged sandals, and the spirit, and the alighting movement of this well-designed figure, hardly do away with the sense of an added burden upon the undermost Andromeda. The "Sluggard," the "Athlete," and the "Teucer" are also all so many examples of the sculpture of action, but the action here is not dependent upon so delicate a thing as the very flutter, as it were, of poise. It is worth saying that the pretty and cheerful fountains circled out in the pavement should have something to mark them for the pre-occupied feet of strolling Westminster people, unused to find goldfish and lilies in their path, the while their eyes are wandering over the subtle lines of Mr. Onslow Ford's statuette of "Folly" just beyond. The two drinking fountains are very well imagined. They give a local air at once to the Gallery—a building set in the midst of a poor riverside people, whose children straggle in from the dust of the alley and the tramway street.

The pictures within might be expected to present the effect of a trebly mixed motive; but, after all, there is no cause why the pictures chosen by the judgment of Mr. Tate and those selected by the Council of the Royal Academy should specially differ; nor why these two sections should be unlike (except upon the matter of age in a few instances) from the pictures eased out of the National Gallery. Every collection is heterogeneous, and this not more than another. But the hanging, in such a Gallery, should be above reproach. If the arrangement is temporary, it would be well to make some confidence on that point to the public; but for the present, at least, all confidences are markedly withheld, and we do not yet know whether we are to be guided by a catalogue, or whether the far better way—the only national way—will be taken in giving every picture its name upon the frame. When the building is complete, then, possibly, Cecil Lawson's "August Moon," Mr. Henry Tuke's "August Blue," the hill-side cattle picture of Mr. Adrian Stokes, and Lady Butler's "Remnants of an Army" will no longer be hung at their present height. If the "August Moon" were to continue where it is there would be an abiding reason for outcry; for it is lifted up on the top of the "Derby Day."

"August Blue" is a brilliant and beautiful picture, and, merely to match Mr. Tuke with himself, "All Hands to the Pumps," for all its many excellences, must be judged to be less perfect upon the point of action. It is too late to complain of the Chantrey choice in certain instances (and there is cause) but it is never out of date to approve the happy readiness that took possession of such a radiant work as Mr. Sargent's "Carnation, Lily, Lily, Rose." The utmost of delicacy, the extremity of refinement, without a moment of exaggeration of what is sweet and fastidious—a tact and choice without reproach—go with his triumphant sense of beauty in its rarer form. White is to be painted with one of two beauties—the hidden gold of Sir Joshua Reynolds or the cool latent violet which is the secret of the white of Mr. Sargent. Both are, at their best, so fine that by the white rather than by any colour are we inclined to judge a colourist able to charm us so. Of both kinds of white the beauty consists, needless to say, in the light, for there is as much light in the white opal of Mr. Sargent as in the glow of the warmer manner—and with light, spirit. The painting of the white dresses and of the fine childish flesh in the faces and necks of the "Carnation Lily" children is one of the most spiritual things ever done by colour.

It is a mingled pleasure to see again, in a good light, the famous "Ophelia" of Millais. The beautiful painting of the ordinary face is undeniable, but the beauty of the accessories—especially the bush of open wild roses—has to be sought for. For example, there is no manifest sunshine in the picture, and the strong green of the leaves does not look like the green of sunshine, but yet in the almost microscopically-seen middle of every rose there lies, as in a cup, a golden glow of sunlight, radiantly painted. It was apparently a part of the fashion—as a protest against prettiness—to paint the heroines of poetry with the faces of dressmakers—not prosperous dressmakers—and with expressions of head-ache. "Digging the Grave" seems really much inferior to this rich "Ophelia"; it is a hard picture, much more intent upon colour and contrasts than upon harmonies and lights. Its interest is almost all in the subject, with its vigorous gloom and sentiment. The figure of the nun who is brawnily spading the grave-mould out is in fact strongly conceived, but the novice sitting by is somewhat sentimental, and singularly ununlike. There are some yet living who tell us that they saw the picture when the face of this vestal was of the ugliness sought for by the resolutely retrograde "advance" of the time; when Millais, many years later, relaxed the rule, he gave his nun the present rather handsome face. "The North-West Passage" represents Millais at a far different time; and "Speak! Speak!" is the most ably painted of the pictures of the last years, most of which the master's best admirers would gladly see destroyed.

The number of works by that poor painter E. M. Ward, to whom, in the day of our boastfulness, was entrusted some of the decoration of the House of Lords, is disproportionately large; they are disagreeably well-known to us all; so is the blatant "Hamlet" of Maclise, so is the work of the less obtrusive and quite undistinguished Augustus Egg; so is much else that for many years diminished the dignity of the official national collection in Trafalgar-square. For the landscape of Linnell we have no tolerance: it is lightless, spiritless, and violent.

DRAMA.

ALTHOUGH the stage has seldom been more fully given up to frivolity than at the present moment, Shakespeare continues to hold his own, and more. He is an important item in most of Sir Henry Irving's seasons (though, to be sure, next winter, with "two new plays and three new playwrights" coming forward, there may not be much room for him at the Lyceum); Mr. Tree announces "Julius Cæsar" in addition to "Hamlet" for the coming season at Her Majesty's; and Mr. Forbes Robertson, occupying the Lyceum in Sir Henry Irving's absence, intends to give "Hamlet" and possibly one other Shakespearean play. All this betokens a praiseworthy devotion to "the legitimate." One wonders how far it is dictated by the natural desire of our rising or risen actors to range themselves in line with the great names of the past and how far by the demand of the public for classic drama. Assuredly the former consideration is not without its importance. Plays such as "Virginius" and "The Hunchback" have outlived their period solely because they are associated with famous personalities with whom the modern actor and actress like to bring themselves into juxtaposition, and naturally Shakespeare forms a useful connecting link and a standard of comparison for all dramatic periods. This is one reason why the classic drama can never be left out of the reckoning. Yet supposing one to be familiar with the dramatic and literary beauties of "Hamlet" (as the experienced playgoer is), the margin of novelty left for each new rendering of the central character must be comparatively small. What is there to be learnt of the character of the Prince of Denmark that the histrionic and critical genius of this century alone has not amply revealed? The pessimist might well be pardoned for complaining of the "damnable iteration" displayed in the continued revival of "Hamlet."

On the other hand, the living texture of the drama, the play of character apart from the story (which many of the cultured intellects of the Latin races still take no more kindly to than did Voltaire), seems to exercise a spell over the public. The tradition may or may not be strictly accurate that, in the days when Shakespeare was more frequently played in the provinces than he is, the gallery boys were occasionally known to prompt the leading actor. But a significant fact is this, that when Mr. Tree interrupted the run of "The Silver Key," in order to close his season with a performance or two of "Hamlet" at Her Majesty's, he had crowded houses; which may imply, indeed, a sense of duty on the part of the public to patronise "the legitimate," but which is more likely to be the outcome of a keen interest in the treatment of the character per se.

To whatever cause the continued popularity of the legitimate drama may be set down, the fact is one of excellent import, especially in such periods of dramatic frivolity as that through which we happen to be passing. For it must not be forgotten that a country with magnificent dramatic traditions may, nevertheless, lose taste for its masterpieces. Spain is a case in point. All the great names in Spanish drama are now relegated to the upper shelf; the theatres of the Peninsula being given up mainly to musical farce, or translations of French modern pieces, with a small and insignificant leavening of Echegaray, Perez Galdos, and other native writers. Bull-fighting has killed tragedy in Spain. It is the one great national sport, and in second and third-rate provincial towns it can be reckoned to draw a mighty concourse of 10,000 or 12,000 spectators at prices that compare with our highest theatrical tariff. In ancient Rome the combats of the gladiators inspired a distaste for the feebler and more subdued effects of mimic tragedy, and so it is with the corrida de toros, which tolerates beside it only the sarsuelas of the popular stage. Perhaps the taste of the day is not in itself too favourable to tragedy. How the classic drama would fare in France at the present time but for the operation of the subsidised theatres it is hard to say. Certainly private managerial enterprise seldom or never leans in that direction, and the devotees of the old school are constantly lamenting the decay of the national taste for that class of entertainment.

It is all the more remarkable, therefore, that in the West-end theatres of London there should be such a recrudescence of classicism as the announcements for the coming season denote. Mr. Tree's "Hamlet," of which we are to have a further taste, is a curiously æsthetic, and one might almost say feminine, rendering of the character. While deficient in virility, by comparison with the rugged interpretations known to the stage, it is almost surcharged with the airs and graces wherewith this romantic actor adorns his more imaginative work. Mr. Tree's is a tender, refined Hamlet, as indulgent with Ophelia, except where he detects her seeming duplicity, as he is impatient with the senilities of Polonius. He is never a mad Hamlet, but his nature is obviously too sensitive and highly strung for life at the Court of Elsinore. Like most leading actors of the present day, Mr. Tree has his favourite readings. Of these, is perhaps the most striking. It is one of those which, if they did not rest upon some authority, might well be invented to suit the sense of the text. That every dog has his "day," according to the accepted version, has become proverbial, and will no doubt retain its place in popular speech, but on literary grounds there is much to be said for Mr. Tree's emendation. Evidently the line is meant to express an antithesis, and baying to a dog is as natural as mewing to a cat. Moreover, baying as applied to dogs was a word familiar to Shakespeare, who elsewhere uses it, as in the passage:

"The cat will mew, the dog will have his bay."

"I'd rather be a dog and bay the moon," &c.

THE typical summer piece continues its career. In its latest form it is presented, at the Criterion, as an adaptation from the German of forty or fifty years ago, under the title of "The Sleeping Partner." Neither the age nor the origin, however, of a summer piece matters, provided it belongs to what we are accustomed to regard as the more primitive school of humour or dramatic effect. "Primitive" is the appropriate word in the present instance. The piece is concerned with the relations of a father, a daughter, and a son-in-law. The father finding a room stuffy throws up the "practicable" window; the son closes it. This is repeated several times to peals of laughter from an unsophisticated house. Then the mechanical joke is reversed with equal effect, the son opening the window and the father as regularly closing it. Afterwards much merriment is produced by a butler's insisting upon laying the tea-table at inopportune moments, until finally he is kicked out with such violence that he falls down and smashes the tray—a stroke of humour which is equivalent to the time-honoured joke of sitting down on a handbox, or the buttered slide of the Christmas clown. The serious side of the piece is hardly more impressive. Through the excessive devotion to each other of a father and daughter, the latter becomes temporarily estranged from her husband. The sentiment here is forced and maudlin, though tactfully rendered by Mr. Fred Terry and Miss Lena Ashwell as the young couple, and Mr. James Welch as the father, the sleeping but still aggressive member of the firm. Summer audiences, however, when they are not on the guffaw, like to be on the whimper. It is a curiously old-fashioned phase of theatrical effect that the typical summer piece presents.

J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

I ALLUDED last week to the miner's fancy that diamonds were a gift from heaven, and added the interesting explanation given by Sir William Crookes, that diamonds were common in meteoric stones. It is somewhat of a coincidence that there should immediately afterwards appear in Nature (reprinted from the American Journal of Science) a paper by the late Prof. Hubert Newton, proving that all over the world it has been customary to worship meteorites as gods. Some of the instances quoted are so interesting that a short list of them would not be out of place. The oldest of all is one that was found in an Ohio mound on a brick altar, surrounded by numerous apparently sacred or ornamental objects. What its significance may have been we can only conjecture. It is otherwise with the cases of stones placed on record as worshipped by African tribes, by Buddhist Hindus, and by Japanese and Chinese astronomers. In 1492 a stone weighing 300 lb. fell in Alsace, and was regarded by the Emperor Maximilian as such a portent that a Council of State was held to consider its meaning, and it was solemnly placed in a church. Raphael painted into an altarpiece in the Vatican a fireball which fell at Crema, and was held to have brought deliverance to Italy from the French. It is in classical theology, however, that Prof. Newton claims the most striking part for his meteorites. He holds the distinction between εἰκὼν, an image, and the earlier ἀγάλμα to prove that shapeless objects were worshipped before statues, and then tries to show that all images reputed to have fallen from heaven were either meteorites or statues which replaced meteorites. Thus the earliest statue of Aphrodite at Paphos was such a stone, rude and triangular in shape. So was the image of Artemis at the Tauric Chersonnese, celebrated in the legend of Iphigeneia. The Palladium of Troy is described in terms which bespeak a meteoric origin; whether it was in this form that the reputed Palladium was brought to Rome and guarded by the Vestal Virgins there are no means of knowing. Quite otherwise is it with the famous statue of Cybele at Pessinus, celebrated by Catullus in the "Attis." This was the "Idæan goddess," whose transport to Rome by command of the Sibylline oracle was supposed to have been operative in driving Hannibal out of Italy. The appearance of this "divinity" is described by many writers, in whose lifetimes it still existed as an object of worship. It was conical in shape, and resembled a needle of brown lava. When its temple on the Palatine was explored by Lanciani it could not be found. The clue to its disappearance is probably to be found in a note of 1730, when the temple was searched, and the author records his disappointment at finding no statue, but only a brown stone. After the foregoing we are not surprised at being told that the Ephesian Diana was in her earliest form most probably a meteorite, and that the statue which afterwards became so famous was either due to a desire for artistic improvement, or else was a device of the gold and silversmiths, who made a living by the sale of replicas. One other interesting meteoric relic is mentioned by Prof. Newton. The veneration of the inhabitants of Arabia for their stone god was so deep-rooted that Mohammed spared it. "To-day that stone is the most sacred jewel of Islam."

H. C. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

London: August 14.

After the use by Mr. Chambers of such expressions as "taking refuge in an unworthy quibble," "a very red-herring of a conjecture," "an argument pour rire," I might not unreasonably decline further correspondence. There is, however, one matter which I can scarcely pass over without notice. I am asked to "print in full" a certain letter in the Marquis of Salisbury's collection from Sir Edward Fitton to Cecil (dated August 5, 1600) "and add to it any other letters from Fitton to Cecil of the same date which may be in the collection." Other letters from Fitton to Cecil of the same date have, I should suppose, no existence. But, of the letter more particularly mentioned, I do not know that I ever had a complete copy. Lord Salisbury and his librarian, Mr. R. T. Gunton, were very liberal and kind in giving facilities for the research. Complete or partial copies of letters were sent, as seemed necessary. Some letters I personally inspected. Mr. Gunton, indeed, seemed to take a personal interest in the investigation. Mr. Chambers may rely upon it that nothing was withheld which was likely to elucidate Mary Fitton's early history. Without much better reason than at present appears, I cannot ask Lord Salisbury that further trouble should be taken in relation to the matter. Mr. Chambers does not allude to the really important fact that objection was made to paying "her portion" to Sir Edward's daughter (certainly not Mary Fitton's sister, who, since 1587, had been Anne Newdigate, and who was not at all likely to be "hindered") on the ground that the discharge was not a good one.

It is at least possible, as I said previously, that additional light may be thrown on the matter by the Fitton letters at Arbury which Mrs. Newdigate is editing. When I saw this lady—now some time ago—she told me she intended making a thorough research. This, I presume, she has done. The book is, I understand, already in the press, and may be expected shortly.

With regard to the supposed allusion to the relations between Pembroke and Shakespeare in Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, and the authorship of the poem, "Soules ioye, when I am gone," &c., I need only refer to what was actually said in my book.

THOMAS TYLER.

SPANISH PROTESTANTS.

On reading in the last issue of your paper the notice of Spanish Protestants in the Sixteenth Century, in which it is regretted that the book did not appear in toto, I am reminded of the well-known fable, in which the man was driven into carrying the donkey in his efforts to please the public, for it was only because all the chief London publishers declined to bring out the complete translation of the original, on the ground that the subject was not of sufficient public interest to warrant the expense, that, to my great regret, I found myself obliged to concede to the condition of its abridgment.

In justice to my work, I trust I may be permitted to say that the author (Dr. Wilkens) has himself written to me to say that he is greatly pleased with my compilation of his work, as his diffuse style and want of methodical arrangement would have prevented the translation of the original being satisfactory to English readers; while he was glad to find I had omitted no point of historical interest.

When the reviewer says: "At no time could Spain be said to present a promising field for the dissemination of Protestant ideas," he seems to have overlooked the late Lord Plunket's Introduction to my compiled volume, in which he says there are now fifty Protestant native congregations in Spain and Portugal, embracing among them considerably more than 10,000 souls.

RACHEL CHALLICE.

HERRICK AND MARTIAL.

Oxford: August 17.

In reference to Dr. W. F. Cobb's letter in the current number, allow me to say, that though I have often read Martial's famous epigram (x. 47), I was not thinking of it at the time of writing my own version of Herrick's lines. The "sine lite dies" and the "focum perennem" came to me as an almost literal translation of the English. The other epigram (ii. 90) I did not even know, though, of course, I see now that Herrick's first two lines are an exact reproduction of the lines which Dr. Cobb quotes. He asks how I scan accedat in my third line; but where is the difficulty? Surely "Hic (not hic) sūpēr | accē | dat," &c., is according to rule.

Thanking you for the favourable notice of my Selections which appeared in the ACADEMY of July 31.

C. S. JERRAM.

MR. BORLASE ON IRISH ARCHEOLOGY.

London: August 18.

In reply to my friend Mr. Alfred Nutt's letter in your issue of August 14, I beg to assure him that the two sentences which he places in inverted commas are not my own, but my reviewer's, and that they do not represent my views on the subject, as Mr. Nutt will discover for himself when he reads my work.

It naturally cannot be expected of me that I should reply to the criticisms of those who have not even seen my book. On the other hand, however, nothing will give me greater pleasure than to have errors pointed out to me of which in my preface I admit there must be many dispersed through my 1,234 pp., and to have at the same time occasion afforded me of defending the position I have taken up in the latter portion of vol. iii., and of supplementing, by additional material, my evidences as to the stem-lands of the Picts and Scots, the pivot on which the question of the origin of the subject-matter of Irish tradition must inevitably rest.

With regard to the "strained etymologies" to which my reviewer, in his generally appreciative article, somewhat vaguely alludes, and in which he probably includes my derivation of Boraimbe (popularly spelt Boru), I should like to be allowed to point out that I have just been made aware that the same view—namely, that the word originally meant the "Cow-Tribute of Rome," that is, the contribution in kine levied by the Romans on the barbarian tribes of the North—has recently, and quite independently, been adopted by an eminent French philologist.

WILLIAM C. BORLASE.

[We wish to state that a few errors of spelling which crept into the letter from Mr. Alfred Nutt, printed in our last issue, were due to a failure of the post.—Ed. ACADEMY.]

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S NEW NOVELS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

GUY BOOTHBY'S

NEW NOVEL,

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, special design, bevelled boards, 5s.

Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

"Thoroughly interesting, whilst its scenes of action are brilliantly written."
Manchester Courier.

"Undoubtedly dramatic.....A wonderfully interesting story."—Morning Leader.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

"A tale of much power and sustained interest, narrated with dramatic effect."

The Scotsman.

"The interest is sustained from first to last, and thrilling incidents crop up at almost every page."—The People.

THE FASCINATION OF THE KING.

"A most picturesque romance, noteworthy for its spirited style, chivalrous tone, powerful human interest, and freedom from commonplace in plot and characterisation."

The Globe.

"Unquestionably the best work we have yet seen from the pen of Mr. Guy Boothby.....
'The Fascination of the King' is one of the books of the season."—Bristol Mercury.

OTHER NOVELS BY GUY BOOTHBY.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. each Profusely Illustrated by STANLEY L. WOOD.

DOCTOR NIKOLA. Fourth Edition.

THE BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL. Seventh Edition.

A BID for FORTUNE. Third Edition.

IN STRANGE COMPANY. Fifth Edition.

THE MARRIAGE of ESTHER. Fourth Edition.

SIX SHILLINGS.

PHARISEES. By A. Kevill-Davies, Author of

"An American Widow," "Dollars are Trumps," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt.

[Ready shortly.]

After the well-known success of Mr. Kevill-Davies's former works, this, his new romance of modern life, will be very welcome to us.

THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE.

THE CRIME and the CRIMINAL. By Richard

MARSH, Author of "Mrs. Musgrave's Husband," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt.

[Ready shortly.]

An intensely sensational story, worked upon an entirely original idea, with the great power familiar to all readers of Mr. Marsh's previous works.

TEMPTATION. By Graham Irving. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt.

[Ready shortly.]

A novel of striking power and vividly realistic. The writer is widely known in literature, but desires to appear under the pseudonym given above on making a new departure in fiction.

FORDHAM'S FEUD. By Bertram Mitford.

THIRD EDITION Now Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. With 4 Full-page Illustrations by STANLEY L. WOOD.

"A story of much merit and startling dénouement. For wealth of character, pleasant descriptive matter, romantic incident, and powerful plot there are few books that will eclipse 'Fordham's Feud.'"—Manchester Courier.

WARD, LOCK & CO.'S SHILLING ILLUSTRATED GUIDE BOOKS

Aim above everything at being up-to-date and correct. Are carefully revised from year to year, and are by far the most reliable and cheapest handbooks published. They are strongly bound in red cloth, of handy size, printed in clear type on good paper, furnished with excellent Maps and Plans, and superbly illustrated.

Sure to be in great demand during the Holiday Season.

Red cloth, round corners, 1s.

The Series numbers Sixty-eight, and comprises nearly all the principal Health Resorts of England, all parts of Scotland and Ireland, North Wales, and the most important Continental Touring Grounds.

ENGLAND AND WALES.

LONDON.
NORTH WALES, &c.
BATH.
BIDEFORD.
BIRMINGHAM.
BOURNEMOUTH.
BRIDDLINGTON and FILEY.
BRIGHTON.
BUXTON and the PEAK DISTRICT.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
DARTMOOR.
THE ENGLISH LAKE DISTRICT.
EXETER, &c.
HARROGATE.
FURNES ABBEY and MORECAMBE BAY.
HASTINGS.
HEXHAM and CARLISLE.
ILFRACOMBE, BARNSTAPLE, and NORTH DEVON.
ILKLEY.

THE ISLE of MAN.
THE ISLE of WIGHT.
LEAMINGTON, WARWICK, &c.
LIVERPOOL.
LYNTON and LYNNMOUTH.
MATLOCK and DOVEDALE.
OXFORD.
PLYMOUTH, STONEHOUSE, and DEVONPORT.
REDCAR, MIDDLESBROUGH.
SALTHERN.
SCARBOROUGH, &c.
SHERWOOD FOREST, NOTTINGHAM, and "THE DUKERIES."
SOUTHPORT.
STRAITFORD-ON-AVON.
TORQUAY.
WHITBY.
WINDSOR and its CASTLE.
WYE VALLEY.

IRELAND.

BELFAST.
CARLINGFORD BAY.
CONNEMARA HIGHLANDS, WEST of IRELAND.
CORK, GLENGARIFF, BANTRY, and the S.W. of IRELAND.
DUBLIN and COUNTY WICKLOW.
GIANT'S CAUSEWAY, &c.

KILLARNEY.
LIMERICK, COUNTY CLARE, and the LOWER SHANNON.
LONDONDERRY and the DONEGAL HIGHLANDS.
NORTHERN LAKE DISTRICT of IRELAND.
COUNTIES WATERFORD & WEXFORD.

SCOTLAND.

ABBOTSFORD, MELROSE, and the SCOTTISH BORDER.
ABERDEEN and DEESIDE, BALMORAL, &c.
AYR, ARRAH, DUMFRIES, and the LAND of BURNS.
EAST COAST of SCOTLAND.
EDINBURGH and its ENVIRONS.
PIFE, KINROSS, DUNFERMLINE, &c.
GLASGOW and the CLYDE.

HIGHLANDS and ISLANDS of SCOTLAND.
INVERNESS.
OBAN, FORT WILLIAM, and the WEST of SCOTLAND.
PERTH, DUNDEE, &c.
SKYE, ORKNEY, SHETLAND.
SOUTH-WEST of SCOTLAND.
THE TROSSACHS: LOCH LOMOND, LOCH KATRINE, &c.

THE CONTINENT.

BELGIUM and HOLLAND.
PARIS.
THE RHINE and RHINELAND.

THE RIVIERA.
SWITZERLAND.

A NEW EDITION OF WARD, LOCK & CO.'S POPULAR SHILLING GUIDE TO LONDON

Has just been published, and is described by the Daily Telegraph as

"ONE OF THE CHEAPEST BOOKS EVER ISSUED."

New Edition. Red cloth, round corners, 1s.

376 pages. Over 100 Illustrations. Numerous Maps and Plans.

"A model of what a cheap handbook of our vast City should be."

Daily News.

"One of the cheapest books ever issued.....The information is thorough and well up to date, and the coloured maps and plans especially clear and good."

Daily Telegraph.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK & CO., LIMITED, SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

7

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1321.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

H. GREVEL & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS,
22, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.
Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications.
CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating
subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS
promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & CO., 27, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 20, South Frederick Street,
Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN,
FOREIGN BOOKSELLER,
45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum).
Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate
prices.
CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO.,
PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS,
3, Creed Lane, London, E.C.
Calcutta: THACKER, SPIKE & Co.
MSs. considered for Publication. [Established 1819.]

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and
BOOKSELLERS, of 27 and 28 West 3rd Street, New York, and 24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities
presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICA-TIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—
CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING AND PUBLISHING.

NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—
KING, SELL & RAILTON, Limited, high-class Printer
and Publishers, 13, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C., have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing
illustrated or other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation.
Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals.
Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted.
Telephone 68121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.
(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street,
London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s per dozen ruled or plain.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS
repayable on demand.
TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum
monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.
STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE
FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.
HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND
FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE.

(Advertisements in this column are inserted at 4d. per line, prepaid.)

WANTED.—Copies of "THE ACADEMY" for
11th JANUARY, 1898. Full price (3d. per copy) paid.—
Apply ACADEMY Office, 48, Chancery Lane, London.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

The READING ROOMS will be CLOSED from WEDNESDAY,
SEPTEMBER 1st, to SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4th, inclusive.
E. MAUNDER THOMPSON,
Principal Librarian and Secretary.
British Museum, 24th August, 1897.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS.
FOUR SCHOLARSHIPS and ONE EXHIBITION, worth £150, £75, £75, £50, and £30 each, tenable for one year, will be competed for on September 27th, 1897—viz., One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Physics and Chemistry. One Senior Open Scholarship of the value of £75 will be awarded to the best candidate (if of sufficient merit) in Biology and Physiology. Candidates for these Scholarships must be under twenty-five years of age, and must not have entered to the Medical and Surgical Practice of any London medical school.
One Junior Open Scholarship in Science, value £150, and One Preliminary Scientific Exhibition, value £50, will be awarded to the best candidates under twenty years of age (if of sufficient merit) in Physics, Chemistry, Animal Biology, and Vegetable Biology.
The Jeaffreson Exhibition (value £30) will be competed for at the same time. The subjects of examination are Latin, Mathematics, and any one of the three following languages—Greek, French, and German.
The Classical subjects are those of the London University Matriculation
Examination of July, 1897.

The successful candidates in all these Scholarships will be required to enter to the full course at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in the October succeeding the Examination.
For particulars, application may be made, personally or by letter, to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, E.C.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.
SYSTEMATIC COURSES of LECTURES and LABORATORY
WORK in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on OCTOBER 1st, and continue till July, 1898.
Fee for the Whole Course, £21, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or Single Subjects may be taken.
There is a special Class for the January Examination.
For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College,
St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.
A Handbook forwarded on application.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 24th SESSION of the DEPARTMENT of SCIENCE, TECH-NOLOGY, and ARTS will begin on OCTOBER 5, and the 67th
SESSION of the SCHOOL of MEDICINE on OCTOBER 1, 1897.
The Classes prepare for the following professions—Chemistry, Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering, Coal Mining,
Textile Industries, Dyeing, Leather Manufacture, Agriculture, School
Teaching, Medicine, and Surgery.
University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts, Science, Medicine, and Surgery.
Lyddon Hall has been established for Students' Residence.
Prospectus of any of the above may be had from the REGISTRAR.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES, ABERYSTWYTH.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the post of Temporary ASSISTANT LECTURER in the DEPARTMENT of GREEK. The Lecturer will be required to undertake part of the work of the Department during the Session 1897-8, being the term of office of the Principal—who is also Professor of Greek—as Vice-Chancellor of the University of Wales.
Applications, with Testimonials, should be sent not later than Wednesday, September 16th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LECTURES ON ZOOLOGY.
The GENERAL COURSE of LECTURES by Professor W. F. R.
WELDON, F.R.S., will commence on WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 5th,
at 1 p.m.
These Lectures are suited to the requirements of Students preparing for the Examinations of the London University, as well as to those of Students wishing to study Zoology for its own sake. Notice of other Courses of Lectures, to be delivered during the Session, will be given later.
J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—An EXAMINATION for FILLING UP about TWENTY VACANCIES on the Foundation will be held on the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 20th SEPTEMBER
NEXT.—For information apply to the BURSAR, St. Paul's School,
West Kensington, W.

JOURNALISTIC PUPIL.—Would be thoroughly
taught the commercial, printing, and editorial work of a newspaper and general printing office. With his intelligent co-operation would be made daily qualified to take charge of a similar business.
Moderate premium, which, supplemented, would be returned as progressive salary. Must write shorthand. May reside with editor or proprietor.—Address M. M., care of Messrs. Passmore & Cooke, Avon
Lodge, West Kensington, W.

TO WEALTHY PATRONS of ART and BELLES
LETTRES.—A Gentleman engaged in producing a GREAT
WORK, indispensable to Students of English Literature throughout
the civilized world, requires FINANCING to a very moderate extent.
The Work has met, so far as it has at present gone, with the highest approval of eminent experts. Guaranteed sale of small edition.—
Apply by letter (Principals or Solicitors only) to X., care of Messrs.
Steedman & Van Praagh, Solicitors, 23, Old Broad Street, London, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN AND SPANISH BOOKS.TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the
houses of Subscribers) from TWO GUINEAS per annum.COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.
N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of
Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL,
SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and
FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH,
GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited.

30—34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.
46, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

PATRON—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

PRESIDENT—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

VICE-PRESIDENTS—Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, the Very Rev.
the DEAN of LLANDAFF, HERBERT SPENCER, Esq., Sir
HENRY BARKLY, K.C.B.
TREASURER—Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF
Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart. M.P., Right Hon. EARL
of ROSEBURY.

The Library contains about 170,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in Various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life-
Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country, and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room Open from 10 to half-past 6. CATALOGUE, Fifth Edition, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.
C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

TYPE-WRITING work of every description done
with accuracy and despatch. Author's MSs., Technical and Legal Copying, Indexing, Specifications, Tracing, Translating,
Addressing, Type-written Mimeographed Copies, &c., &c.—The Misses
E. & J. PUTT, 435, Mansion House Chambers, London, E.C.

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND &amp; CO.,

ART REPRODUCERS,

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.
Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of
HERR HANFSTAENGL, of Munich.

The well-known Artist in PHOTODUPLICATION now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary
Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes
in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation
and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND &amp; CO. invite attention to their

Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process

For the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSs.,
Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book
Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c.,
&c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application.

Offices: 4, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

EDITED BY W. L. COURTNEY.

SEPTEMBER.

THE UNKNOWN GOD. By WILLIAM WATSON.
 THE UNRECOGNISED ESSENCE OF DEMOCRACY. By W. H. MALLOCK.
 GEORGES DARIEN. By OUIDA.
 DÜRER'S VISIT to the NETHERLANDS. By Sir W. MARTIN COWLEY.
 THE MODERN FRENCH DRAMA.—III. By AUGUSTIN FILO.
 GIBRALTAR as a WINTER RESORT. By J. LOWRY WHITTLE.
 CRICKET OLD and NEW. By FREDERICK GALE.
 PEASANTS of ROMAGNA. By EVELYN MARCH PHILLIPS.
 THE SCIENCE of MEANING. By Prof. J. P. POSTGATE.
 A ROYAL SLAVE. By Lady WELBY.
 THE SPEED of WARSHIPS. By RALPH GEORGE HAWTREY.
 SOCIALISM in FRANCE from 1874-96. By PAUL LAFARGUE.
 THE COMMISSION on AGRICULTURE. By FRANCIS ALLSTON CHAMBERS, M.P.
 THE CLONDYKE GOLD FIELDS (with Map). By MARK S. WADE, M.P.
 THE GERMAN EMPEROR'S FOREIGN POLITICS.

CHAPMAN'S MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY OSWALD CRAWFORD.

Price Sixpence.

The SEPTEMBER Number contains the continuation of MISS VIOLET HUNT'S NEW NOVEL,
UNKIST, UNKIND!
 And Nine Complete Stories by
 W. L. ALDEN, HAROLD E. GORRY, LEONARD OUTRAM, E. FOSTER, MARK
 EASTWOOD, H. MANTLEY, R. GULL, JOSEPH STRANGE, &c.
 CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., London.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 968.—SEPTEMBER, 1897.—2s. 6d.

MRS. OLIPHANT as a NOVELIST.—THE POLITICAL PRISONERS in SIBERIA, by J. Y. SIMPSON.—To MARGUERITE, by Walter Hogg.—DARIEL: A ROMANCE OF SURREY, by R. D.
 Blackmore.—HERALDRY in PRACTICAL POLITICS, by Sir
 Herbert Maxwell, Bart.—A CORNER OF WEST NORFOLK.—
 THE TWO TRAGEDIES: A NOTE, by Professor Saintsbury.—
 BAYREUTH: 1897, by Ian Malcolm, M.P.—THE BRITISH SOLDIER as a PLAGUE COMMISSIONER, by Major-General
 W. Tweedie, O.S.I.—HER SILENCE, by F. A. Howden.—
 DURING THE ARMISTICE: IMPRESSIONS OF THE WAR, by Walter B. Harris.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD &amp; SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER.

WEeping FERRY. Prologue and I.-VI. By MARGARET L. WOODS,
 Author of "A Village Tragedy," &c.
 TWO MONTHS in SOKOTRA. By ERNEST N. BENNETT.
 HE FELL AMONG THIEVES. By HENRY NEWBOLT.
 THE HISTORY of my PROCKS. By K.
 A GAME of CHESS. By L. B. WALFORD.
 A HAMPSHIRE COMMON. By G. A. B. DEWAR.
 THE AMERICAN RANCHMAN. By J. R. E. SUMNER.
 AT the SIGN of the SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN &amp; CO.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
LONDON,

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
 PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
 OF
 FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the
GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

Embracing almost the whole of the Masterpieces of the Great Artists of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, and rich in examples of the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, German, French,
 and Spanish Schools of Painting.

BRITISH ARTISTS of the VICTORIAN ERA.

Through the courtesy of the owners, the Autotype Company are enabled to publish Autotype Reproductions of several important works lately exhibited at the Corporation of London Art Gallery, Guildhall. The Series includes notable examples of:

J. M. W. TURNER, R.A. D. G. ROSSSETTI.
 DAVID COX. F. SANDS.
 FRED WALKER, A.R.A. J. PETTIE, R.A.
 S. COOPER, R.A. ETC.

The Reproductions, printed in permanent sepia pigments, measure about 18 inches longest line, and are sold at the uniform price of 12s. each.

SELECTED PICTURES from the PARIS SALONS.

A NEW SERIES of REPRODUCTIONS of
 FAMOUS WORKS in the NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

THE ENGLISH SCHOOL of LANDSCAPE PAINT-ING.

Autotypes after TURNER, CONSTABLE, GIRTIN, COTMAN, CHROME,
 DAVID COX, CLARKSON STANFIELD, OSCAR LAWSON, etc., etc.
 Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproductions of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autogravures of all Schools now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples of specially designed patterns made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists post free on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
 74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

The SEPTEMBER Number ready next week.

COSMOPOLIS:

An International Review.

EDITED BY F. ORTMANS.

Price 2s. 6d.—CONTENTS.

THE UNSEEN HELMSMAN .. ..	LAURENCE ALMA TADEMA.
ROYALTIES.—II. .. ..	Right Hon. F. MAX MÜLLER.
THE IDEALIST MOVEMENT and POSITIVE SCIENCE: an Ex- perience .. ..	LADY DILKE.
CURRENT GERMAN LITERATURE ..	JOHN G. ROBERTSON.
ROSNY and the ANALYTICAL NOVEL in FRANCE .. ..	VERNON LEE.
THE GLOBE and the ISLAND .. ..	HENRY NORMAN.
PERE et FILS .. ..	ÉDOUARD ROD.
SOUVENIRS d'un SLAVOPHILE .. ..	LOUIS LÉGER.
ADAM MICKIEWICZ .. ..	STANISLAS RZEWUSKI.
EN GRÈCE (Suite et fin) .. ..	JEAN MORLAS.
LETTERES INÉDITES, Publiées par E. Halperine-Kaminsky .. ..	IVAN TOURGUENEFF.
REVUE du MOIS .. ..	FRANCIS DE PRESANER.
HIMMLISCHE und IRDISCHE FLAMMEN .. ..	MARIA JANITSCHER.
ERINNERUNGEN an JOSEPH MAZZINI .. ..	MALWIDA VON MEYENBUD.
DIE KUNSTENTWICKLUNG und das GENIE .. ..	HENRY THODE.
DIE KYNIKER .. ..	THEODOR COMPERE.
RUSSISCHE DICHTUNG und KULTUR II. (Schluss) .. ..	LOU ANDREAS-SALOMÉ.
POLITISCHES in DEUTSCHER BELEUCHTUNG .. ..	"ISVOTOL."

OUIDA'S NEW NOVEL.

AN ALTRUIST. Second Edition.

Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"If 'An Altruist' had been published anonymously, we should all be saying that here was a terrific satirist, a new novelist with a very striking talent."—Referee.

NEW EDITION.

MRS. KEITH'S CRIME. By Mrs.

W. K. CLIFFORD. With Frontispiece by the Hon. J. Collier.

Cloth, 6s.

"Is certainly the strongest book that Mrs. W. K. Clifford has given to the public. It is probably, too, the most popular."—World.

BARDS of the GAEL and GALL.

A Volume of Verse, Collected and Edited by Dr. GEORGE SIGERSON. With Photogravure Portrait of the Blind Irish Bard, Carolan. Cloth, 10s. 6d.

"It is the work of one who knows.... But Dr. Sigerson, as the crown of his knowledge has feeling, imagination, taste. He has Celtic scholarship, he possesses the art of poetry, and to these he adds the scientific habit of mind.... The result is a work of extreme interest and no small importance."—Academy.

THE CYCLOPEDIA of NAMES.

Size of Volume, 13 in. x 9 1/2 in. x 2 1/2 in. Cloth, £2 2s.

"Deserves to rank with important works of reference, for its facts can be quickly found, and are admirably chosen."—Standard.

NEW EDITION.

INMATES of MY HOUSE and GARDEN. By Mrs. BRIGHTWEN. Many Illustrations.

Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The work will be read with pleasure by all who feel any sympathy with animated nature."—Daily News.

READY NEXT WEEK.

THE FIRST VOLUME of a NEW SERIES.

BUILDERS of GREATER BRITAIN.

Edited by H. F. WILSON, formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. With Photogravure Frontispiece. A Set of Ten Volumes, large crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. each.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH. By Martin

A. S. HUME, Author of "The Courtships of Queen Elizabeth," "The Year After the Armada," &c. With Maps and Photogravure Frontispiece.

GREECE in the NINETEENTH CEN-

TURY. By LEWIS SERGEANT. 24 Illustrations and Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. [Next week.]

TWO NEW NOVELS.

Each crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A POACHING ROMANCE.

THE PEOPLE of OLOPTON. By

GEORGE BARTRAM. [Next week.]

A GEORGIAN ROMANCE.

THE TEMPLE of FOLLY: a Novel

By PAUL CRESWICK. [Next week.]

LONDON:

T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS*A NEW AMERICAN NOVEL.

Twenty-five Thousand Copies have already been Sold in America.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN.

Price 6s.

SPEAKER.—"It is, in plain English, a beautiful book."
ACADEMY.—"The Choir Invisible' is a fine achievement."

GUARDIAN.—"One of those rare books that will bear reading many times."
DAILY NEWS.—"Mr. J. L. Allen shows himself a delicate observer and a fine literary artist in 'The Choir Invisible.'"

Second Edition, now ready.

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA.

By OLIVE BIGHAM, Special Correspondent of the Times. Part I. ASIA MINOR. Part II. PERSIA, North to South. Part III. TURKISH ARABIA.
 Part IV. PERSIA, West to East. Part V. CENTRAL ASIA.

SPECTATOR.—"One of the most interesting books of travel we have read for a long time."

With Illustrations and Maps, 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

WITH the TURKISH ARMY in THESSALY. By OLIVE BIGHAM, Special Correspondent of the Times, Author of "A Ride Through Western Asia."

MORNING POST.—"Deserves to be widely read."

VOLUME III. AND PART XII. NOW READY FOR DELIVERY TO SUBSCRIBERS.

LIFE of NAPOLEON BONAPARTE.

By Professor W. M. SLOANE, Ph.D., L.H.D.
 Illustrated. In 20 Parts, at 4s. net each; or in 4 vols., at 24s. net each. Supplied only in Sets. Also ready, Vols. I. and II., and Parts I-11.

Subscriptions (sent through a Bookseller) will be received at any time, and the Volumes or Parts delivered at such intervals as may be convenient to the Subscriber.

ILLUSTRATED STANDARD NOVELS.

NEW VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, antique paper, 3s. 6d.; "Peacock"
 Edition, gilt sides, back, and edges, 5s.

MASTERMAN READY; or, The Wreck of the "Pacific." Written for Young People.

 By Captain MARRYAT. With Illustrations by FRED
 PEGRAM, and an Introduction by DAVID HANNAY.

Now ready.—Shilling Cloth Edition of

CHARLES KINGSLEY'S

WESTWARD HO! HEReward the WAKE.
 TWO YEARS AGO. ALTON LOCKE.
 YEAST. HYPATIA.

Medium 8vo, 1s. each.

SEPTEMBER NUMBER. Price 1s.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

1. THE SURRENDER of NAPOLEON, from Unpublished Letters by Sir HUMPHREY SEYMOUR, R.N.
2. THE GREEKS and their LESSON. By ARTHUR GAYE.
3. HATS and HAT-WORSHIP.
4. IN the GUARDIANSHIP of GOD. By Mrs. STEEL.
5. SOME NOTES on CHESS. By GEORGE H. ELL.
6. THE CRAZE of the COLOURED PRINT.
7. AT the CONVENT of YUSTE. By CHARLES EDWARDS.
8. THE DUEL in FRANCE.
9. A CHAPTER of ACCIDENTS. By Mrs. FRANK.

(Conclusion.)

SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE,

Illustrated, price 1s. 4d.,

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—
 GLIMPSES of GLADSTONE. With Sketches from Life, by HARRY FURNISS.
 CRUELTY in the CONGO FREE STATE. Extracts from the Journal of E. J. GLAVE.
 AN ADVENTURE with a DOG and a GLACIER. A Tale of Alaska. By JOHN MUIR.

SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

ST. NICHOLAS MAGAZINE,

Illustrated, price 1s.,

Contains, besides many Stories and Articles—
 FLOATING FIRE-ENGINES. By C. T. HILL.
 STORIES of ELEPHANTS. By MARIA A. MILLIE.
 A SOAP-BUBBLE and its SECRETS. By JACOB F.
 BUCHER.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS:	PAGE
Walt Whitman, the Man ... ..	159
Sir Walter Raleigh ... ..	160
Poetry and Prefaces... ..	161
The Evolution of the Free Library ... ..	163
Naval Gunnery ... ..	163
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ... ..	163
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ... ..	165
NOTES AND NEWS ... ..	165
LITERARY HAMPSHIRE ... ..	166
PARIS LETTER ... ..	167
THE BOOK MARKET ... ..	168
DRAMA ... ..	169
SCIENCE ... ..	169
BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED ... ..	170
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ... ..	57-60

REVIEWS.

WALT WHITMAN, THE MAN.

Calamus: a Series of Letters written during the Years 1868-1880 by Walt Whitman to a Young Friend (Peter Doyle). Edited, with an Introduction, by Richard Maurice Bucke, M.D., one of Whitman's Literary Executors. (Boston: Laurens Maynard.)

IT is the fate of big, breezy, kindly natures to have rather tiresome admirers, and Walt Whitman is no exception. Whitmaniacs are not good to live with. The band of enthusiasts who devote their lives to the expansion of his philosophy in America, whose organ is the Conservator of Philadelphia, have the best intentions but no humour. After perusing one number of the Conservator, it is possible to come away a little frightened of their prophet. A better way is to read Leaves of Grass pure and simple, and let the commentators and illustrators and improvers go. Walt Whitman needs no gloss. Everything that he wished to say he said as clearly as might be; and once the reader can overcome his antipathy to the boisterous, unkept manner, once his ear is willing continually to be balked of music, there is the generous tingling message of democracy glowing before him. Walt Whitman was, more than any other writer, impatient of intermediaries: he wished to be alone with his reader, just you and he.

Whitman's imitators—even Mr. Carpenter, who has a true message of his own—are very trying, and for the most part his celebrators are apt to give false impressions. We except John Burroughs and W. D. O'Connor, both of whom understood the fulness of the man, but the majority of those who write with enthusiasm of Whitman do him injustice. He was more normal, more reasonable, than they would have us suppose: much more a man like unto his fellows. It is because these letters to Peter Doyle, and more especially Peter Doyle's narrative, emphasise this fact—adjust the balance, as it were—that we welcome Calamus. It is an illumination, a revelation. It is well for Whitman to stand aside from Whitmaniacs now and then. It is even more desirable that he should be defended from that other faction which calls him satyr and savage: for to most persons Whitman is either god or devil. This book shows him to have been neither, but a much better thing: a wholesome, simple-hearted, affectionate, keen-sighted, sweet-minded, impulsive, idle, tolerant, charitable, boyish, merry, vigorous old man; a passionate lover of humanity, of the open air, of the sea, of active moving life, of his country.

The book is valuable less for the letters than for the picture of Walt Whitman which is offered by Peter Doyle, his friend. At the time they met Whitman was a man close upon fifty, and Doyle a youth thirty years his junior. Whitman was a clerk in a Government office at Washington, Doyle was conductor of a tramcar. Whitman seems to have had a peculiar fondness for tramcars and ferries: they enabled him to indulge in his favourite pastime of observing moving masses of people, to be passive—to "loaf," to use one of his favourite words—in the midst of activity. There is something childlike, boyish, in this; and Whitman was much of a boy all through life. Where there was water he was always drawn to it, either to bathe or to sail, but inland he seems to have sought the cars. His letters are full of references to them, and messages to friends who were working upon them. Thus, he wrote from Camden, after his first paralytic seizure in 1873:

"I have become sort of acquainted with most of the carriers, ferrymen, car conductors, drivers, &c., &c. They are very good indeed—help me on and off the cars, here and in Philadelphia—they are nearly all young fellows—it all helps along."

And, again, from Brooklyn in 1870:

"I find myself going with the pilots muchly—there are several that were little boys, now grown up, and remember me well—fine hearty fellows—always around the water—sons of old pilots—they make much of me, and of course I am willing."

The young men always drew him; he could influence them, colour their potentialities; they were frank and fresh and spirited and unaffected. It was necessary to be natural, human, to attract Walt Whitman. In cultured society Whitman could hold his own, and did; but he went to it from curiosity, and his curiosity was soon satisfied. He wrote of the conversation of a certain literary set:

"I take a hand in, for a change. I find it entertaining, as I say, for novelty's sake, for a week or two—but I know very well that would be enough for me. It is all first rate, good and smart but too constrained and bookish for a free old hawk like me."

Whitman, at any rate at this time, in middle life, seems to have had few close friends. He loved boundlessly; he sympathised with most forms of human endeavour and human weakness; but he admitted few individuals to his holy of holies. Doyle was his chosen intimate. While this book was in preparation, Dr. Bucke and Mr. Traubel, the high priests of Whitmania, paid a visit to Peter Doyle and took from his lips his recollections of Whitman. They found Doyle very ready to talk. His words, almost as they were spoken, were recorded by Mr. Traubel, and subsequently Doyle revised the proofs. Hence we have a very interesting first-hand account of a remarkable friendship.

Peter Doyle's narrative is the gem of the book, a piece of real literature. He began with a few words about the cars:

"Walt rode with me often—often at noon, always at night. He rode round with me on the last trip—sometimes rode for several trips. Everybody knew him. He had a way of taking the measure of the driver's hands—had calf-skin gloves made for them every winter in Georgetown—these gloves were his personal presents to the men. He saluted the men on the other cars as we passed—threw up his hand. They cried to him, 'Hullo, Walt!' and he would reply, 'Ah, there!' or something like. He was welcome always as the flowers in May."

Subsequently Doyle gave a good reminiscence of Garfield and Whitman. Garfield's call of salutation to Whitman across the street was "After all, not to create only," the opening words of the "Song of the Exposition." "After all, not to create only," he would cry out in his large, manly voice, and then the two men would talk and talk and talk.

Here are other remarks of Peter Doyle's, not quite in the order in which he made them:

"I never knew a case of Walt's being bothered up by a woman. . . . Woman in that sense never came into his head. Walt was too clean, he hated anything which was not clean. No trace of any kind of dissipation in him. I ought to know about him those years—we were awful close together. . . . He had an easy, gentle way—the same for all, no matter who they were or what their sex. . . . He could shut a man off in the best style, you know. He had a freezing way in him—yet was never harsh. But people got to know that he meant what he said. . . . Walt's manners were always perfectly simple. We would tackle the farmers who came into town, buy a water-melon, sit down on the cellar door of Bacon's grocery . . . halve it and eat it. People would go by and laugh. Walt would only smile and say: 'They can have the laugh—we have the melon.' . . . He had pretty vigorous ideas on religion, but he never said anything alighting the church. . . . He never went to church—didn't like form, ceremonies—didn't seem to favour preachers at all. I asked him about the hereafter. 'There must be something,' he said, 'there can't be a locomotive unless there is somebody to run it.' I have heard him say that if a person was a right kind of person—and I guess he thought all persons right kind of persons—he couldn't be destroyed in the next world or this. . . . He seemed to have a positive dislike for tobacco. He was a very moderate drinker. . . . In his eating he was vigorous, had a big appetite, but was simple in his tastes, not caring for any great dishes. . . . Dollars and cents had no weight with Walt at all. He didn't spend recklessly, but he spent everything—mostly on other people. Money was a thing he didn't think of as other people thought of it. It came and went, that was all there was to it. He didn't buy many books, but I remember that he once bought a set of Alexander Dumas."

All this is just what is wanted. It shows us the unfamiliar side—the man day by day. It enables us to disentangle Walt Whitman from the web of illusion that hangs about him. Everything we learn of Peter Doyle tells us more of Walt Whitman and more of that section of Leaves of Grass called "Calamus." To some persons the tone of that section is objectionable: it can be so no longer after reading this little book.

The letters themselves are intrinsically no great literary treasure. They are affectionate, solicitous, hearty, bluff. Whitman had a paternal love for his young friend: he told him what seemed likely to interest him, now and then sent a book, or a paper containing something of his own, asked for news, often enclosed presents of money. This is a fair specimen letter:

"Brooklyn, Friday forenoon, March 22 [1872]. Dear Pete, I received your letter yesterday. Pete, you must be quite steady at work, and no time to spare. Well, perhaps it is just as satisfactory considering all things. The cold weather has just kept on here as before—cold enough all the time—and then a spell of damned bitter stinging cold every now and then extra—not one single mild warm day since I have been home—six weeks—I am middling well, go out some every day, but not much—Best thing is my cutting and sleeping—I fall back on them altogether—I sleep splendid, have a good bed, plenty of cover—get up pretty early though and make the fire, and set things agoing, before mother comes out—she has had some bad times with rheumatism etc.—one hand and arm quite disabled—still she is very cheerful, looks well in the face, and does more work cooking, etc, than most young women—We have grand breakfasts, buckwheat cakes, coffee, &c., eggs, &c.—just wish you could come in mornings and partake. We two always breakfast together, and it is first rate.—So you see I fall back upon sleeping and eating, (as I said).—Should be glad to see Parker Milburn—hope he will call to-day.—I send you a paper by mail.—Well, Pete, I believe that is all, this time. Good bye, my darling son.—So the new shirts turn out a success do they? I have a great mind to be jealous.—Give my love to Wash Milburn, Adrian Jones, and all the R.R. boys. Your loving old Walt."

Whitman subscribed himself in various ways: "Your loving comrade and father"; "Your affectionate comrade and father"; "Your loving father."

The letters, it will be seen, are not particularly quotable. We have made, however, a few short extracts which seem luminous. In 1868, Walt Whitman wrote to Doyle from New York concerning the enmity to Leaves of Grass in certain quarters:

"There are some venomous but laughable squibs occasionally in the papers. One said that I had received twenty-five guineas for a piece in an English magazine, but that it was worth all that for anyone to read it. Another, the World, said: 'Walt Whitman was in town yesterday carrying the blue cotton umbrella of the future' (it had been a drizzly forenoon)—so they go it. When they get off a good squib, however, I laugh at it just as much as anyone."

In the same year, when he was forty-nine, Whitman wrote as follows:

"The truth is Peter, that I am here at the present time mainly in the midst of female women, some of them young and jolly, and meet them most every evening in company, and the way in which this aged party comes up to the scratch and cuts out the youthful parties and fills their hearts with envy is absolutely a caution."

Given the foregoing passage with no name to it and no clue save that it was from a private letter, and who would put it down to Whitman? This sounds more characteristic:

"I am glad to hear what you wrote about your mother—everything about fellows' old mothers is interesting to me."

During the Franco-Prussian war he wrote:

"Of course you may know that the way the war turns out suits me to death—Louis Napoleon fully deserves his fate—I consider him by far the meanest scoundrel (with all his smartness) that ever sat on a throne. I make a distinction, however, I admire and love the French, and France as a nation—of all foreign nations, she has my sympathy first of all."

A little later he made a slight change in his tone:

"I find myself now far more for the French than I ever was for the Prussians—Then I propose to take my first drink with you when I return, in celebration of the pegging out of the Pope and all his gang of Cardinals and Priests—and entry of Victor Emmanuel into Rome, and making it the capital of the great independent Italian nation."

In 1873 Whitman had a paralytic stroke, and after that the tone of his letters is much less buoyant. He was brave and patient under his affliction. The following extract is from one of the last letters, dated 1879, written from St. Louis. It throws light on the relations between Whitman and the soldiers he nursed in hospital:

"I stopt some days at a town right in the middle of those Plains, in Kansas, on the Santa Fé road—found a soldier there who had known me in the war fifteen years ago—was married and running the hotel there—I had hard work to get away from him—he wanted me to stay all winter."

Yet though the letters are not brilliant they tell much concerning their author. Two things we learn very clearly from them: that Whitman's poems were works of deliberate architecture, and that he kept his poetry and his life distinct. To some extent we may attribute the careless, commonplace diction of these letters to the mental capacity of the man to whom they were addressed; but it would have been impossible to sustain so thoroughly a mediocre manner if it were not normal. Walt Whitman was a loafer in correspondence as in life. He took words as he took things—as they came; nor was he in his outlook in the least literary. He lived perfectly naturally, passing on from joy to joy, without at the time subjecting them to any analysis. Not till afterwards, when the pen was in his hand, was he conscious of how good they were. Before sitting down to write his poems he tightened himself up. In his conversation and correspondence with Doyle, his closest friend, he was as ordinary a high-spirited man as America possessed, giving no suggestion of his intellectual power and delicacy or his great gift of epithet. Yet his poems written at this time, notably the wonderful elegy on Lincoln, have exquisite collocations of words. Doyle tells us that Whitman sometimes would quote Shakespeare on their walks; and the following passage is interesting:

"Yes, Walt often spoke to me of his books

I would tell him, 'I don't know what you are trying to get at.' And this is the idea I would always arrive at from his reply. All other people in the world have had their representatives in literature: here is a great big race with no representative. He would undertake to furnish that representative. It was also his object to get a real human being into a book. This had never been done before."

It is worth remembering that at the time when Whitman in America was striving to put a real human being—a whole man—into a book, Thackeray was complaining in England that it might not be done. The "free old hawk" cared little for "might not."

We may take leave of Peter Doyle with the following extract, and the wish that his peace may not be much disturbed by admirers of Whitman who burn to know more:

"I have Walt's raglan here. I now and then put it on, lay down, think I am in the old times. Then he is with me again. It is the only thing I kept amongst many old things. When I fit it on and stretched out on the old sofa I am very well contented. It is like Aladdin's lamp. I do not ever for a minute lose the old man. He is always near by. When I am in trouble—in a crisis—I ask myself, 'What would Walt have done under these circumstances?' and whatever I decide Walt would have done that I do."

THE STANHOPE ESSAY.

Sir Walter Raleigh. The Stanhope Essay.
By John Buchan. (Blackwell.)

It is an old and not a very wise custom which requires the winner of an Oxford Prize Essay to print his work for the benefit of the public at large; and, as a rule, we should rebel against being expected to treat such lucubrations with the honours of a serious review. We are willing enough, however, to make an exception in the case of Mr. Buchan, whose Stanhope Essay on Sir Walter Raleigh shows maturity and critical insight considerably beyond the average, and who, indeed, has already won his spurs in the field of literature elsewhere. The life of Raleigh has before now tasked the endeavour of many competent pens, and Mr. Buchan does not attempt to bring to light any new biographical details. Little, in fact, needs to be added to the exhaustive and scholarly monograph published a few years ago by Mr. Stebbing. Mr. Buchan's aim is critical rather than in the stricter sense biographical. He wishes to get at the personality behind the career, to gather from the record of his varied deeds some conception of what manner of man Raleigh essentially was. Certainly a task worth accomplishing, for Raleigh, like his great contemporary, Sir Philip Sidney, presents us with a problem, the problem of the man whose reputation has outrun his achievement, whose impression, alike upon his own age and upon posterity, has proved more enduring than any of his specific actions are quite sufficient to explain or justify. Therefore, as Mr. Buchan points out, he becomes a most fascinating subject for the curious critic, "the psychologist of history, the lover of strange souls and mingled motives." We are unable to follow in detail Mr. Buchan's singularly patient and suggestive study of Raleigh's chequered career; it strikes us as an admirable and discriminating piece of work. While keenly alive to the idealism and general honesty of purpose that marked the man, the essayist does not slur over the frequent acts of treachery, cruelty, and greed that stain his name and grieve his admirers. Raleigh's "intellectual keynote," the quality which goes far to explain alike his brilliance and his ultimate ineffectiveness, Mr. Buchan finds in the very range and versatility of his interests. Soldier, courtier, explorer, monopolist, scientist, historian, poet: his energies were dissipated in the mere contemplation of the immense fields which his subtle and penetrating spirit yearned to conquer. For the dogged industry, which through a thousand small delays masters success, he had neither the patience nor the self-restraint. So far as he did accomplish anything outside the world of letters, it was as a navigator and coloniser, a pioneer of the greater Britain beyond the seas of which nowadays we babble so much. The sea, as Mr. Buchan points out, touched the fibre of romance in him:

"He had always something of that love of the free face of heaven, the salt wind, and the fierce delight of action, which is the glory of his race. Over him and his like the old glamour of the 'swan's path' had fallen in all its power. He and men of his kind at the very height of achievement in other spheres seem always weary for the sting of wind and rain and the ecstasy of motion. And for them in their toils there was a richer hope than for others of the craft in later times. For the world was not yet shorn and parcelled; treasure might still be looked for, portents awaited, and the white harbour-wall of the Devon town was the boundary of the unknown."

We doubt whether Mr. Buchan does justice to Raleigh's poetry when he speaks of it as "little above the level of a minor lyricist." The fragments of "Cynthia" we will surrender to Mr. Buchan at once: that was clearly a tour de force, written down to the level of Elizabeth's taste. But among the lesser poems there are at least half a dozen which are quite first-class and which strike an individual note. Raleigh stands halfway between Spenser and Donne, and misses the weaknesses of either. He is neither garrulous nor contorted, but simple, direct, and vigorous. A short specimen comes to hand in the following lines, which may serve also to confute the canard of Archbishop Abbot that Raleigh "questioned God's being and omnipotence":

"Even such is time, that takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, our all we have,
And pays us but with earth and dust;
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days;
But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
My God shall raise me up, I trust!"

As a satirist, too, Raleigh had a mordant wit. "The Lie" is unequalled in its generation, and the epitaph on the Earl of Leicester provoked King James to a devout hope that the author would not outlive him; a contingency, by the way, which he took measures, at a later period, to ensure.

POETRY AND PREFACES.

Optimus, and Other Poems. By M. R. S. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.)

A Divan of the Dales. By Swithin Saint Swithaine. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Fugitive Lines. By Henry Jerome Stockard. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

Selections from the Poems of Timothy Otis Paine. (G. P. Putnam's Sons.)

Saul: a Tragedy; and Other Poems. By Paul John. (Mowbray & Co.)

The Book of Tophi. By J. A. Goodchild. (Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.)

SHALL the poet be known by his preface? Lord Tennyson gave the affirmative. He went so far as to harbour a theory that a poet could be so known, even without regard to the quality of the preface, by its quantity alone. His own prose words, by way of explanation, were of the fewest; and when he took up the books which every younger poet save one sent to him, he had a habit of regarding any preface at all as a sure mark of minority; and by inverse ratio he roughly measured its length against the merit of the verse it heralded. The critic, especially the critic with a batch of off-season books of verse before him, may amuse himself by seeing how far astray so ready a method of reckoning may take him. A bird is known by its feathers; but not the bird's singing by its feathers. The poet himself is known by his preface; and, if his singing also is known by it, you have the double interest in the comparative study of the poetic and the human.

The plumages of the author of "Optimus" are at first sight a little perplexing. Her portrait, an adorning frontispiece, showing a fine maternal figure, certified at the age of thirty-three, is signed "Yours, with loving memories, The Author." The title-page, more confiding, assigns the authorship to "M. R. S."; and the binding, with an outburst of confidence, lets out the whole, M. R. Steadman. This coyness is carried out in the page which the author calls "Preface," but which conceals also a dedication: "I dedicate this collection of verses to my school-girls," it begins. The patient reader will learn that these school-girls were, rather than are; the author parted with them "in our Lecture Hall at Eastbourne in 1895." As for the verses, they were written so long ago as between the years 1858 and 1869. Indeed, the author, now nothing coy, gives the individual date of each, as well as the name of the town that saw its birth, Leyton, Cromer, Woodford, and the rest. The old pupils, she thinks, "will not look for either artistic perfection or intellectual greatness in these verses, as when I wrote them I was, perhaps, too young to write well." Further frankness discovers to the reader that the reason for the publication of these verses at last is that the author is "not very well off for money," and that money is needed to carry on a good work which this book may therefore help; a pathetic piece of human optimism, surely. There is a second reason, which is that "having just read them over, after they have been locked away in an old box so many years, they have touched my heart, old as that heart is, and I should like to share them with younger hearts to-day." You may know exactly the quality of the poetry that is so explained. The preface is no superfluity; for the verse, sentimental, facile, and not profitable for quotation, would not stand alone.

The verses of the author of A Divan of the Dales, which come to us prefaceless, reach a much higher mark of execution, all to the confirmation of the Tennysonian legend. We have, however, a rhymed poem, in which the author appears at his worst, and a dedication, in which he is unequal. The directness of the inscription to his mother—

"For thou hast taught me more in deed, Than I may hope to teach in word"—

does not find an answering sanity in the companion lines:

"Since thou art worthier than a lord,
That owns a thousand-acred herd."

The first poem, "Micah," is the best. It is a story of misunderstood love, hackneyed in fact, but fresh in feeling. We take from it an allusion to autumn:

"And with the falling of the light,
The creeper died upon the porch;
The sun was low by day; the torch
Upon the window flared at night.

"The apple tumbled from the tree;
The orchard bowed unto the ground;
A sigh was heard in every sound
Upon the land, upon the sea.

"The leaves fell curling in the air;
The flowers lay down upon the grass;
And Nature covered up her face
While death was walking over her."

In such poems as "The Fellowship of Men," this poet with a name that is too fanciful for serious quotation shows himself a serious person; although, of course, he is doing little more than diffusing, in two ways, the motive of Rossetti's sonnet on "Refusal of Aid Between Nations."

Mr. Stockard's pretty little volume from the Knickerbocker Press is unprefaced, and has the briefest of dedications—"To my wife." The verses are all to the point, if it is only a little one. If they are not imaginative or even fanciful, they are never mawkish or foolish. Our preference for quotation lies with lines that incidentally show the author to be modest and to know the man with whom lies mastery:

"My fountain-pen with which I write
This would-be poetry to-night
Was bought me by my children dear
With pennies picked up here and there,
Each one contributing a mite.

"And now they claim that, in their sight,
I make a rondeau to requite
Them for the present given me here—
My fountain-pen.

"O, Muse! I'm in a sorry plight.
Come to my aid! Help me indite
The lines they crave, for I declare
That fitting thoughts are nowhere near.
For once endow with Dobson's sleight
My fountain-pen."

From the same Press come the Selections from the Poems of Timothy Otis Paine, a volume of which the preface is the main-spring. The late writer of the verses, who was a pastor and an archæologist, is introduced to us by a member of his family, "S. W. P.," in words that are endearing. Mr. Paine was an enthusiastic student of the Egyptian Book of the Dead; of the arrangement of the speaking stones of Solomon's Temple; of "the visions of God in Ezekiel, and in them I do know something—near—I know Ezekiel's heart." He knew other things, for he looked Nature straight in the face. "He even caught the reflection of a violet in the clear eyes of the grazing cow." Rather than quote one of the simple and not exceptionally observant stanzas, we take another sentence from the discreet preface, in allusion to the life of use and of enthusiasm which the poet led: "No more could this life be attained had he not had a home in which he found perfect sympathy, rest, and renewal; a home where he received as he gave, and where he still gives from beyond."

Of Saul: a Tragedy, there need be nothing said except that its publication is one, although no preface in this case strikes any note of friendly warning. In The Book of Tophi, Mr. J. A. Goodchild, in a preface which is all pertinent and informing, declares that his "own rough and erroneous reproduction of the main features of a story which has deeply influenced the national, clerical, and literary history not merely of Celtdom, but of all non-Selavonic Europe, is chiefly based upon the excellent modern translations of Messrs. Standish O'Grady, Whitby [sic] Stokes, and others."

He has made good use of his material, with a ready command of diction that accords well with it. To Maistie comes a guest, "a Canaanite from the South." This is Grisbane, who is thus described:

"A poppy bloomed in her mouth;
Her eyes danced sapphire sparkles. A baal-fire gleamed in her hair
Of ruby and gold and amber, for the woman was very fair,
Skilled in the twisting of tiars or stringing gems for the neck,
And her own was white as hawthorn. On her snowy arms no speck
Was discerned on their round whiteness; but evil of heart was she,
And skilled in unholy cunning, knowing the fruit of the tree
Which is harmful, and herbs that are deadly, and fashioning charms thereof
To slay the spirit of man or kindle his soul to love."

Mr. Goodchild is equal to the task of producing a narrative 250 pages long in rhymed language as competent as that.

AN excellent anthology of our national lyrical poetry is published on the authority of a Transatlantic student, Mr. Frederic Ives Carpenter, Lecturer on English Literature at the University of Chicago. His English Lyrical Poetry (Blackie & Sons) does not pass beyond the two rich centuries, 1500 to 1700, during which the chorus of lyricism was multitudinous—silence, complete or merely interrupted, keeping both gates of that vocal bower. It is only of late years that the general reader has been asked to take a literary interest in any but the greater names among the Elizabethan, Jacobean, and Caroline poets. Mr. Palgrave, with his Golden Treasury, moved scores of volumes from the upper shelves to the drawing-room table; but he seemed to be somewhat shy of trusting much to the reader's care for those former centuries, so that the nineteenth century takes up a proportionally large space of his small volume. Later anthologists do well to show more courage and to give readers credit for having liberal admiration and interest ready for the work of poets whose names they had not been educated to revere and had indeed hardly heard years ago—Thomas Campion and Henry Vaughan among the number. The work of the anthologist is of twofold value. He gains readers for what ought to be read, and indirectly he cuts off what ought not to be read, and makes it unnecessary, for young students at any rate, to touch the pitch that lies thick upon the words of nine out of ten of our older lyrists. From this Mr. Carpenter, who rightly has not feared to print Spenser's "Epithalamion," of course keeps his book free, and in the literary sense his choice is excellent, erring, if at all, by too much inclusion—a safe fault.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE FREE LIBRARY.

The Free Library: its History and Present Condition. By John J. Ogle. (George Allen.)

MR. OGLE's book is the first volume of "The Library Series." The lay reader may be pardoned for thinking it "dry" on sight, but not for failing in an honest attempt to extract interest from its pages. At the outset Mr. Ogle removes, without specifically proposing to do so, the common impression that Free Libraries owe their existence to a mere Act of Parliament passed forty years ago. We are not a spasmodic people, and it would be strange if free libraries had dropped from the clouds, or been devised on a sudden by a few gentlemen with an idea. To glance back on the history of libraries in this country is to see Free Libraries coming far along the road. By the beginning of the seventeenth century private owners of libraries had become not only numerous, but generous. Norwich received a library by bequest in 1608. Five years later Bristol was given a library by Dr. Toby Matthew, Archbishop of York, and by citizen Robert Redwood. It is there to this day. Leicester has had a Free Library since 1632, which still does its work, though not under the Free Libraries Act adopted by that town in 1870.

Moreover, Free Libraries were actually proposed two centuries ago. In 1699 one James Kirkwood, a Scottish minister, issued anonymously (the scheme was, perhaps, too magnificent for signature) "An Overture for Founding and Maintaining of Bibliotheks in every Paroch throughout the Kingdom." It is amusing to note that three years later the same gentleman issued a pamphlet of a less ambitious scope: this was merely "A Copy of a Letter anent a Project for Erecting a Library in every Presbytery or at least County in the Highlands." It is nothing less than surprising to find that Kirkwood's efforts resulted in a resolution, passed in 1704 by the General Assembly "about the ordering and preserving of libraries in the Highlands and Islands." We may be mistaken, but we doubt if this has been noted by the various editors of Johnson's Tour in the Hebrides; yet few facts throw more light on the culture which surprised Johnson in Scotland, and made his visit so acceptable in its remotest districts.

A curious and accidental development in the history of Free Libraries also took place in England. Dr. Bray, founder of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, happened to be collecting funds for sending missionaries to America. He was told (and the significant thing is simply that "he was told") that England wanted libraries more than Americans wanted missionaries. Wiser than Mrs. Jellyby, he gave heed to this council, which "led him to collect funds for and establish libraries in various parts of the country while persecuting his mission work." These and similar facts brought forward by Mr. Ogle are really new to the public, whose knowledge of library history in the eighteenth century is confined to the foundation of the British Museum. This event, of course, had a great forwarding influence on the establishment of local public libraries. The Commission on Free Libraries, which sat from 1849 to 1851, was directly influenced from Great Russell Street.

Later, Lyceums and Athenæums were born up and down the country. The Liverpool Lyceum, which still flourishes, was founded in 1758, only five years after the British Museum. Mr. Ogle mentions the system of village libraries, which obtained in Scotland quite early in the present century. The plan was a curious anticipation of some proposals made by Mr. Stead a year or two ago, to send boxes, each containing fifty books, from village to village. The multiplication of Mechanics' Institutes in the twenties, thirties, and forties of the present century was such that on the very eve of the Free Library era they numbered four hundred, and possessed between 300,000 and 400,000 books, with a lending circulation of more than a million. This, be it remembered, was twenty-one years before Compulsory Education. In 1850 came Ewart's Act, which provided for the erection of free libraries under the same conditions as museums, but so far as the Act went the museums were left without specimens and the libraries without books. The expansion and perfecting of the Free Library system after this date are the subject of Mr. Ogle's four succeeding chapters. It is curious to note the order in which the towns of the United Kingdom have adopted the Free Library Acts. Norwich led the way; it adopted Ewart's Act, two months after it was passed, by a huge majority. Who would have supposed that Winchester would have taken the second place in the procession of adoptions? Yet it did, to be followed by Bolton, Manchester, Oxford, Liverpool, Blackburn, Sheffield, Cambridge and Ipswich. The first London adoption took place in 1856 in Westminster. Seventeen years elapsed before a second Metropolitan Free Library was heard of at Wandsworth. Fifty-one London parishes, forming thirty-six "areas of adoption," have now come into the fold, but the unwilling ones include the wealthy districts of St. Marylebone, St. Pancras, St. Mary, Islington, Paddington and St. James. Glasgow now provides the most flagrant case of rejection. But the rejecting towns show like patches of sand that turn themselves into futile and temporary islands as the tide rushes on.

Mr. Ogle has made a rather poor attempt to state who are the authors most favoured in various libraries. Many librarians, he says, assert that it is not possible to name the six most popular authors in their libraries. Concerning the tastes of London readers, we have a not very convincing note to the effect that "probably" Mrs. Wood and Miss Corelli lead the way in Fiction, and that of serious writers Carlyle, Ruskin, Darwin, and Dean Farrar are most read; the tastes of provincial readers are seldom noted. But Mr. Ogle has given a full yet succinct account of a great and rapid movement, and to his brother librarians his book will be useful as a compendious history of their profession.

A NAVAL HANDBOOK.

Naval Gunnery. By Capt. H. Garbett, R.N. (George Bell & Sons.)

THE fourth volume of the interesting series of "Navy Handbooks" which Messrs. George Bell are publishing has at last appeared, nearly six months later than it had been expected. The reason for the delay, however, is clearly apparent. The book is larger and, in a sense, more ambitious than its predecessors. Whereas the volumes dealing with Engines and Torpedoes extended each to about 260 pp., the Handbook on Naval Gunnery, which Capt. Garbett has just written, fills no less than one hundred pages more, and is illustrated with a very large number of photographs and diagrams. The increase in size, however, was, perhaps, inevitable. The Science of Naval Gunnery is divided into so many departments, and covers such a large field of knowledge, that the wonder is that Capt. Garbett has managed to deal properly with it in so small a space. It must be remembered that ammunition and ordnance, not to mention other numerous subjects, each fill voluminous service text-books, and this is the first occasion in which any serious attempt has been made to condense all these subjects into the compass of one small volume. The author has certainly succeeded in his task to a remarkable degree, and we confidently predict that his book will be gratefully welcomed by the service at large, and more especially by those officers who from time to time are called upon to go through a "short course" on the Excellent or Cambridge. The navy is full of science, and our ships are nothing less than huge boxes of intricate machinery, while every day finds the education of a naval officer becoming more and more arduous. The handbooks which Messrs. Bell are now publishing will thus prove of the greatest assistance, for while saving a harassing study of the service text-books, they will afford as complete an insight into the different departments of naval science as any officer, except the specialists, can ever hope to obtain. At the same time, that largely increasing portion of the general public who now take a keen interest in naval matters, will find in the book a plainly written description of one of the most interesting and important features of naval warfare.

Nine chapters are devoted to the subject of guns, beginning with the ancient cannon, or "crakys of war" of the time of Edward III., and continuing right on through the history of ordnance up to the latest development of quick-firing gun. The author, however, very wisely refrains from attempting to deal to any full extent with the older patterns, but instead brings his readers quickly to a consideration of the latter-day muzzle-loaders, many of which are still to be found on board our second-class battle-ships, and the different forms of breech-loading guns. It was not until 1864 that any serious attempt was made to increase the penetration and power of our guns, but in that year, owing to the adoption of armour-plating to war vessels, it became absolutely necessary for an advance to be made. After a long series of experiments, smooth-bore ordnance was finally condemned to make way for rifled guns, and at last, in 1879, the breech-loading system was properly introduced. Since then the science of gunnery has advanced by leaps and bounds. Perhaps its greatest triumph is the feat performed lately by wire-wound guns at Shoeburyness, which when placed at an elevation of 40° can fire a shell to a height of three miles, and hit at a distance of twelve miles, the time of flight taking just over a minute! To those who have a taste for mechanics the book should be of absorbing interest. The delicate working of the breech mechanism, the process of gun manufacture, the ingenious methods of loading, the construction of different forms of fuses, and many other triumphs of mechanical skill are dealt with in an elementary and plainly worded manner.

The chapters on powder and projectiles are also brought well up-to-date, though the one dealing with armour necessarily omits any mention of the wonderful trials recently carried out with a special nickel-steel plate four inches thick, when projectiles fired from a five-inch breech-loading gun, with a muzzle velocity of 1,406 feet per second, simply splashed on its face without effecting any indentation whatever. The science of naval gunnery is a fascinating subject for anyone who takes the trouble to master it even to a merely elementary degree, and Captain Garbett's book will enable the average reader to do this in the pleasantest manner possible. The excellent style of printing and illustration which formed such an attractive feature in the earlier volumes is fully maintained in this latest one,

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

The English Constitution: a Commentary on its Nature and Growth. By Jesse Macy, M.A., Professor of Political Science in Iowa College. (Macmillan & Co.)

THIS work is an attempt to translate into American forms of speech standard English descriptions of the British Constitution, and is the result of the author's experience in trying to interest American college students in the study of the political institutions of the mother-country. The book suffers somewhat from the necessity under which Mr. Macy finds himself of constantly reminding his hearers that Great Britain is, after all, a free country, and this leads him somewhat to under-rate the influence which is exercised in our public affairs both by the Crown and the House of Lords. Still, he has much to say which is of interest and value for the English reader. The stress which is laid on certain phases of our political system serves to emphasise in a new way the importance of the changes in which the nation has learned to acquiesce. To take an obvious instance—the exercise by Parliament of both executive and legislative powers is a startling novelty to the American student, and a treatment of this subject which is adequate in his case can hardly help leaving the British reader with some clearer ideas on the subject. Again, take a case which is less familiar—the controlling power which the American courts so constantly exercise over both the Federal and State Legislatures. The contrast between the direct action of the American courts and the indirect powers of English judges, through their powers of interpreting a statute, forces the British reader to reflect, as perhaps he has not done before, upon the precise limitations within which judge-made law exists in England, and then to recognise that even this apparently distinctive feature of the American Constitution, the power of a court of competent jurisdiction to veto the action of the Legislatures, has a British origin. The chapters are not of equal value, but the book as a whole may be commended as a thoughtful and scholarly piece of work.

The Worship of Lucifer. By Mina Sandeman. (Digby, Long & Co.)

AN attempt to exploit further the doings of the imaginary sect of Satanists upon which M. Huysmans has already founded a powerful, unpleasant romance. One Perkyns, a South African millionaire, hires a haunted grange for the greater convenience of the worship of Satan, being instigated thereto by his companion, a Roman Catholic priest, who has rid himself of his orders by the simple process of "sending in" his resignation. At its lodge gates stands a small house containing the virtuous heroine and her aunt, a vinegar-cruet of quality. Perkyns and the priest try to evoke Satan by magic ceremonies, but get no manifestations superior to those of the usual medium-attended séance. The priest thinks that, for imperfectly explained reasons, the evocations will be more successful "if a virtuous girl would consent to grace them with her presence." He therefore drugs a cup of coffee and gives it to the heroine, who has taken shelter in the grange from a thunderstorm and has stopped to afternoon tea. The lady becomes insensible and is carried into the evocatory chapel by the priest and his accomplice, but the result is disappointing. Satan remains invisible, and in his stead appears a globe of white light which tells the two Satanists that there is no devil, and calls upon them to "turn over a new leaf." Later, the priest accidentally poisons himself, and Mr. Perkyns, to avoid the bother of an inquest, buries him and his portmanteau in the shrubbery. He then abjures Satanism, and pursues the heroine with an eye to matrimony. She foils him by accepting a young lord who is staying with her aunt after "doing the London season," and he is punished for his past sins by a match with a farmer's widow.

The author of this feeble book is, apparently, a spiritualist, but is not otherwise well qualified for the task she has set herself. She calls a thurible a crucible and the Satanists Luciferians—though the latter name belongs to another order of fiction. Her English is distinctly slipshod, and she shows but a very slight knowledge of the habits of the class to which her principal characters are supposed to belong.

* * *

Familiar Wild Flowers. Figured and Described by F. E. Hulme. First Series. (Cassell & Co.)

This little volume deserves much commendation. Considered merely as a description of some fifty of the commonest flowers of the country, it will form a useful help to those who are desirous of knowing something of English wild plants. But Mr. Hulme has put together such interesting accounts of the associations suggested by these flowers, and opened so many by-roads of research, that it forms a book very likely to induce the student to take up botany, or some branch of it, to his great satisfaction. The wild flowers of England have indeed been keenly studied, but much yet remains to be learnt respecting them, while Mr. Darwin's works show with what facility they afford numberless problems by their distribution and character. This book naturally consists of two parts—the forty-four coloured engravings, and their descriptions. Save in the most expensive hand-painted pictures, plates of bird and plant life are apt to be too bright. Shades of colour are difficult to obtain for process-pictures. Thus the pink tints of willow herbs and persicurias are not in Mr. Hulme's engravings quite true to nature, while the leaves of the primrose and arum are too metallic. On the other hand, the plates are always characteristic and truthful in their pose, while the delicacy of the meadow crane's bill petals is excellently caught. The knapweed, again, is so faithful a representation that no one could mistake it. As for the letterpress, it gives just the points which a beginner requires, wastes no space in sentimental writing, and touches on many points of interest connected with each flower. Thus folk-lore and folk-medicine, the lore contained in the etymology of plant-names, quotations from the old herbalists, the truth about the Glastonbury thorn, the kindred ties between the foreign ipomœa purga and convolvulus scammonia and our own bindweed are dwelt upon as instances of the associations of English wild plants. This book ought to foster botanical research, and is highly creditable to Mr. Hulme.

* * *

Mohammedanism: Has it any Future? By the Rev. Charles H. Robinson. (Gardner, Darton & Co.)

A LITTLE book by the "Ripon Diocesan Missioner," and made up, apparently, of lectures delivered within that diocese. The author wishes us to believe that Islam is in a moribund condition, and that Christianity is everywhere its superior as a civilising institution. His arguments are founded on assertions rather than on facts, for M. Binger, one of the very few travellers whom he quotes in support of his contention, sums up against it. Surely, too, Mr. Robinson gives away his case when, in the effort to be impartial, he says: "In the comparatively few cases in which it (i.e., Mohammedanism) has succeeded in gaining an influence over cannibals or degraded savages, it has undoubtedly raised them to a much higher level of civilisation, and it has done this more rapidly perhaps than Christianity would have done it." The English admirers of Islam have never, so far as we know, made any higher claim on its behalf.

Mr. Robinson was sent in 1892 as an envoy from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Armenian Church. We suppose this must be his apology for his description of the Sultan of Turkey as "a ruler who has brought more dishonour to the name of Islam than perhaps any other Mohammedan whom it would be possible to name." We are sorry that the Bishop of Ripon, by contributing an introduction to the present volume, should appear to warrant so absurdly exaggerated a statement about the head of the Mohammedan world and an ally of the Queen.

* * *

Creation with Development or Evolution. By J. Dudley R. Hewitt. (Kegan Paul.)

CAPTAIN HEWITT, late of the Royal Navy, is now resident in New Zealand. He is very much shocked by the system of secular education in vogue in that island. He has also read Mr. Samuel Laing's Modern Science and Modern Thought, and is very much shocked by that. Hence this farrago of fallacious logic and ill-digested fact in which Captain Hewitt runs a tilt at "such intellectual giants as Darwin, Huxley, Tindall, Laing, and others," and asserts his belief that evolution is development controlled by design. Captain Hewitt's qualifications for his task may be gauged from the following innocent admission:

"Now we take up 'development,' but without any special knowledge of it, and, fortunately or unfortunately, without access to the works of writers on the subject; but through magazine articles, &c., we have a sort of idea that Herbert Spencer is the apostle of the theory that the germ may be altered by its environment."

He has "definite views as to the distinction between soul and spirit" in which he has been confirmed by Bishop Hadfield; and he believes that the spiritual life may be symbolised by electricity: "the soft iron core is the heart, the currents in primary and secondary coils are the ideas circulating round the heart, strengthened by power from the heart when brought in close contact with the source of all spiritual power." This view depends on the acceptance of "thought as being the passage of impressions from the brain to the heart," a theory which we believe that modern anatomy does not entertain. Capt. Hewitt also believes in pre-Adamite races, and has a private corollary that Cain adopted plant-worship and Abel animal-worship. Such books are unfortunate results of the spread of education, but a believer in final causes may take comfort that his philosophy does not depend on the babblings of an ignorant sea-captain.

* * *

The Pursuit of the House Boat. By J. K. Bangs. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

FOR the right appreciation of Mr. Bangs's book one ought, we understand, to have read the work which preceded it—A House Boat on the Styx. This we have not done, nor, we must admit, do we wish to. Mr. Bangs's humour is of that immature kind which relies for its effect upon bringing together irreconcilable people. In these pages we find Socrates and Sherlock Holmes, Noah's wife and Dr. Johnson, Sir Walter Raleigh and Delilah, and the shades of a score of other real and fictitious persons, jostling each other and exchanging intensely modern jargon. The fun of such juxtaposition is soon exhausted, and after that Mr. Bangs gives us nothing. He has made hardly an effort to reproduce or parody the conversational manner of his figures, and the remarks that they make are very mildly amusing. On the other hand, we have nothing but praise for Mr. Peter Newell's illustrations, which are comically and weirdly grotesque and genuinely humorous. Mr. Peter Newell is a draughtsman of whom we hope to see more. A little of Mr. J. K. Bangs goes a very long way.

* * *

The Oxford Debate on the Textual Criticism of the New Testament. (George Bell & Sons.)

THE report of a debate held at New College between two opposing schools of New Testament critics. One, with which the Bishop of Durham and the late Prof. Hort are identified, contends that the greater part of the existing MSS. contain a revised and not the original text; the other, championed by the late Dean Burgon and Prebendary Miller, that the same MSS. represent with substantial accuracy the original documents "as they issued from the pens" of the writers of the New Testament. The debate appears to have been conducted with much learning and good temper, to have arrived at no conclusion whatever, and to have been brought to a premature close by the college dinner-bell.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

From the Land of the Snow Pearls. By Ella Higginson.
(Macmillan.)

I confess that I open a book with the imprimatur of American success upon it with as much fear as pleasurable expectation; there is as much chance of being set shuddering by terrible and ear-racking phrases as of finding character crisply and sympathetically developed. Such a title as From the Land of the Snow Pearls suggests nothing to English ears, but having reconciled myself to it the reward was assured.

It is not necessary to know anything of Puget Sound, of Sehome or Oregon City, or the great snow mountains to be sure that Miss Higginson has observed truly and well. These stories are of a simple people, simply told—people who have an ambition to possess frigid “front rooms” and organs, who work hard in field and kitchen, and have all the jealousies that move the greater world; but they have also the primary virtues, and both are set before us with appreciation and skill.

The longest story, “A Point of Knuckling Down,” is perhaps the firmest in workmanship. Everything was going smoothly in the love matters of Emarine Endey and Orville Palmer until Miss Presley came to bring discord into the Endey household by gossip concerning Orville’s mother:

“Then Mis’ Parmer just up an’ said with a tantalisin’ laugh that if you didn’t like the a-commodations at her house, you needn’t to come there. Said she never did like you, anyways, ner anybody else that set their heels down the way you set your’n. Said she’d had it all out with Orville, an’ he’d promised her faithful that if there wa’ any knucklin’ down to be done you’d be the one to do it, an’ not her.

Then Emarine broke off the engagement and became ill, and after a time Orville repented, and called round to say so. Said Emarine’s mother: ‘I reckon we’d best settle all about your mother before we go in there, Orville Parmer.’

“What about ‘er?’ His tone was miserable, his defiance was short-lived.

“Why, there’s no use ‘n your goin’ in there unless you’re ready to promise that you’ll give Emarine the whip-hand over your mother. You best make up your mind.”

“It’s made up,” said the young fellow desperately. “Lord Almighty, Mis’ Endey, it’s made up!”

At which Emarine promptly recovered and married him. But the Palmer household became a battle-field, and finally poor old Mrs. Palmer was driven forth to live alone; and Orville, true to his promise, let her go. At last, however, Emarine’s love for her husband wins, and she goes secretly to the old lady and invites her to the Christmas dinner.

“‘You set right down, Mother Parmer, an’ let me take your things. Orville don’t know you’re coming, an’ I just want to see his face when he comes in. Here’s a new black shawl for your Christmas. . . . Oh, my, don’t go to cryin’! Here comes Orville.’

She stepped aside quickly. When her husband entered his eyes fell instantly on his mother, weeping childishly over the new shawl. She was in the old splint rocking-chair with the high back. “Mother!” he cried; then he gave a frightened, tortured glance at his wife. Emarine smiled at him, but it was through tears.

“Emarine ast me, Orville; she ast me to dinner o’ herself! An’ she give me this shawl. I’m—cryin’—fer—joy.”

“I ast her to dinner,” said Emarine, “but she ain’t ever goin’ back again. She’s goin’ to stay. I expect we’ve both had enough of a lesson to do us.”

But it is difficult to quote from work of this kind, in which atmosphere and delicate observation count for so much. The stories are in no sense great, they make no claim to greatness, but within their limits they are so much better than the ordinary short story that I am glad to give them praise.

A Rash Verdict. By Leslie Keith.
(Bentley.)

I do not feel able to seriously defend the plot of A Rash Verdict. It is too wildly artificial for anything but a farce, and the manner of Leslie Keith is the antipodes of the farcical. A rich merchant leaves his niece a fortune on the condition that she shall not marry a certain young man whom she has never seen or heard of. This is the merchant’s revenge because the young man differed from him about the morality of a business transaction. Of course, the only possible outcome is that Margaret Thrale and Marcus Gale should meet accidentally, fall in love at once, and ultimately renounce the fortune for the joys of a crust and a cottage. They do meet, but one only falls in love: Margaret, who believes in her uncle, thinks that the young man must have done something very bad to get his name mentioned in the will like that, and refuses to admit him even to friendship. The breaking down of this prejudice proves rather a thin peg to hang a couple of volumes upon. Fortunately the merit of the book does not in the least depend upon the plot. Leslie Keith has a distinct gift of suggesting character, and a serene way of regarding life, whether from the humorous or the sentimental side, which takes my fancy. I have found her a good antidote to a pretentious novel, of the kind which gets a postcard from Mr. Gladstone. Leslie Keith, to be sure, has much to learn in her art; but she has at least two good qualities—a quiet eye and an unaffected love for the things that are more excellent in nature and in life. Margaret Thrale is good all through, with her gropings after the way of life, her attempts to reach knowledge by means of visits to the British Museum, and usefulness by means of slumming in the East-end. Some of these experiences give an opportunity to Leslie Keith’s sense of humour. Margaret has penetrated, with a sense of awe, to the great reading-room in Bloomsbury.

“In the dressing-room, where she went to hang up her hat, she received a chill; for there a stout lady, whose mind ought surely to have been bent on graver matters, was discoursing upon a sole—a fried sole with browned potatoes, served on the best china, and kept warm by a silver cover, all for the sum of one shilling—on which she had that day dined, and a young lady, throwing down a thick notebook and stumpy pencil, had tripped to the glass, and was bent seemingly on the nice adjustment of a string of blue beads, and the placing of a telling little bow in her curly locks. Margaret felt that they ought to have been above such small weaknesses, and did not permit herself a single glance at the mirror as she passed out, and took her way to the glass door, behind which, as it seemed to her, all the wisdom of the ages was stored.”

In the description of Margaret’s country home, her old-fashioned garden, and the sometime Tudor palace close by, Leslie Keith shows a power of dainty description, of insight into some of the more intimate relations of things which is not altogether common in books of the kind. I should like to see her leave this sort of novel alone, and try her hand at some more subtle form of literature. I fancy she could write an essay.

* * * *

In Camp and Cantonment: Stories of Foreign Service. By Edith E. Cuthell. (Hurst & Blackett.)

These stories may delight some; they delight not me; they remind me too much of Mr. Kipling’s—by contrast. For here we have the frivolous, flirtatious, champagne-popping side of Indian life unrelieved by any of those notes of greatness and tragedy which are as a refrain to Mr. Kipling’s most rollicking tales. For anything so true and deep and memorable as The Story of the Gadsbys I should not, of course, have looked; but I should have expected some suggestion of the intimate and beautiful side of Anglo-Indian life revealed in that story. Not that there is no death or cholera in Mrs. Cuthell's stories, nor any hint of fighting. Her first story is called "The Camp of the Shadow of Death," but the title is not deserved by this tale of picnicking and tennis and theatricals in the hills, this rather sordid love-story with its "Soiled Dove" making mischief between her old admirer and his new love, with its scheming mother of a silly girl, and its cheaply sudden dénouement:

"Ashton Gray's tent was left standing alone, but by evening it also had been struck, and there was a new-made grave in the mango grove.

Posie Prynne cried herself nearly ill, and almost ugly. The theatricals had to be put off for quite a week."

The story of "The General's Glass Eye" is a poor attempt at a humorous love story. General the Honourable Stacy Wymerell and Charlie Clarke, A.D.C., are each bent on winning the hand of a young American widow, to whom Cairo presented itself as a happy hunting ground in her search for a second husband. The General keeps an assortment of glass eyes—a fierce one for parade, a jovial eye for dinner, and so on; and the story tells how the little A.D.C. cut out the big General at a dance by entering the General's bedroom and abstracting his dancing eye. The result was that the General appeared at the dance wearing his parade eye, and the widow fled to the A.D.C. for permanent protection. This kind of thing does not amuse me, even when I find it in Charles Lever.

"Bullied by a Bull" is better. Weevor, a visitor to the station at Shikapur, and a suitor, there, for the hand of Kitty Bligh, has made himself so obnoxious to the regiment by his boasts of his property, his horses and pheasants (they were poor and proud at Shikapur), that everyone was praying for his departure, and, notably, "the boy," a gallant young officer, the pet of the mess, and the favoured suitor of Kitty, as Weevor was of Kitty's mother. Weevor's collapse came about one day when he started off to shoot black buck. His non-return was causing some curiosity when Dickens, the magistrate, drove up, crying: "I say, you fellows! Is the colonel in? Or Robertson" (our adjutant)? "Here's your friend—what's his name—Wee—Wee—vor been getting into the very deuce of a mess! The police at Gowka Thana have sent in to me. They've got him there!" There Weevor is found, sitting in the Thana, looking very disconsolate, and a good deal frightened, for against the window were pressed the faces of angry and jabbering ryots. It turned out that Weevor had suspended his deer-stalking to take a nap under a bush, and on waking had seen, as he believed, a huge bull bison, which he shot through the chest.

"You didn't know there were any bison so near, did you, now?" he added, turning to Riversden and the magistrate, with an air of superiority.

Old Dickens wagged his beard at him for a moment in silence.

"Bison be blowed!" he said, at last. "Do you know what you've done, boy? You've shot the sacred Brahminee bull of Gowka! This is a Hindoo village," he went on, "and I wonder they didn't tear you limb from limb!" he added, waving to the angry black faces outside the windows.

Poor Weevor looked at them and shuddered.

"Good Lord!" he said. "Not a bison? What have I done?"

"The sacred bull, sir," continued Dickens, in his most impressive manner, "blessed by the priest as a calf, and allowed to run about tame, feeding when and how it likes from the buniachs grain baskets or their stalls, from the ripe crops—anything, anywhere. Not a soul would touch a hair of its head. And now," he added, "to get you out of this!"

Such stories will pass as holiday reading.

* * * *

Where the Surf Breaks. By Mary F. A. Tench.
(Hurst & Blackett.)

This book makes no pretensions to being a story. It is a series of reminiscences, mainly of old servants, family retainers, and Irish villagers. In its attention to excessive detail it reminds me of the diary written by the conscientious sister at sea for perusal at home. Its virtue is its simplicity; its fault is its tediousness. This sort of thing, continued for 300 pages, tends to irritation:

"What's the good of killing the poor little wretches, Essie?" she would say. "They're so few of them that they wouldn't be a mouthful apiece, and they're very happy swimming about here. How would we like some great monster to come and put a net over us and stick us in a pot of boiling water while we were alive! It's just the same thing."

But what my cousin enjoyed as much, if not more than shrimping, was to stand on a rock either like Canute commanding the sea to come no further, or else spouting 'po-o-o-etry,' as Fred expressed it. How well I remember one morning—

And so on. A vein of innocent triviality is excusable enough in chapter i., but it pervades the book from cover to cover—this particular passage is taken from chapter xviii.—not that we do not meet occasional flashes of genuine wit and pathos, and fugitive scraps of anecdote. But the truth is, that, except for the friends to whom the volume is dedicated, and for students of the Irish dialect, it has no real interest.

* * * *
Ill-Gotten Gold. By W. G. Tarbet.
(Cassell & Co.)

Ill-Gotten Gold opens excellently, and the first chapter or two really shows considerable dramatic power and skill in introducing the theme of the story. The characters, too, of the old lord and his faithful retainer, Maxwell, are very ably indicated. Unhappily, the rest of the book is disappointing, and the firm, careful touch of the earlier chapters seems to give place to a more cursory style of treatment. The plot is not well managed, and more might have been made of it if the author had gripped his subject better and worked it out more strongly. As it is, the story is crowded with incidents, many of which have slight bearing on the main thread of the narrative, while as pictures of events they are too often "scamped." Ill-Gotten Gold, in fact, lacks construction. But it will probably interest younger readers.

MR. STEAD ON MARK TWAIN.

From Mr. Stead's very timely and readable character-sketch of Mark Twain in the Review of Reviews we quote the following remarks on Mark Twain as a man of letters:

"Mark Twain was not educated for a literary career, nor was he passed through the curriculum of the colleges. He graduated in the university of the world, in which he entered as a freshman at the early age of thirteen, when he was apprenticed to a printer. From the composing-stick to the wheel of a Mississippi steamboat, and from the Great River to the Great Desert, and the silver mines of Nevada—these were his class-rooms. He is a graduate of the Far West. Born in Florida, trained on the Mississippi, he took his degree in the Rockies, made his first mark as a descriptive writer as special correspondent in the Sandwich Islands, and first achieved fame in his humorous description of the Old World, as seen by this most modern of all the children of the newest West. Few men have had more ups and downs. He has experienced almost every extreme of good and ill fortune. He has confronted the temptation to commit suicide when he had only a ten-cent piece in his pocket, he has been one of the wealthiest of authors, and he is once more in financial straits, facing the difficulties like a man confident now as ever of coming out on top.

And as the result of this rich and varied experience Mark Twain, altogether apart from his humour, has developed a literary genius which entitles him to rank in the forefront of contemporary authors. Mr. Howells, who is no mean judge, declares he 'portrays and interprets real types not only with exquisite appreciation and sympathy, but with a force and truth of drawing that makes them permanent.' If the literary man is he who alone can express things in words so that they live before the eye of the readers, Mark Twain is one of the first literary men of his day. For vivid portraiture of men and things it would be difficult to find his equal. His description of the way in which the coyote is hunted over the plains is an excellent illustration of his peculiar talent. The coyote, or wolf of the plains, he says, first fools the dog by allowing him to keep within a few feet of his rear. But when the dog grows desperate and makes a sprint, 'forthwith there is a rushing sound, and the sudden splitting of a long crack through the atmosphere, and behold, that dog is solitary and alone in the midst of a vast solitude.' In another vein, but not less effective, is the little sketch of the significance of a cat as an element or character of a house:

'When there was room on the ledge outside of the pots and boxes for a cat, the cat was there—in sunny weather stretched at full length, asleep and blissful, with her furry belly to the sun and a paw covered over her nose. Then that house was complete, and its contentment and peace were made manifest to the world by this symbol, whose testimony is infallible. A home without a cat—and a well-fed, well-petted, and properly revered cat—may be a perfect home, perhaps, but how can it prove title?'

His description of the Sandwich Islands remains to this day unequalled. 'Roughing It' to this day is the standard description of the beginning of the Great Silver States. And who is there among all writing men who has so completely and satisfactorily interpreted a great river to the world as Mark Twain has interpreted the Mississippi? As Mr. Twichell says:

'His description of the Father of Waters, for beauty and splendour and deep feeling of Nature in some of her rarer aspects and most bewitching moods, was doubtless never surpassed.'

His sympathy with Nature, which betrays the soul of the poet behind the mask of the humorist, is always present in Mark Twain's writings. Here is an extract from some of his private letters quoted in Harper's, which illustrate this fact. Writing on November 20, 1895, from Napier, New Zealand, he says:

'Here we have the smooth and placidly complaining sea at our door, with nothing between us and it but twenty yards of shingle—and hardly a suggestion of life in that space to mar it or make a noise. Away down here, fifty-five degrees south of the equator, this sea seems to murmur in an unfamiliar tongue—a foreign tongue—a tongue bred among the ice-fields of the Antarctic—a murmur with a note of melancholy in it proper to the vast, unvisited solitudes it has come from. It was very delicious and solacing to wake in the night and find it still pulsing there.'

Take as another example the following rhapsody over the Alps:

'O Switzerland! the further it recedes into the enriching haze of time, the more intolerably delicious the charm of it, and the cheer of it, and the glory and majesty and solemnity and pathos of it grow. Those mountains had a soul; they thought; they spoke—one couldn't hear it with the ears of the body, but what a voice it was!—and how real! Deep down in my memory it is sounding yet. Alp calleth unto Alp!—that stately old Scriptural wording is the right one for God's Alps and God's ocean.'

How puny we were in that awful presence—and how painless it was to be so; how fitting and right it seemed, and how stingless was the sense of our unspeakable insignificance! And, Lord, how pervading were the repose and peace and blessedness that poured out of the heart of the invisible Great Spirit of the Mountains! Now, what is it? There are mountains and mountains and mountains in this world—but only these take you by the heart-strings. I wonder what the secret of it is? Well, time and time again it has seemed to me that I must drop everything and flee to Switzerland once more. It is a longing; a deep, strong, tugging longing—that is the word. We must go again.'

Readers of his 'Jeanne D'Arc' need not be surprised to know that nothing is so fascinating to the wild humorist of the Pacific Slope as the history of the Middle Ages. Says Mr. Twichell:

'In those fields he has been an indefatigable, it is not too much to say, exhaustive, reader, while, by grace of a rarely tenacious memory, his learning in them is remarkably at hand and accessible to him. Hardly ever will an event of any importance in their annals be mentioned in his presence that he cannot at once supply the date of it.'

The aspect of remote times that chiefly fascinates his interest is the social. Books like Pepys's Diary, that afford the means of looking narrowly and with human sympathy into the life and manners of bygone generations, have a peculiar charm to him.'

He is a laborious and conscientious worker, returning often to his MS. after the lapse of many years. 'It is a strange thing,' he once told a friend:

'You have your ideas, your facts, your plot, and you go to work on your book and write yourself up. You use all the material you have in your brain and then you stop, naturally. Well, lay the book aside and go to work on something else.'

After awhile, three or four months, say, or perhaps three or four years, something suggests that old story to you, and you feel a sudden awakening of interest in it. And then, lo and behold! you find that your stock of ideas and facts has been replenished, and your mind is full of your subject again, and you must write, your brain is overflowing and you finish your book—if you are lucky.'

SELECTED NOVELS

HURST & BLACKETT'S LIST

OF BOOKS FOR THE COUNTRY AND SEASIDE.

WHERE the SURF BREAKS. By Mary F. A. Tench.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

ONE HEART—ONE WAY. By W. Raisbeck Sharer.

In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW NOVEL BY DR. GEORGE MACDONALD.

Now ready, at all Booksellers' and Libraries, in 1 vol., crown 8vo, price 6s.

SALTED with FIRE. By George Macdonald, LL.D.,

Author of "Robert Falconer," "Sir Gibbie," &c.

"The novel throughout reveals in all its power not only the literary beauty and genius, but the moral excellence of all the author's former efforts."—Dundee Advertiser.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

Each in One Volume, crown 8vo, with Frontispiece, price FIVE SHILLINGS.

DAVID ELGINBROD.

ROBERT FALCONER.

ALSO FORBES.

SIR GIBBIE.

A FLAME of FIRE. By Mrs. Haweis, Author of "The Art of Beauty," "Chaucer for Children," "The Bride's Garland," &c. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"A Flame of Fire" deserves commendation for a certain picturesqueness and vigour of writing, for strongly-conceived incident, and for the bold incisiveness of its descriptive passages."—The Globe.

BROKEN THREADS. By Compton Reade, Author of

"Take Care Whom You Trust," "Who Was Then the Gentleman?" &c. 1 vol., crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is bright comedy all through Mr. Compton Reade's story, with just so much serious incident as is necessary to keep the book from being frivolous or trifling."—Scotsman.

THE SILENCE BROKEN. By G. M. Robins (Mrs. Baillie

REYNOLDS), Author of "The Ides of March," "Her Point of View," &c. 1 vol., small crown 8vo, 2s.

"An interesting little character-sketch, involving a ghost story of real charm and pathos. Mrs. Robins's style has distinction and force, nor does she lay her colours on too thickly."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The tale is a thoroughly interesting one, and exceptionally well told."—Whitchell Review.

"The scene where the silence is broken is written with power, and the effect of the haunted house is weird and impressive."—Manchester Guardian.

FOUR EDITIONS NOW READY OF

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. Craik.

NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION.—Illustrations by HUGH RIVIER. In 1 vol., large crown 8vo, richly gilt cover, gilt top, price 6s.

THE STANDARD EDITION.—In 1 vol., crown 8vo, with Frontispiece by the late Sir JOHN MILLAIS, Bart., P.R.A., price 5s.

A NEW and CHEAPER EDITION.—In 1 vol., crown 8vo, bevelled boards, price 3s. 6d.

THE PEOPLE'S EDITION.—In medium 8vo, paper cover, price SIXPENCE.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION OF MRS. CRAIK'S WORKS.

Crown 8vo, uniformly bound, bevelled boards, 3s. 6d. each.

A LIFE for a LIFE.

CHRISTIAN'S MISTAKE.

A NOBLE LIFE.

HANNAH.

NOTHING NEW.

A WOMAN'S THOUGHTS about WOMEN.

THE UNKIND WORD.

THE WOMAN'S KINGDOM.

A BRAVE LADY.

MISTRESS and MAID.

YOUNG MRS. JARDINE.

STUDIES from LIFE.

These Books are also issued in HURST & BLACKETT'S FIVE-SHILLING SERIES, Each in One Volume, crown 8vo, with Frontispiece.

EDNA LYALL'S NOVELS.

Each in One Volume, crown 8vo, 6s.

TO RIGHT the WRONG.

DONOVAN.

WE TWO.

IN the GOLDEN DAYS.

KNIGHT ERRANT.

WON by WAITING.

A HARDY NORSEMAN.

WORKS BY THE LATE MRS. OLIPHANT.

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION, uniformly bound in 1 vol., crown 8vo, cloth, price HALF-A-CROWN. Now ready at all Booksellers'.

ADAM GRAEME.

LAIRD of NORLAW.

AGNES.

LIFE of IRVING.

A ROSE in JUNE.

PHOEBE JUNIOR.

IT WAS A LOVER AND

HIS LASS.

The following Cheap Editions are now ready. In 1 vol., crown 8vo, red cloth, price Half-a-Crown.

GRANDMOTHER'S MONEY.

By F. W. ROBINSON.

NO CHURCH.

By F. W. ROBINSON.

MARGARET and her BRIDES-

MAIDS. By the Author of "The Valley of a Hundred Fires."

THROUGH the LONG NIGHT. By Mrs. E. LYNN LINTON.

BARBARA'S HISTORY.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

LORD BRACKENBURY.

By AMELIA B. EDWARDS.

THE VALLEY of a HUNDRED

FIRES. By the Author of "Margaret and her Bridesmaids."

HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED, 13, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

FOR HOLIDAY READING.

Mends Everything. LE PAGE'S LIQUID GLUE

Is used by Pullman Palace Car Co., Mason & Hamlin Organ and Piano Co., and by thousands of first-class manufacturers and mechanics throughout the world, for all kinds of fine work on Wood, Ivory, Leather, Paper, Glass, Marble, &c.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exhibition, London, 1883. Pronounced the STRONGEST ADHESIVE KNOWN.

Sold in tin cans for mechanics and amateurs, and in bottles for family use

IT MENDS EVERYTHING.

Wood, Leather, Paper, Ivory, Glass, China, Rubber, Stone, Jewellery, Metals, Shoes, Books, Card Albums, Toys, Musical Instruments, Statuary, Farmers' Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Implements, Furniture, Bric-a-Brac, &c.

Strong as Iron.

Solid as a Rock.

No Heating. No Preparation. Always Ready. Indispensable in every Family. Sold in tin cans for Mechanics and Amateurs. Half-pints, 2s.; Pints, 3s.; and Quarts, 4s. 6d. each; and in bottles for family use at 6d. and 1s. Samples free by post on receipt of stamps or postal order. Sold by the Wholesale Trade generally, and retailed by Stationers, Fancy Goods Dealers, Grocers, Ironmongers, Chemists, &c., &c.

MAYPOLE SOAP

For Home Dyeing.

Dyes any Colour.

For Dyeing Silks, Satins, Velvets, Cottons
Feathers, Lace Goods, Wool, &c.

Such as Lace Curtains, Antimacassars, Toilet Mats, Blouses, Dresses, Underlinen, Ribbons, Children's Frocks, Pinafores, Lamp Shades, Silk Scarves, Handkerchiefs, Gentlemen's Shirts, Silk Gloves, Stockings, Shawls, &c., &c.

4d. per Tablet, all Colours. Black 6d. Sold Everywhere.

THE MAYPOLE COMPANY, Ltd.,

98 AND 99, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

TALKS ON THE TEETH.--No. 2.

Do you recognise how essential good teeth are to the health of the whole body? Every tooth that is decayed or inefficient throws extra work on the rest, and hastens their decay. Presently the work of mastication is interfered with, and that leads to Dyspepsia, while the decaying teeth are themselves a source of direct injury to the health

Teeth that are kept really clean, do not decay, and only a very little care is needed. The greatest danger is from small particles of food that lodge in irregularities of the teeth. What must be done is to use some dentifrice that will reach and remove these, while, at the same time, cleansing and sweetening any incipient decay. Only one thing will do this: SOZODONT. No one who has not used it has any idea how pleasant SOZODONT is. Sold everywhere, price 2/6.

HALL & RUCKEL, Proprietors, New York.

CONTAINS ALL THE
CREAM of the
Original Milk

Nestlé's SWISS MILK

NOT ONLY RIVALS FRESH MILK, BUT IS OFTEN PREFERRED, as it is absolutely
proof against Carrying Disease.

Used the same as fresh milk for all purposes:
Breakfast, Tea, Puddings, Shapes, Babies, Children,
Invalids, &c., &c.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1897.

No. 1321, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Offices: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

THE publications of the week are not sufficiently numerous or interesting to justify a descriptive chronicle. We have received the following:

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE SOCIAL TEACHING OF JESUS: AN ESSAY IN CHRISTIAN SOCIOLOGY. By Shailer Mathews. The Macmillan Co. 6s.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

REMAINS HISTORICAL AND LITERARY CONNECTED WITH THE PALATINE COUNTIES OF LANCASTER AND CHESTER. Vol. XXXVI. The Chetham Society.

ART, POETRY, BELLES LETTRES.

STUDIES IN TWO LITERATURES. By Arthur Symonds. Leonard Smithers, 6s.

FICTION.

THE WORST OF IT. By Mary Gaunt. Methuen & Co. 6s.

A RARE VERDICT. By Leslie Keith. Richard Bentley & Son.

STAPLETON'S LUCK. By Margery Hollis. Richard Bentley & Son.

A WELSH SINGER. By Allen Raine. Hutchinson & Co. 6s.

TALES OF THE ROCK. By Mary Anderson. Downey & Co. 3s. 6d.

A WOMAN OF MOODS: A SOCIAL CINEMATOGRAPH. By Mrs. Charlton Anne (Ellam Fenwicke Allan). Burns & Oates.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

GUIDE TO THE DUTCH EAST INDIES. By Dr. J. F. VAN BENMELLEN and G. B. HOOYER. Translated by Rev. B. J. BERRINGTON. Luzac & Co.

EDUCATIONAL.

SELECTIONS FROM WORDSWORTH. With Notes by W. T. WEBB, M.A. Macmillan & Co. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE ARCHITECTURAL REVIEW: A MAGAZINE FOR THE ARTIST, ARCHEOLOGIST, DESIGNER, AND CRAFTSMAN. Vol. I.

A COMMON-SENSE METHOD OF DOUBLE-ENTRY BOOK-KEEPING ON FIRST PRINCIPLES. By S. DYER. Part I.: THEORETICAL. Part II.: PRACTICAL. George Philip & Son.

NOTES AND NEWS.

MR. BALFOUR'S speech at Dumfries on Tuesday contained a very excellent summary of the genius of Burns, and proved once more how fine a critic of letters has been lost in the leader of the House of Commons; or, rather, not lost, but, for the most part, discouraged. To praise Robert Burns at Dumfries would be sufficient to satisfy the burghers, if they had not been previously convinced, that here was a man worthy of the freedom of their town; but Mr. Balfour did more—he grouped with Burns as great Scotsmen, Carlyle, Scott and Stevenson. To Burns naturally fell the lion's share of eulogy, but the incidental references to the three other men, though much briefer, had equal felicity.

MR. BALFOUR'S "aside" concerning R. L. Stevenson may be quoted, since, at the present moment, it is interesting to collect all estimates of that much discussed writer. "Stevenson," said Mr. Balfour, showing, by the way, a somewhat limited knowledge of the intrepidity of the hardy critic, "has been too recently taken from us for even the hardest critic to venture to prophesy the exact position which he is destined ultimately to occupy in the literary history of this country. But I think, however, we may say of him that he was a man of the finest and most delicate imagination, and that he wielded in the service of that imagination a style which for grace, for suppleness, for its power of being at once turned to any purpose which the author desired, has seldom been matched—in my judgment it has hardly been equalled—by any writer, English or Scotch."

IN the September Harper's Mr. Henry James writes, with his accustomed delicacy, of the late George Du Maurier, whom he knew well. In the course of this most readable, sympathetic article we learn again how great a loss English romantic literature suffered through the late blossoming of Mr. George Du Maurier's narrative faculty, and his early death. The following passage offers a glimpse of one of his many unwritten stories, in the telling or elaboration of which he found so much amusement:

"He had worked them out in such detail that they were ready in many a case to be served as they stood. That was peculiarly true of a wonderful history that occupied at Hampstead, I remember, years ago, on a summer day, the whole of an afternoon ramble. . . . A title would not have been obvious, but there would have been food for wonder in the career of a pair of lovers who had been changed into Albatrosses, and the idea of whose romantic adventures in the double consciousness struck me, I remember, as a real trouville of the touching. They are separated; they lose each other in all the wide world; they are shot at and wounded; and though, after years, I recall the matter confusedly, one of them appears, by the operation of the oddities among which the story moves, to have had to reassume the human shape, and wait and watch in vain for the wandering and distracted other. There comes back to me a passage in some old crowded German market-place, under a sky full of gables and towers, and in spite of the dimness of these gleams I retain the conviction that the plan at least, to which years of nursing of it had brought a high finish, was a little masterpiece of the weird, of the Hofmannesque."

Elsewhere Mr. James expresses a wish, which many persons will echo, that a collection of Mr. Du Maurier's lyrics may be made.

"IN matters of commerce," wrote Caning, "the fault of the Dutch is giving too little and asking too much." The Dutch pirate-publisher, Mr. Fisher Unwin has discovered, gives nothing at all. Mr. Unwin, very naturally expecting Olive Schreiner's Trooper Peter Halkett to be popular in a Dutch translation, had arranged for a translation to be made, when he discovered that the work had already been brought out in Holland, and is doing well. It is unfortunate and regrettable, but Mr. Unwin should have been quicker.

IN reference to Mr. Gosse's remark which we quoted last week, to the effect that had Modern Painters, The Grammar of Assent, or The History of Civilisation been published within the last ten years it would scarcely have attracted attention outside a narrow circle, so bent upon fiction are all modern readers, Mr. White writes from the Ruskin Museum, Sheffield, urging that such could not have been the case since Modern Painters is still selling well. We are glad to hear it, but the statement does not really affect Mr. Gosse's contention. There is a difference between a book published in the last ten years and a book whose popularity has been gaining momentum for half a century.

MR. STEPHEN PHILLIPS, the young poet whose Christ in Hades was welcomed for its note of sincerity and signs of strength, had a remarkable poem in last week's Spectator. The piece, entitled "The Woman with the Dead Soul," was described as an attempt to render imaginatively a modern tragedy, the horror of which lies in the combination of death within and neatness without, so often to be seen in our great cities. Mr. Phillips did not, perhaps, carry the reader quite so far as his own mind travelled, but no one could read his lines without gathering a serious meaning, and experiencing a certain grim sensation of chill. They remind us a little of the late James Thomson's City of Dreadful Night. We quote a passage describing the gradual death of the woman's soul:

"She felt it die a little every day,
Flutter less wildly, and more feebly pray.
Still it grew; at times she felt it pull
Imploring thinly something beautiful;
And in the night was painfully awake,
And struggled in the darkness till daybreak.
For not at once, not without any strife,
It died; at times it started back to life;
Now at some angel evening after rain,
Built like early Paradise again;
Or at some human face, or starry sky,
The silent tremble of infinity,
Or odour of strange fields at midnight sweet,
Or soul of summer dawn in the dark street."

At the same time, we feel that the Spectator goes too far in its praise of the poem in a companion article. Poetry that is to draw national attention to defects in great cities should not be at all involved or over literary in expression, nor need elaborate commentaries.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Times, whose touch seems to us recognisable, has been reminded by K. S. Ranjitsinhji's book upon cricket of the meditations of an earlier Indian sage, one Mohummud Abdullah Khan, whose Cricket Guide was published at Lucknow in 1891. The few extracts that are offered prove the book to be less scientific than the Jubilee volume, but of higher value as a work of humour. Thus: "Behave like gentlemen when the game is over; avoid clapping and laughing in the faces of the persons you have defeated"; and, "If you have any book to be signed by the captain of the opposite side, confessing his defeat by so many runs, please do it like men"; and, "The fielders must never sting the player with taunts, if they turn him out, for this often results in something disagreeable to human mind."

A SECOND edition of K. S. Ranjitsinhji's Jubilee Book of Cricket is in preparation.

WE are informed that Lambeth Palace Library will be closed for six weeks, from to-day. Some scholars from Berlin and Upsala have lately been inspecting the MSS. for linguistic and critical purposes.

THE English short story for the September Cosmopolis will be contributed by Miss L. Alma Tadema, under the title of "The Unseen Helmsman," and the French one, by Edouard Rod, under the title of "Père et Fils." Vernon Lee is writing on the "Analytical Novel in France," with special reference to the works of M. Rosny. A further instalment of the letters of Turgenev to his French circle will also appear.

MESSRS. LONGMANS will publish in the autumn The Queen's Hounds, and Stag-Hunting Recollections, by Lord Ribblesdale, Master of the Buckhounds, 1892-95, with an Introductory Chapter on the Hereditary Mastership by E. Burrows. The book will have numerous illustrations, including reproductions from oil-paintings in the possession of Her Majesty the Queen at Windsor Castle and Cumberland Lodge.

PROVIDED that a sufficient number of guinea subscriptions can be obtained, it is proposed to publish at the Clarendon Press, by the collotype process, in imperial quarto, a facsimile of the original MS. of the Epistles to Timothy, Titus, and Philemon, in Welsh, reproduced from the MS. of Bishop Richard Davies, and compared with the parallel versions of Salesbury, 1567, and Morgan, 1588. To this will be added an account of a draft petition for a translation into "the vulgar Welsh tong," and a bond in connexion therewith, bound with the MS., and biographical notices of the Bishop and his collaborator William Salesbury, together with a dissertation on some early Welsh versions of Holy Scripture, by Archdeacon D. R. Thomas, Llandrinio. This publication will be helpful to students, apart from its intrinsic interest, in showing the formation of a Welsh theological terminology, and the development of a prose literary standard.

WE understand that Mr. Claude Phillips is already at work on a catalogue of the Wallace collection, and intends to follow it up with a more elaborate work on the same subject. Mr. Phillip's appointment as keeper to the collection was announced a short time ago.

SIR LEWIS MORRIS has arranged to make a lecturing tour in America in the autumn.

THE Rev. E. Conybeare is engaged on a history of Cambridgeshire for Mr. Elliot Stock's "Popular County History Series." One chapter traces the existence of a Cymric population in the Fenland, after the departure of the Romans. Particular attention has been bestowed on the part taken by Cambridgeshire in the Baronial wars of the thirteenth century.

LITERARY HAMPSTEAD.

THE THREATENED DEMOLITION OF CHURCH ROW.

THE rumour, which we fear is only too well founded, that Church Row, Hampstead, is to be pulled down to make room for modern flats is one that will give pain to every lover of old London, and to all who delight in old-fashioned ways and people. The perfect state in which these old Georgian houses remain, and their unimpaired ability to shelter old and young, would alone make the thought of their destruction very unwelcome. No wonder that the proposed change has called forth an earnest protest from Mrs. Anne Thackeray Ritchie; is it too late to hope that her voice will be joined by others, and that "respite, respite, and nepenthe," will be accorded a few years longer to this unique precinct? For there Church Row stands in the irrecoverable glory of old brick and straight white latticed windows just as it was seen by Mrs. Barbauld, who lived in one of its houses; and by Lucy Aikin, her niece, who lived in another, and whose Memoir of Addison drew showers of praise from Macaulay; and by Joanna Baillie, their near neighbour, and by Sir Walter Scott, a frequent visitor; and by Crabbe, and by Wordsworth, and by John Day, of Sandford and Merton; and by many another gentle and gifted man and woman who lived in or visited Hampstead from fifty to a hundred-and-fifty years ago. Miss Lucy Aikin thus describes, in a letter to Dr. Channing, the Hampstead of 1830-1840. She had come to live in Church Row in 1822 to be near her aunt.

"Several circumstances render society here peculiarly easy and pleasant; in many respects the place unites the advantages and escapes the evils both of London and provincial towns. It is near enough (to London) to allow its inhabitants to partake in the society, the amusements, and the accommodations of the capital as freely as ever the dissipated could desire; whilst it affords pure air, lovely scenery, and retired and beautiful walks. Because every one here is supposed to have a London set of friends, neighbours do not think it necessary, as in the provinces, to force their acquaintance upon you; of local society you may have much, little, or none, as you please; and with a little, which is very good, you may associate on the easiest terms. Then the summer brings an influx of Londoners who are often genteel and agreeable people, and pleasantly vary the scene. Such is Hampstead."

That was little more than fifty years ago. The palmy days of Church Row were even then beginning to pass. But Joanna Baillie was still Miss Aikin's friend and neighbour, and Joanna Baillie had many a time received Sir Walter Scott at her house. She had gathered there, indeed, all the great writers of the time, dividing the hospitality of Hampstead with Mr. Samuel Hoare, the banker. George Crabbe was often a guest of the Hoares. In June, 1825, he wrote in one of his letters: "My time passes I cannot tell how pleasantly. To-day I read one of my long stories to my friends, Mrs. Joanna Baillie and her sister. It was a task, but they encouraged me, and were, or seemed, gratified. I rhyme at Hampstead with a great deal of facility, for nothing interrupts me but kind calls, or something pleasant." Now and then Coleridge might be the caller—Crabbe frequently saw him in those days; or the arrival of Wordsworth or of Southey might be the "something pleasant." Wordsworth was there in May, 1815. Haydon relates that he walked with him on the Heath:

"I sauntered on to West End Lane, and so on to Hampstead, with great delight. Never did any man beguile the time as Wordsworth. His purity of heart, his kindness, his soundness of principle, his information, and the intense and eager feelings with which he pours forth all he knows, affect, interest, and enchant me."

With Mrs. Barbauld, who, however, had then removed to Stoke Newington, Wordsworth enjoyed a close friendship. He regarded her as the leading literary woman of her day. "I am not in the habit of grudging people their good things," he said to Crabbe Robinson, "but I wish I had written those lines," and he quoted the last stanza of Mrs. Barbauld's "Address to Life":

"Life! we've been long together Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear;
Perhaps 't will cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not Good Night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me Good Morning."

We will lift the veil of a few more years. Mrs. Barbauld—Anna Letitia Barbauld, let her be called for state—came to live in Church Row, Hampstead, with her husband in 1785. Mr. Barbauld had received the offer of a small Dissenting congregation there. Mrs. Barbauld had already done the greater part of her literary work, albeit her never-to-be-forgotten, or at least not yet forgotten, Evenings at Home were written in Church Row. From just such a sweet hill-top street they should have come. Yet the Evenings at Home are too exclusively associated with her name. Not only did she collaborate on them with her brother, Dr. Aikin, but of the ninety-nine pieces contained in this collection of essays for the young only fourteen came from her own pen. These included "The Young Mouse," "Canute's Reproof," "Things by Their Right Names," "The Four Sisters," and other remembered pages. Indeed, we hear of Dr. Aikin being somewhat dissatisfied with his sister's inactivity at Hampstead, and urging her (in a set of verses) to give the world the benefit of her talents. She did rouse herself to write A Poetical Epistle to Mr. Wilberforce on the rejection of his Bill for the abolition of Slavery, and critical essays on the poetry of Collins and Akenside. A word about Dr. Akenside presently. Of Joanna Baillie Mrs. Barbauld wrote: "I have received great pleasure lately from the representation of 'De Montfort,' a tragedy which you probably read a year and a half ago in a volume entitled A Series of Plays on the Passions. I admired it then, but little dreamed that I was indebted for my entertainment to a young lady of Hampstead, whom I visited, and who came to Mr. Barbauld's meeting all the while, with as innocent a face as if she had never written a line."

In another of her letters is the following amusing passage:

"I have been to Dr. Beddoes, who is a very agreeable man; his favourite prescription at present to ladies is the inhaling the breath of cows; and as he does not, like the German doctors, send the ladies to the cow-house, the cows are brought into the lady's chamber, where they stand all night with their heads within the curtains. . . . It is a fact . . . that a family have been turned out of their lodgings because the people of the house would not admit the cow; they said they had not built and furnished their rooms for the hoofs of cattle."

And another of Mrs. Barbauld's letters is worth quoting; it is quoted by Howitt, who wrote delightfully on all these matters in his Northern Heights of London. The Barbaulds had received a young Spaniard into their house: "He is quite a man, of one or two-and twenty, and rather looks like a Dutchman than a Spaniard. Did you ever see segurs—tobacco-leaf rolled up of the length of one's finger, which they light and smoke without a pipe? He uses them. 'And how does Mr. Barbauld bear that?' say you. 'O! the Don keeps it snug in his own room.'"

We have mentioned the poet Akenside as an object of Mrs. Barbauld's editorial attention. He, too, had lived at Hampstead, and his was, perhaps, the only unhappy experience of that upland village that has come down to us. But, then, Akenside was unhappily constituted. He was ashamed of his humble birth, and is said to have refused, on one occasion, to acknowledge an aunt who called on him. Mr. Dyson, his friend and patron, purchased a cottage for him at North End, Hampstead, but the tenancy of the poet-doctor was not a long one. "Hampstead," says his biographer, "was not suited to a man like Akenside. The inhabitants were respectable and rich; but many of them were not only respectable and rich, but purse-proud, and therefore supercilious. They required to be escorted and flattered, and their sons to be treated with an air of obligation." This is a picture of Hampstead very different from Miss Aikin's of seventy or eighty years later. Perhaps the times differed less than appears. Miss Aikin was in the swim, and Dr. Akenside was not. We are now getting far back into the eighteenth century; no further back, however, than Mrs. Barbauld looked; for she edited selections from the Spectator, the Tatler, and the Guardian, and she wrote the Life of Richardson and edited the old novelists. Even to her, Hampstead must have seemed to be steeped in the literary traditions of a bygone day. She could not have passed the "Upper Flask" inn in her morning walk without thinking of Clarissa Harlowe's flight thither from her plugging lover. It is Lovelace who writes:

"The Hampstead coach when the dear fugitive came to it had but two passengers in it; but she made the fellow go off directly, paying for the vacant places. The two passengers directing the coachman to set them down at the 'Upper Flask,' she bid him set her down there also. They took leave of her (very respectfully, no doubt), and she went into the house, and asked if she could not have a dish of tea and a room to herself for half an hour. They showed her up into the very room where I now am. She sat at the very table I now write upon; and, I believe, the chair I sit in was hers. O Belford! if thou knowest what love is, thou wilt be able to account for their minutiae."

We may be sure, too, that Steele's old cottage down the hill, whence his friends of the Kit Kat Club would bring him up to the "Upper Flask" for their weekly meeting, was an object of interest to Mrs. Barbauld and her friends. They would identify the house in which Dr. Johnson lived for a few months in 1749 to give his Tetty the air, and they would wonder if tradition lied in saying that Mrs. Johnson lived extravagantly and frivolously there while the Doctor toiled in Fleet-street. Here, at all events, Johnson did some sound work. "I wrote the first seventy lines in the 'Vanity of Human Wishes,' in the course of one morning, in that small house beyond the church." And did not Gay come here to nurse his melancholy after his disastrous "little flutter" in South Sea stocks? Hither, did not Arbuthnot come to die, and yet was cheerful? "I passed a whole day with him," wrote Pope, "at Hampstead. He is in the Long Room half the morning, and has parties at cards every night. Mrs. Lepell and Mrs. Saggioni, and her sons, and his two daughters, are all with him." It is not easy to exhaust the literary associations of Hampstead. One may look, as it were, out of Mrs. Barbauld's windows in Church Row in the year 1800, forward and backward through time, and Hampstead's glories show thick and bright. Shall we hark back again to find Romney, old and dejected, in his room at Hampstead, his strength waning with the waning century; Constable watching the rainstorms sweeping the immemorial Heath; Evelina repelling the attentions of Beau Smith in the Long Room? or shall we look forward to find Keats poising his frail figure to hear the nightingale; Dickens pressing up the hill to Jack Straw's Castle; Du Maurier taking his great dogs about the lanes of "soothing, amusing, simplifying, sanitary Hampstead," as its very latest eulogist has described it? Look as we will we shall see nothing to make the removal of Church Row—Hampstead's jewel—a whit more tolerable.

PARIS LETTER.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. BOURGET is always interesting, though never amusing. For one thing, he takes himself too seriously, and persists in regarding the art of writing fiction as a science. For another, he lacks wit, humour, charm, and lightness of touch. These are essentials for immortality, so one is safe to predict that M. Bourget's immortality will terminate with his obsequies at the expense of the State. He wrote one notable book, Le Disciple, and André Cornélis is a strenuous and sober study of considerable value; and here and there in his other novels he has reached the intensity of life and stirred emotion's deeps. But this achievement is rarer than it should be with a writer so sincere and studious. The explanation of his failure lies in the fact that M. Bourget pitches his note too high. Not content with the artist's ambition, he too ardently strives after philosophy and intellectuality. These qualities are out of place in fiction. They irritate and offend. We want our novelists to give us the best of ware, but our interest must be sustained, our emotions stirred, the arts and graces of literature must be used in the quest of our approval. So heavy, so austere, so philosophical a novelist as M. Paul Bourget, with never a smile, or a witty phrase, or a humorous or musical turn for our delectation, is as inappropriate in his profession as the lady who offers herself for public amusement in the guise of a "daughter of Joy," and turns out a loaded blue-stocking. The man who pays his money for entertainment feels justly that he would prefer to seek knowledge elsewhere. Our library shelves are weighted with well-bound tomes of philosophy and learning. Why must M. Bourget, who might do better things, inveigle us into dusty depths in the hollow disguise of insidious yellow cover and popular name?

His new book, a series of laborious studies of profiles gathered in varied travels and contributed to Cosmopolis, forms an interesting collection. There is even a fresh and graceful note in the Irish sketch, Neptunevale, which would have been completely charming if M. Bourget could, for a moment, have forgotten himself and his vexed theory of psychology. He places before this quaint and touching little romance—if one may dare to call by so simple a name the work of so tortured a master—the mournful Irish proverb, "There is hope from the sea, but no hope from the grave." M. Bourget has not escaped the indescribable fascination of that melancholy and humorous race, which seems chiefly to exist for the pleasure of being misunderstood and wondered at. He, too, wonders, and admires in that sentimental, amazed temper most intellectual sympathisers fall into on this debatable ground. He writes regretfully of the "beautiful island so little visited by his compatriots, and so worthy of being much visited." He returns to Ireland, drawn thither again by its depth of green, its clear dark width of water, its isle-spotted lakes and veiled skies; "in a word, by the inexplicable charm of its matchless melancholy," of the tender and fatal pathos that ever enfolds it, as a kind of mist upon judgment; wins affection and repels reason.

La Pia, the last sketch, by its incomparable sobriety of emotion, a certain ironical tenderness, a less pedantic treatment, less of the obvious and irritating method of the trained psychologist, completely captivates us. The sketch of La Pia unites the two graces needful for the qualification of exquisite: vagueness and precision. A memory which holds regret and charm should be like moonlight, deeply shadowed, broadly illuminated. What could be more delicate, more strong, more brilliantly suggestive, than the end of this delightful little Italian sketch? Of the suspected and tarnished boulevardier, capable of a fine action, Bourget writes:

"It was one of those moments when the high chords of our nature have been too strongly stirred for the whole being not to respond to the vibration of generosity, and he squeezed my hand, saying, with a smile of irony and emotion, wherein I recognised the boulevardier: 'Promise me not to recount what has happened in the club. They'd take me for a simpleton. Perhaps I am. But that little one will pray for me sometimes. That never does any harm, and then, look at her eyes, how happy she is!' and with a deep voice: 'You know, it is sometimes good to prove to oneself that one is worth more than one's life.'"

Nos Fils, by Hugues Le Roux, is not cheerful reading for French fathers. It seems to prove with lugubrious emphasis that there is no hope, no opening for the sons of France in the Army, the Navy, Civil or State offices, and that salvation lies exclusively in the colonies. M. Le Roux tells the story of Mr. Frank Harris's life, as an inducement to overseas adventure. Mr. Harris is a very able man, no doubt, but it is information for his compatriots, on the authority of his French friend, M. Le Roux, that he has reformed English prose. Few of us suspected that the prose of Hazlitt and Ruskin required reform, and we have yet to learn the nature of the reform brought about by the genius of Mr. Harris, whom the French enthusiast compares with Maupassant, to Maupassant's apparent advantage. Friendly admiration is a pleasant thing, as our own log-rolled geniuses are aware, and the readers of Le Journal, the sprightly and improper paper to which M. Le Roux contributes, will be glad to feel themselves in advance of British opinion, thanks to the courage and originality of Mr. Harris's French admirer.

Oriental troubles have lent a fashion and popularity to the theme of Oriental massacres and risings. Zeitoun, translated from the original Armenian of Aghassi, one of the chiefs of the revolt of 5,000 Armenians against 60,000 Turks, is a quick, graphic, and vital account, written somewhat in the note-book style, which is an appropriate and "living" form for a tale told from day to day, by a chronicler, sword in hand as well as pen, whose desk is often the saddle. The illustrations from the Daily Graphic are not well produced in this little volume, published by the Mercure de France, but the history of a revolt not precisely of European importance, and now swallowed up in the recent war, is full of interest, and told in a rapid, sober prose that is convincing and sincere. We hear of Armenia as peopled by a pacific race, adapted to oratory and thought, given to study, with an admirable literature and thirst for learning, "constantly ascending in patriotism and brotherhood." It is noteworthy that Armenia has drawn from M. Stéphane Mallarmé the single nearly lucid phrase he has ever written, addressed to M. A. Tchobanian, the translator of Zeitoun:

"That you should have, from a lake of blood, which is reflected redly on every thinking contemporary visage, awakened this pure lesson initiating an entire poetry, appears to me the most efficacious and delicate piety of a man of letters towards his devastated country, bruised and ready to spring from such evocations."

And for Mallarmé this is almost French and coherent.

H. L.

NEW BOOKS.

Belles d'Août. Auguste Marin.

Fédor. Alphonse Daudet.

Le Baron Sinai. Gyp.

Pays de l'Ouest. Gustave Geffroy.

THE BOOK MARKET.

IMPROBABLE BOOKS.

"CAN you really sell a book like this?" "Certainly. I sold a copy only a little while ago."

The book was a calf-bound folio: Voyage de Corneille le Brun, printed in Paris in 1714. It was one of a number of large, musty-looking books that formed a sort of rampart to a little shop in Red Lion Passage. Now Red Lion Passage is a narrow lane whereby you escape from Red Lion Square, and it is well beloved of book-hunters. The sun was setting over the square and shedding its last red rays directly down the Passage, which, to one's blinking gaze, took on a seventeenth-century air. Surely, I mused, Le Brun's sun set long ago; yet here, in the night of its uselessness, in the year of Nansen and Andrée, his Voyage is hopelessly exposed for sale.

"Will you explain it?" I said to Mr. Hobbs.

"Well, I don't know that there is much to be said. It is just this: here and there is a man who is interested in old voyages to the Levant and round about the East, and who perhaps finds the plates—you see there are many plates in the volume—interesting."

"But to buy it! I could understand him consulting such a book at the British Museum. It is entirely obsolete; it is hardly literature; it is in French; it weighs, I think, sixteen pounds: and you expect that a man will arrive and give you money for it and take it away?"

"I do."

"Well, come; here is Dryden's Fables in folio, magnificently printed, but surely unsaleable now?"

"I shall sell it. Indeed, it is partly sold already, for it has lost the plates!"

"Do you mean they have been bought out of the book?"

"Yes; I have no doubt that the last bookseller who had the volume sold the plates to a customer."

"Does that often occur?"

"Oh, yes."

"You mean that a customer will offer to buy the plates in a book, and the bookseller will cut them out for him with his pen-knife?"

"Certainly; it has been done here. You see, some people want pictures and some want reading; and in the case of a book of this kind it pays to divide them."

"Well, now, you won't pretend that you can easily sell these volumes that your kitten is playing on: Sir Paul Rycaut's The Turkish History, 1687? I see it is full of the lives of Othmans and Amuraths and Bajazets—gorgeous old stuff, no doubt; but can you sell such a book to a passer-by?"

"Not easily; but it will go, it will go."

"Echard's History of England, in three volumes?"

"That will not sell easily."

"Rollin's Ancient History, in seven volumes?"

"Yes; to a few libraries."

"Newton's Principia?"

"Yes."

"Now, I put it to you that you cannot sell Zimmerman on Solitude."

"But I can."

"Or Sturm's—"

"Reflections?" Yes; I own I'm a bit surprised when I sell that book, but I'm asked for it now and then, and also for Hervey's Meditations Among the Tombs."

"Well, what are these books in three long rows?"

"Now, there's an instance for you. That is a French Dictionary of Medical Science, published in Paris in 1812. I have the complete set in sixty volumes, all beautifully bound in calf!"

"And you can sell sixty volumes of a twenty-times-obsolete French medical work in Red Lion Passage to-day?"

"I think so. I bought it with that idea."

"It seems to me that as long as a book is a book it will sell at some price to some person."

"That is so."

DRAMA.

THE successful revival of "The Sign of the Cross" at the Lyric Theatre solves a problem in criticism which had been left in a somewhat unsatisfactory state, at all events for a section of the critics. No modern piece has been more severely mauled than Mr. Wilson Barrett's quasi-religious play, and none, on the other hand, has been hailed more cordially by the public, or, to take a rough, but conclusive, test of success, has made more money. Already on its arrival in London "The Sign of the Cross" was enjoying a great provincial popularity. "But," objected the superfine critics, "this is not a genuine piece of dramatic work, it appeals to a passing craze; it will never, like a really good play, stand the test of revival." Mr. William Archer, if I remember rightly, went so far as to call Mr. Barrett's magnum opus a "Salvation Army pantomime," a thing of shreds and patches, not only destitute of literary and dramatic qualities, but offensive to good taste. Alas, for this somewhat robustious opinion! "The Sign of the Cross" has stood the test of revival very well, proving that it possesses at least the dramatic quality; and as for taste, it is undeniably palatable to the multitude to which it appeals, which, I fancy, is the highest praise that can be accorded to any popular enterprise. On analysis it will be found that the enormous popularity of "The Sign of the Cross"—a phenomenon which deserves, yet does not demand attention—is due to two causes: first, that it is a well-constructed play, expounding a theme which is popular under all aspects—namely, the power of love in impelling to self-sacrifice—and secondly, because dealing with the sufferings of the early Christians under Nero it has acquired the reputation of being a "Christian" play, and consequently attracts the clergy and a large class of people not usually addicted to the drama. In one respect the popularity of "The Sign of the Cross" is fictitious: it is "Christian" only by accident. Suppose Mr. Barrett had chosen as the setting of his story the wars of the Cavaliers and the Roundheads or the French Revolution, he would still have been able to inspire interest in his theme. Instead of Mercia, the Christian maiden attracting the love of the Roman patrician, Marcus Superbus, we should have had a demure Puritan heroine inspiring a passion in the bosom of a gallant Royalist, or a daughter of the people winning the love of a haughty aristocrat. The dramatic qualities of the story would have remained; but it would no longer have been "Christian," and, consequently, it would not have enlisted the sympathy of the clergy and the Sunday-school teachers.

If we strip this love episode between Mercia and Marcus of its verbal accessories, it is amazing that it should be regarded as enforcing a Christian moral. There never was a passion more completely sordid. Marcus Superbus is not in love with Mercia because of her Christian principles. On the contrary, he rejects these as superstition. He has an eye solely to the attractive maiden, and at the last moment would have her renounce her faith. This she declines to do—indeed, on Mercia's part, there is very little evidence of a reciprocal passion at all. Marcus, then, as an afterthought, and with something of the exaltation of the suicidal lover, resolves to be thrown to the lions with his beloved, and presumably suffers this fate—for love, however, not religion! Marcus Superbus, whose death excites the compassion of the churches and chapels, is not a convert at all, or only a nominal one. He dies for the same reason that a blighted swain occasionally blows out his brains or takes a dose of "carbolic." Let us not forget, however, that the play could not have obtained its "Christian" vogue had it not been constructed on sound dramatic principles. At the risk of appearing to enunciate a platitude, I would say that nothing supersedes the dramatic element in drama. A play may be literary, "Christian" elevating, educative, what you please, but it must first of all be dramatic. That is the sine quid non. And it is here, I think, that hypercriticism has been guilty of some injustice towards Mr. Wilson Barrett as the author of "The Sign of the Cross." It has looked too exclusively to his dialogue, and not enough to his action. The peculiar dialect of "stageese" that Mr. Wilson Barrett affects is, I own, a hard nut for the literary critic to crack. It seems to be compounded of the Bible and Martin Tupper. "I would crave speech with thee," says one of his dramatis personæ. "I did but frame a jest," explains another. This is a species of gibberish of which the eminent author-actor, I believe, has a monopoly.

AND yet so strange a medium is the stage, the lingo, if I may without irreverence call it so, answers its purpose. It reminds us at least that the Romans of the Nero period did not talk English, and its préciosité conveys somehow a flavour of antiquity. "Marry, that will I," is a phrase of no particular race or period. For my part, I thank Mr. Barrett for it: it is a useful counter. A hundred years ago there were but two kinds of costume known to the stage—the ancient and the modern: the former covering all past ages without exception. It is Mr. Barrett's boast (if he chooses to make it one) that he has divided dialogue into two great sections—the ancient and the modern. It will be observed that, according to Mr. Barrett, they talked the same form of stageese in Babylon 500 years B.C. as in Imperial Rome. No estimate of the merits of the "Sign of the Cross," however, is just which does not acknowledge its admirable stage qualities. Its thrilling scenes are of the crescendo order; its motive is entirely sympathetic, and it flatters the unsophisticated eye with glowing pictures of the profligacy of the Roman ruling classes. Nor must we omit reference to the now famous shriek of the young actress who enacts a boy as he is about to be thrown to the lions, which, for their part, are heard roaring, "off." It recalls the blood-curdling shriek popularised some twelve or fourteen years ago by a now forgotten actress in a performance of "Jane Eyre."

WHAT strange news of ourselves we occasionally read in the French papers! Mr. Francisque Sarcy, the eminent critic of Le Temps, has been giving in his latest feuilleton a bird's-eye view of the London theatres, the luminous points of which, it appears, are our superabundance of Hamlets, and the success of "Tommy Atkins," at the Princes's. This end of the century, we are told, has seen four great Hamlets in London: those of Irving, Wilson Barrett, Tree, and—Gordon Craig! I am sorry to say I missed Mr. Gordon Craig's performance. M. Sarcy tells us that he has given up the question of Hamlet's madness as an indéchiffrable énigme. This is hard on several of the great Hamlets named, who have been but mad "when the wind was south-south-west," and who at other times have always known a hawk from a heronshaw. It is true I am unfamiliar with Mr. Gordon Craig's reading.

J. F. N.

SCIENCE.

IT is not altogether without justice that the Toronto press describes Prof. Roberts-Austen's lecture on "Canada's Metals" as the most interesting address ever delivered in the Dominion. Frequenters of the Royal Institution are familiar with some of the remarkable experiments and discoveries connected with metals which have been made by the Director of the Mint, but the public at large are probably unacquainted with them, and very few, indeed, have seen his latest results, the series of instantaneous splash photographs of molten gold which I had the pleasure of inspecting shortly before the distinguished professor's departure for Canada. These are taken on the principle of the photographs of splashes of water shown by Prof. Worthington, and the drop photographs of Mr. Vernon Boys. They prove, in a striking manner, that in their liquid state metals behave almost exactly like non-metallic fluids.

THE metals which Canada produces, and which are destined to give it a leading position in the world, are gold, silver, nickel, copper, lead, and iron. In addition, there are found there chromium, manganese, antimony, zinc, mercury, platinum, and traces of the rarer metals, such as molybdenum, which, though not very abundant or useful in themselves, exert a most remarkable influence when alloyed in minute quantities with commoner metals like iron. The same may be said of nickel, which has recently become of first-rate importance on account of the enormous resisting power which it confers upon steel for armour plates. The curious nature of these alloys, and the necessity for extreme accuracy in adjusting the proportions, is well-known, and may be exemplified by an experiment of Guillaume's, quoted and exhibited in Prof. Austen's lecture. Steel containing 22 per cent. of nickel expands more when heated than ordinary steel does, while steel containing 37 per cent. of nickel hardly expands at all, so that the nature of the material is entirely reversed in one essential particular by a difference of 15 per cent. in the admixture of one constituent. The most striking of all Prof. Austen's experiments are without doubt those on the mutual diffusion of two solid metals kept in a state of very close contact. Lead and gold are the two metals selected to exhibit this quality, which, although slow and necessarily limited in its action, is so remarkable as to upset our popular notions of a solid body altogether. In fact, Prof. Austen has shown that the three states of solid, liquid, and gaseous, instead of being utterly distinct, merge imperceptibly into each other, and that even in a solid there are molecules present which retain the freedom of motion possessed by gaseous molecules. Perhaps in time we shall need a Boyle's and an Avogadro's law for solids.

THE other lecture, given in accordance with custom to operatives of the town in which the British Association meeting is held, was one by Dr. Henry O. Forbes, on British New Guinea. Anything that Dr. Forbes selects to say about the Australasian and Malaysian groups is bound to be interesting, on account of the wealth of information which he has collected from those little-known regions, and their bearing upon the great problem of early continental distribution. Dr. Forbes, in his lecture, explained the meaning of "Wallace's line," and showed how the difference in the fauna and flora of regions separated by even so narrow a channel as that between Lombok and Bali is important as determining what lands originally belonged to the great northern continent, and what to the even greater continent which once surrounded the Southern Pole, embracing the major part of Australasia, South America, and, probably for a shorter time, South Africa. There is no greater story written on the face of the earth than that which records the manifold subsidences and elevations which alternately separated, insulated, or joined together the lands in the Southern Hemisphere. Here we can read the history of organic evolution on a dozen different lines, some almost entirely distinct, some blending at remote epochs, as we can see from the survival in South America of rare marsupial forms like those which now no longer exist anywhere but in the Australian continent.

By the time these notes are published the British Association meeting at Toronto will be a thing of the past, and members will be radiating away on their excursions and travels in every direction. There is no reason for regarding it otherwise than as a great success from the point of view of an international scientific gathering, the large intermixture of American and Canadian workers being an especially pleasant feature. What will appeal to most people even more than its success is, however, the felicitous thought which, in this year of Imperial jubileations, selected for the meeting-place England's oldest and in many ways most serviceable colony.

H. C. M.

BOOK REVIEWS REVIEWED.

"The Wisdom of Fools." By Margaret Deland. (Longmans.)

In the Daily Telegraph Mr. Courtney devotes his weekly column to the examination of these four stories from the pen which wrote John Ward, Preacher. "Are the commonplace people . . . right when they formulate rules based on a large and comprehensive mundane experience; or are the saints right—if indeed that be the correct term to apply to them—the unconventional souls, the visionaries, the fools? In each of her four stories Margaret Deland debates this argument, and, like an artist and a critic, she comes to no conclusion. . . . The critical ingenuity is the same throughout—that careful analysis of motives and contrast of ideals which gives to the artist his keenest intellectual satisfaction. But Margaret Deland must not call herself a student of life while she writes likes this; she is rather the critic who loves to watch the iridescent play on the surface of things. . . . And, he asks, "what is the conclusion of the whole matter? Well, perhaps this. There is a wisdom of this world and . . . another kind of wisdom, not of this world, which men usually call folly; but it happens, nevertheless, to satisfy some minds not the least worthy of honour and regard. If a man cannot make up his mind which . . . he is going to accept, heaven help him! He must not attempt to mix the two . . ." Says the Chronicle: "These stories have not quite all the gracious charm of style which we have learned to look for in everything that comes from Mrs. Deland's pen. They are, perhaps, a trifle overweighted with purpose." Also, "we find ourselves quite unable to reply with confidence to any of the interrogations with which these stories end. But we have enjoyed reading them none the less." Of "The House of Rimmon," which it describes as "the most powerful, the deepest, and the most momentous in the issues it involves," the National Observer writes that "the relation of capital and labour are set forth with an impartiality and bold realism that reflect the highest credit on the logic as well as the humanity of the author. . . . Mrs. Deland shows herself in each instance to be a thinker, a woman of the world, and a humanitarian in its secular sense." The Pall Mall's Irresponsible Critic writes: "These sketches, with their subtle characterisation, their depth of thought, and with the ease and humour of their style, are worthy of comparison with Scenes of Clerical Life."

"Ibsen on his Merits." By Sir E. Russell and P. C. Standing. (Chapman & Hall.)

"MR. STANDING," writes the Chronicle, "has nothing to say, and does not know how to say it. He has no critical faculty, and cannot even realise the problems which Ibsen presents to criticism. . . . He babbles backwards and forwards about the plays without any attempt at order or coherence; . . . moreover he registers with approval or condemnation the opinions of quaint and surprising people, from 'Tjngonde Häftat' [which means nothing more or less than No. XX. of some magazine] to Miss Marie Corelli. . . . Mr. Standing's bump of admiration is indeed immense." On the other hand, Sir Edward Russell's lecture, though timorous and apologetic, is at least "the work of a competent man of letters." What mainly offends him in Ibsen is his "provincialism"—"an old reproach, which at best has only a local meaning. . . . But when with 'provincialism,' Sir Edward Russell brackets 'puerility' of technique, one can only wonder to find so eminent a critic writing in apparent unconsciousness of the dramatic movement of Europe." "The students of Ibsen," writes the Saturday reviewer, ". . . are like a choir who are endeavouring to persuade an unwilling audience at a concert to appreciate an abstruse new musician. They are not helped, they are much exasperated, by the rushing in of two volunteers who propose to assist them on a jew's-harp and a penny whistle." "The authors claim to have worked in collaboration; . . . but we are enabled to distinguish between them. Sir E. R. Russell rarely trusts himself to a definite statement, and is therefore less often startlingly wrong than Mr. Standing, whose boldness of assertion and daring defiance of books of reference are distinctly pleasing." The National Observer is disappointed to find in Sir Edward Russell's contribution to this joint production neither the indiscriminate eulogy nor the wholesale condemnation suggested by the phrase "on his merits."

Mr. Bellamy's "Equality." (Heinemann.)

"MR. BELLAMY," observes the Chronicle, "has evidently taken enormous pains with his work, and seen carefully to the joints of his armour. The book contains many good arguments, some unanswerable indictments of the present civilisation, and much that gives the reader cause to think. But we could have wished that it had been livelier." For the book "has not one of the essentials of fiction. There is no movement, no development, no characterisation, no drama, no psychology, no bright or in the slightest degree interesting dialogue." The characters "all talk about the same subjects in exactly the same way." "With the bad old order there will have passed away entirely, it seems, a sense of humour. . . . An unappeasable and unappeased longing again and again comes over us that someone would, at least, try to say something funny. . . . But what we thirst for most is the right to box the ears of some of the children." The Daily News permits itself to observe that "at least a social philosopher who undertakes to treat of overproduction should show some knowledge of the doctrines of the Ricardian school on this head." "A sequel," observes the Standard, "is apt to come as an anticlimax, and Mr. Bellamy's Equality is a case in point. . . . Mr. Bellamy has ridden a good idea to death—and a dull death."

E P P S ' S
GRATEFUL—COMFORTING
C O C O A

THE BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL

is in use (in preference to cedar pencils) at

THE WAR OFFICE
BANK OF ENGLAND
NEW ZEALAND GOVERNMENT
OFFICE
BANKERS' CLEARING HOUSE
UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT
OFFICES
OXFORD UNIVERSITY
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY
ETON COLLEGE
UNITED STATES ARSENAL
UNITED STATES NAVY
PENNSYLVANIA AND OTHER
AMERICAN RAILWAY COMPANIES
THE LONDON STOCK EXCHANGE
NORTH BRITISH AND MERCANTILE
AND OTHER INSURANCE OFFICES

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK,
CITY BANK, LONDON AND SOUTH-
WESTERN BANK, AND OTHER
LONDON AND PROVINCIAL BANKS
IN THE OFFICES OF THE LONDON
AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY,
MIDLAND RAILWAY, GREAT
NORTHERN RAILWAY, GREAT
EASTERN RAILWAY, LONDON,
BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST
RAILWAY, SOUTH-EASTERN
RAILWAY, LONDON AND
SOUTH - WESTERN RAILWAY,
LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE
RAILWAY, CALEDONIAN RAIL-
WAY, AND OTHER RAILWAY
COMPANIES.

HOW USED.

Start the paper with a pin or any pointed instrument—a slight pull—off it comes, and the lead pencil is sharpened. Thirty Fresh Points to every Pencil. The only wear is from use, not from whittling away or breaking the lead.

No wood chips are left on the floor, nor any dirty marking-stuff on your fingers.

What the Newspapers say of the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL Truth.

"There is no limit to the ingenuity of the Americans in improving upon the ordinary paraphernalia of daily life. The other day I found my office table provided with a set of new editorial pencils—red, blue, and black. Being struck by something unusual in their appearance, I made inquiries, and discovered that they represented the latest Yankee notion in lead pencils, the lead being mounted in a stick of tightly-packed paper instead of wood. The paper is laid on in layers, and the advantage of the arrangement is that when the point is broken or worn down, you tear off one layer of paper, and a new and perfectly symmetrical point is instantly produced without any further process of sharpening. This is called the 'Blaisdell' pencil, and if Blaisdell is the inventor, I hope he may make a fortune out of it."

The Queen.

"What an improvement this is upon the old laborious process of pencil sharpening, and how much less extravagant with regard to the consumption of the lead, which cannot snap off when thus treated!"

Westminster Gazette.

"It is decidedly an ingenious idea."

Black and White.

"The 'Blaisdell self-sharpening paper pencil' is a remarkably smart contrivance. The lead is encased in paper, which can easily be unrolled when a fresh point is required."

The Lady.

"A self-sharpening paper pencil does not sound a very promising invention, but anyone who becomes possessed of one of the Blaisdell variety will acknowledge at once that it is a very ingenious little article. These pencils need no knife to sharpen them, as, by simply tearing off a little roll of paper at the end, a new point appears. They are made in black, red, or blue, for office work, and are well worthy of a trial."

Evening News and Post.

"One of the latest inventions that tend to make literary life better worth living is the Blaisdell Paper Pencil. Penknives, blackened thumbs and unparliamentary language when the point snaps short at an important moment are now at a discount. All that the writer or reporter has to do is to insert a pin in a spot indicated on the pencil-stem, and, lo! a little roll of paper unfolds like a diminutive shaving, or a released curl, and a fresh already sharpened point appears to gladden his eyes and stimulate his harassed brain."

HOW SOLD.

Ask for the BLAISDELL SELF-SHARPENING PENCIL at any stationer's. The BLACKLEAD PENCILS made in 5 Grades: H.B.; H.; B.; H.H.; B.B.; finest Bavarian Lead, equal to the highest quality of Artists' Pencils. COLOURED CRAYON PENCILS in Blue, Red, Yellow, Green, and Black, tough and smooth, rich in colour.

If your stationer does not sell them, send 1s. for set of sample pencils to—

BLAISDELL PAPER PENCIL CO., LTD.,
46, HOLBORN VIADUCT, LONDON, E.C.

Fountain Pens and Stylos:

*The objections to them, and how they have
been met.*

Cæteris paribus everyone would rather use a fountain pen that carries its own ink, and can, therefore, be used anywhere and at any moment, in preference to an ordinary pen, which has to be dipped in the ink every minute or so.

But fountain pens have acquired a bad name from two or three general objections to them. "A fountain pen is all very well," people say, "but it has to be carried upright, otherwise the ink comes out in your pocket; in fact, the ink spills and makes a hideous mess on the smallest provocation. By way of compensation, when you want to write, the ink retires to the barrel (if it isn't all spilled into your pocket) and refuses to emerge until the pen has been shaken and thumped until it squirts out a blot on the carpet."

This used to be true; but the CAW PEN has met the difficulty. It does not have to be carried upright; it can be carried sideways, upside down, or in any position whatever. The ink cannot possibly spill, because it is in a hermetically closed chamber, screwed tight. There is no air-hole.

The pen can be jerked or thrown about as much as you please; it cannot spill. On the other hand, until the CAW PEN is opened for use the nib (which is a gold one of the finest quality) is immersed in the ink. Consequently it writes at once, without giving any trouble.

The CAW PEN is not merely the only fountain pen which anyone cares to use who has once seen it as a pocket pen, but it is so convenient for desk use that it supersedes all other pens whatever.

It is easily filled, and having a wide mouth does not clog with air bubbles during that operation. Prices from 12s. 6d.

"Caw pens have a repute beyond their neighbours."

Westminster Budget.

The objection to Stylographic Pens is that the point rarely suits the writer's hand, and cannot be adjusted.

The CAW STYLOGRAPHIC PEN can be adjusted in an instant. It has not all the advantages of the CAW FOUNTAIN PEN; but for people who prefer a stylo this is the best stylo on the market. Prices from 5s.

British Depot: 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

CLARENDON PRESS LIST.

NOW READY, in 2 vols., 32s.
THE "OPUS MAJUS"
 or
ROGER BACON.

Edited, with Introduction and Analytical Table, by JOHN HENRY BRIDGES,

Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, sometime Fellow of Oriel College, Oxford.

In 2 vols., medium 8vo, half-roan, 28s.
Uniform with Dr. BIRKBECK HILL'S Editions of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" and "Letters of Samuel Johnson."
JOHNSONIAN MISCELLANIES. Arranged and

Edited by GEORGE BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., LL.D., Honorary Fellow of Pembroke College, Oxford.
TIMES.—"Dr. George Birkbeck Hill deserves the admiration of the faithful in all lands for the zeal with which he has devoted himself to renovating and almost rebuilding the temples that an earlier generation has raised to the memory of Johnson."
ACADEMY.—"We have now, in all, eight volumes of 'Life, Letters, and Miscellanies,' embodying practically all that is known, and all that ever will be known, of Dr. Johnson."

Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.
SOURCES for GREEK HISTORY between the
PERSIAN and PELOPONNESIAN WARS. Collected and Arranged by G. F. HILL, M.A., of the British Museum, Fellow of University College, London.
TIMES.—"The work seems to us to be done in a complete and scholar-like manner. It is likely to prove extremely useful both to teachers and scholars."
MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"A most meritorious volume from every point of view."

Demy 8vo, Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged, 12s.
CHAPTERS of EARLY ENGLISH CHURCH
HISTORY. By WILLIAM BRIGHT, D.D., Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History, and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford.
CHURCH TIMES.—"A valuable source of information."

A SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME TO "THE OXFORD CHAUCER."
 Now ready, demy 8vo, cloth, 18s.
Uniform with the Library Edition of Chaucer's Works.

CHAUCERIAN and OTHER PIECES. Edited from numerous Manuscripts by the Rev. W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D.
TIMES.—"The general execution of the volume and its apparatus of notes, glossarial index, &c., is as admirable as the world expects everything of Professor Skeat's to be."

Just published, Second Edition, small 4to, 10s. 6d.
REGISTRUM SACRUM ANGLICANUM: an Attempt to Exhibit the Course of Episcopal Succession in England. By W. STUBBS, D.D.
TIMES.—"It is needless to point out how useful such a volume should be.... The mediæval portion has been greatly improved through the increase of knowledge which has come from the researches of scholars."

Now ready, Second Edition, greatly Enlarged, 1,000 Illustrations, cloth, 31s. 6d. net.
THE BLAZON of EPISCOPACY. By the Rev. W. K. R. BEDFORD, M.A.
"The Blazon of Episcopacy," a Catalogue of the Arms borne by or ascribed to individual Bishops of the Sees of England and Wales from the Earliest Period of Armorial History."
STANDARD.—"A valuable addition to armorial literature."

ALSO PUBLISHED BY HENRY FROWDE.
 Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. Vol. I. already published.
A REGISTER of the MEMBERS of ST. MARY
MAGDALEN COLLEGE, OXFORD. New Series. Vol. II., FELLOWS, 1522-1575. By WILLIAM DUNN MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A., Fellow, Rector of Ducklington, Oxon.
THE ENGLISH DIALECT DICTIONARY: being the Complete Vocabulary of all Dialect Words still in use or known to have been in use during the last Two Hundred Years; founded mainly on the Publications of the English Dialect Society and a large amount of material never before printed. Part III., BLARE-CADDIE. Edited by Dr. JOSEPH WRIGHT, M.A., Ph.D., Deputy Professor of Comparative Philology in the University of Oxford.
 Annual Subscription for Two Parts—Ordinary Paper, 31s. net; Hand-made Paper, 42s. net. Each Part to Non-Subscribers—Ordinary Paper, 15s. net; Hand-made paper, 30s. net.

SELECT LIST OF STANDARD BOOKS.

From 3s. 6d. to 7s. 6d.

BUNYAN.—The HOLY WAR, and The
HEAVENLY FOOTMAN. With Introduction and Notes by MABEL PEACOCK. Cloth, 3s. 6d.
Saturday Review.—"A handy and admirable reprint."

BUNYAN.—The PILGRIM'S PRO- GRESS, GRACE ABOUNDING, and A RELATION of his IMPRISONMENT. Edited, with Biographical Introduction and Notes, by EDMUND VENABLES, M.A. With Illustrations. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; parchment, 4s. 6d.

AN INTRODUCTION to GREEK
SCULPTURE. By L. E. UPCOTT, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.
Cambridge Review.—"Mr. Upcott is thoroughly in love with his subject, and puts his ideas into good literary form."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"The idea of this little book is excellent."

GOLDEN TREASURY of GREEK
PROSE, being a Collection of the finest Passages in the Principal Greek Prose Writers, with Introductory Notices and Notes. By R. S. WRIGHT, M.A., and J. E. L. SEADWELL, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo, 4s. 6d.

CLARENDON.—HISTORY of the RE-
BELLION. Book VI. Edited by T. ARNOLD, M.A. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

VOYAGES of the ELIZABETHAN
SEAMEN to AMERICA. Edited by E. J. PAYNE, M.A. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 5s. First Series—HAWKINS, FROBISHER, DRAKE.
Notes and Queries.—"We know of no book or essay, large or small, which gives so complete a picture."

The DYNASTY of THEODOSIUS; or,
Seventy Years' Struggle with the Barbarians. By THOMAS HODGKIN, D.C.L., Author of "Italy and her Invaders." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

A STUDENT'S PASTIME: being a Select Series of Articles reprinted from Notes and Queries. By WALTER W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

Notes and Queries.—"The latest information derived from the closest investigation and analysis of our literature is here given in the most succinct shape."

CLARENDON.—CHARACTERS and
EPISODES of the GREAT REBELLION. Selections from Clarendon. Edited by G. BOYLE, M.A. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

From 8s. 6d. to 12s. 6d.

THE STUDY of MEDIÆVAL and
MODERN HISTORY. Lectures by WILLIAM STUBBS D.D. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d.
Times.—"Of altogether exceptional value."

THE ANCIENT CLASSICAL DRAMA.
 A Study in Literary Evolution. Intended for Readers in English and in the Original. By R. G. MOULTON, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 8s. 6d.
University Extension Journal.—"A popular yet scholarly presentation of the main ideas which underlie the ancient classical drama."

THE GOLDEN TREASURY of
ANCIENT GREEK POETRY. By R. S. WRIGHT, M.A., Oxford. Second Edition, Revised by EVELYN ABBOTT, M.A., LL.D. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

SELECT STATUTES and other CON- STITUTIONAL DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE of the REIGNS of ELIZABETH and JAMES I. Edited by G. W. PROTHERO. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.
Athenæum.—"This volume supplies a want which must have been felt by all historical students, by giving us in a concise form the most important documentary materials for a critical period in our national annals."

SMITH (ADAM).—LECTURES on
JUSTICE, POLICE, REVENUE, and ARMS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by EDWIN CANNAN. 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

LETTERS of DAVID HUME to
WILLIAM STRAHAN. Now first Edited, with Autobiography, Notes, Index, &c., by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. With a Facsimile. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d.
Academy.—"We have never seen a book better edited or better annotated."

THE ATTIC THEATRE. A Description of the Stage and Theatre of the Athenians, and of the Dramatic Performances at Athens. By A. E. HAIGH, M.A. 8vo, 12s. 6d.
Academy.—"A book more thorough and more trustworthy can seldom have been issued by the Clarendon Press. It is unlikely that for a long time to come so good a book will be superseded."

The TRAGIC DRAMA of the GREEKS.
 With Illustrations. By the Same Author. 8vo, 12s. 6d.
Glasgow Herald.—"For general grasp of the subject, and fine literary criticism and appreciation of character, Mr. Haigh has given us the best account that has yet appeared in English of the Greek tragic drama."

From 14s. upwards.

A MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY,
 from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Sassanian Empire, comprising the History of Chaldaea, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Rome, and Parthia. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Demy 8vo, cloth, 14s.

THE MELANESIANS. Studies in their Anthropology and Folk-lore. By R. H. CODRINGTON, D.D. 8vo, cloth, 18s.
Saturday Review.—"Probably no better book concerning the manners, customs, beliefs, and arts of a barbaric people has ever been written than Dr. Codrington's 'Melanésians.'"

100 Copies only remain on sale, all of which are numbered.
OEST DAUCASI and DE NICOLETE.
 Reproduced in Photo-facsimile and Type-transliteration from the Unique MS. in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris. fronds française, 2169, by the care of F. W. BOURDILLON, M.A. Small 4to, half-vellum, 24s. net.
Times.—"The production of this book will assuredly endear Mr. Bourdillon to all bibliophiles.... His enthusiasm was well deserved, for his delicious twelfth century cantable, or story combining prose and verse, stands absolutely alone, both as a story and as a picture of the life of that time."

THE POLITICS. With Introductions,
 Notes, &c., by W. L. NEWMAN, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. 2 vols., medium 8vo, 28s.
Classical Review.—"The most complete commentary on the greater and more important part of the Politics which has yet appeared, and it is not likely to be easily or soon superseded."

THE CULTS of the GREEK STATES.
 By L. R. FARNELL, M.A. 8vo. Vols. I. and II., with 61 Plates and over 100 Illustrations, cloth, 32s. net.

HISTORIA NUMORUM. A Manual of Greek Numismatics. By BAROLAY V. HEAD, D.C.L., Keeper of the Department of Coins and Medals in the British Museum. Royal 8vo, half-morocco, 42s.
Saturday Review.—"This book deserves, as few do, the German epithet of epoch-making in respect of the science with which it is concerned."

MAIOLICA: a Historical Treatise on the Glazed and Enamelled Earthenwares of Italy, with Marks and Monograms, also some Notices of the Persian, Damascus, Rhodian, and Hispano-Moresque Wares. By A. DRURY C. FORTNUM. Crown 4to, with Coloured Frontispiece, Collotype Plates, and Facsimiles of Marks, &c., cloth, 42s. net.
Times.—"We congratulate the author upon the production of by far the most complete account of Italian Renaissance pottery which exists in England."

A CATALOGUE OF THE CLARENDON PRESS PUBLICATIONS WILL BE SENT POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

Printed by ALEXANDER & SHEPHEARD, Lonsdale Printing Works, Chancery Lane; Published for the Proprietor by PETER GEORGE ANDREWS, 48, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1322.—NEW SERIES.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1897.

PRICE 3d.
[Registered as a Newspaper.]

CATALOGUES.

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The SEPTEMBER CATALOGUES of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW REMAINERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, are Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 188, Strand, London, W.C.

POTTER'S BOOK CATALOGUE on General Literature (No. 116, for AUGUST), at reduced prices, post free. Sporting Works purchased.—WILLIAM POTTER, 30, Exchange Street East, Liverpool.

H. GREVEL & CO., PUBLISHERS and IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS, 32, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

Daily Importations of all Prominent New Publications. CATALOGUES of the Foreign Antiquaries can be had by stating subjects required.

FOREIGN BOOKS and PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.

CATALOGUES on application. DULAU & CO., 37, SOHO SQUARE.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, IMPORTERS of FOREIGN BOOKS, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, 30, South Frederick Street, Edinburgh, and 7, Broad Street, Oxford. CATALOGUES post free on application.

T. H. WOHLLEBEN, FOREIGN BOOKSELLER, 45, Great Russell Street (Opposite the British Museum), Supplies all Foreign Books and Periodicals at the most moderate prices. CATALOGUES on application.

W. THACKER & CO., PUBLISHERS and EXPORTERS, 2, Creed Lane, London, E.C. Calcutta: THACKER, SPIKE & Co. MSS. considered for Publication. (Established 1819.)

AGENCY FOR AMERICAN BOOKS. G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, PUBLISHERS and BOOKSELLERS of 27 and 28 West 33rd Street, New York, and 24 BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C. desire to call the attention of the READING PUBLIC to the excellent facilities presented by their Branch House in London for filling, on the most favourable terms, orders for their own STANDARD PUBLICATIONS and for ALL AMERICAN BOOKS and PERIODICALS—CATALOGUES sent on application.

IMPORTANT.—PRINTING and PUBLISHING. NEWSPAPERS, MAGAZINES, BOOKS, &c.—KING, SELL & RALTON, Limited, high-class Printers and Publishers, 12, Gough Square, 4, Bolt Court, Fleet Street, E.C. have specially-built Rotary and other fast Machines for printing illustrated and other Publications and specially-built Machines for fast folding and covering 8, 16, 24, or 32-page Journals at one operation. Advice and assistance given to anyone wishing to commence New Journals. Facilities upon the premises for Editorial Offices, free. Advertising and Publishing Departments conducted. Telephone 65121. Telegraph "Africanism, London."

MESSRS. J. C. DRUMMOND & CO., ART REPRODUCERS, 14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C. Are the sole representatives in Great Britain of HERB HANFSTAENGL, of Munich

The well-known Artist in PHOTOGRAPHY now patronised by the leading London Art Publishing Firms. A large Collection of Important Plates always on view.

Process Blocks for the purpose of Ordinary Book Illustrations.

Messrs. DRUMMOND & CO. supply the cheapest and best Processes in the market, which are specially adapted to meet the wants of Antiquarians, Archaeologists, and those engaged in the investigation and publication of Parochial and Diocesan Records.

J. C. DRUMMOND & CO. invite attention to their Improved Rapid Photo-Mechanical Process for the Reproduction of Works of Art, Original MSS., Designs, Lace Manufactures, Photographs, Views, Book Illustrations, Artistic Advertisements, Catalogues, &c., &c., at a moderate cost.

Specimens and Price List on application. Offices: 4, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON

DEPARTMENT of SCIENCE and ART. ROYAL COLLEGE of ART, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.

Visitors: Sir W. B. RICHMOND, R.A.; F. J. SHIELDS, A.R.W.S. Principal: JOHN C. L. SPARKES, Esq.

The ANNUAL SESSION, 1897-98, will COMMENCE on WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6. Art classes in connection with the college are open to the public on payment of fees. The classes for men and women students meet separately. The studies comprise Ornament and the Figure, with a view to their ultimate use in Design and Composition, and include the study of Plants and Flowers, the Painting of Still Life, and the Drawing and Painting of Ornament and of the Figure.

Candidates for admission who have not passed an examination of the department in freehand drawing must pass the admission examination in that subject.

The Examination will be held at the College on September 28 and October 5 at 11.45 a.m. and 6.45 p.m. on both days, and on subsequent Tuesdays at frequent intervals throughout the session.

Application for further information may be made in writing to the Secretary, Department of Science and Art, S.W., or on and after October 6, personally to the Registrar, at the College, Exhibition Road, S.W.

By order of the LORDS of the COMMITTEE of COUNCIL on EDUCATION.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. TECHNICAL EDUCATION BOARD.

The Technical Education Board of the London County Council is prepared to receive APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of HEAD MASTER of the new CAMBERWELL SCHOOL of ARTS and CRAFTS, erected by Mr. Passmore Edwards in memory of the late Lord Leighton. The salary will be at the rate of £400 a year, and the Head Master, whose services will be required in October, will be expected to devote his whole time to the duties of the office, unless he is also appointed by the Vestry of the Parish of Camberwell to be Director of the South London Art Gallery.

Forms of application, together with full particulars of the duties and conditions of the Appointment, may be obtained from the undersigned, and must be returned to this Office on or before Wednesday, 15th September.

WM. GARNETT, Secretary of the Board, 9A, St. Martin's Place, W.C., 30th July, 1897.

VICTORIA UNIVERSITY. THE YORKSHIRE COLLEGE, LEEDS.

The 24th SESSION of the DEPARTMENT of SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY, and ARTS will begin on OCTOBER 5, and the 6th SESSION of the SCHOOL of MEDICINE on OCTOBER 1, 1897.

The Classes prepare for the following professions:—Chemistry, Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, and Sanitary Engineering, Coal Mining, Textile Industries, Dyeing, Leather Manufacture, Agriculture, School Teaching, Medicine, and Surgery.

University Degrees are also conferred in the Faculties of Arts, Science, Medicine, and Surgery. Prospectuses of any of the above may be had from the REGISTRAR.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE of WALES. ABERYSTWYTH.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the post of Temporary ASSISTANT LECTURER in the DEPARTMENT of GREEK. The Lecturer will be required to undertake part of the work of the Department during the Session 1897-8, being the term of office of the Principal—who is also Professor of Greek—a Vice-Chancellor of the University of Wales. Applications, with Testimonials, should be sent not later than Wednesday, September 15th, to the undersigned, from whom further particulars may be obtained.

T. MORTIMER GREEN, Registrar.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

LECTURES ON ZOOLOGY.

The GENERAL COURSE of LECTURES, by Professor W. F. R. WELDON, F.R.S., will commence on WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 6th, at 1 p.m.

These Lectures are suited to the requirements of Students preparing for the Examinations of the London University, as well as to those of Students wishing to study Zoology for its own sake. Notice of other Courses of Lectures, to be delivered during the Session, will be given later.

J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL.—AN EXAMINATION for FILLING UP about TWENTY VACANCIES in the FOUNDATION will be held on the 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th SEPTEMBER NEXT.—For information apply to the Bursar, St. Paul's School, West Kensington, W.

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S HOSPITAL and COLLEGE.

PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC CLASS.

SYSTEMATIC COURSES of LECTURES and LABORATORY WORK in the subjects of the Preliminary Scientific and Intermediate B.Sc. Examinations of the University of London will commence on OCTOBER 1st, and continue till July, 1898.

Fee for the Whole Course, £21, or £18 18s. to Students of the Hospital; or Single Subjects may be taken.

There is a special Class for the January Examination. For further particulars apply to the WARDEN of the College, St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, E.C.

A Handbook forwarded on application.

LITERARY RESEARCH.—A Gentleman, experienced in Literary Work, and who has access to the British Museum Reading Room, is open to arrange with Author or any person requiring assistance in Literary Research, or in seeing Work through the Press. Translations undertaken from French, Italian, or Spanish.—Apply, by letter, to D. C. DALLAS, 5, Farnival Street, London, E.C.

UNIVERSITY of ST. ANDREWS.

CHANCELLOR—His Grace the DUKE of ARGYLL, K.T., LL.D. Rector—The Most Honourable the MARQUESS of BUTE, K.T., LL.D. PRINCIPAL—JAMES DONALDSON, M.A., LL.D.

OPENING OF SESSION, 1897-98.

UNITED COLLEGE.

This College will be formally OPENED on TUESDAY, 5th October, and the WINTER SESSION will begin on WEDNESDAY, 6th October.

The PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS, with which the Examinations for Bursaries are combined, will commence on 25th September. Schedules of Admission will be supplied by the SECRETARY up to 19th September.

There are Sixty-seven Bursaries vacant, ranging in value from £40 to £2 15s. Of these Forty-five are tenable by Men only, Twenty (which are restricted to Students who intend to enter the Medical Profession) by Women only, and Two (the Berry Bursaries of £40 each) by either Men or Women.

In the course of the Session Eight Scholarships will be competed for, Five of which are open to both sexes. They range in value from £100 to £50.

ST. MARY'S COLLEGE.

This College will be OPENED on TUESDAY, 26th October. The Examinations for Bursaries will be held on 32nd and 23rd October. Intimation of candidature is not necessary. There are Eight Competitive Bursaries vacant, ranging in value from £40 to £12. At the close of the Session Two Scholarships of £100 each, One of £21, and One of £14, will be open to competition.

The Classes in the University are open to Students of both sexes, and include Latin, Greek, English, French, Hebrew, Syriac, Modern Greek, Logic and Metaphysics, Moral Philosophy, Education, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, Zoology, Botany, History, Physiology, Anatomy, Materia Medica, Systematic Theology, Biblical Criticism and Church History.

Specimen Examination Papers and full particulars respecting the Courses of Instruction, Fees, Examinations for Degrees, &c., will be found in the CALENDAR of the UNIVERSITY, published by Messrs. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & Sons, 45, George Street, Edinburgh, price 2s. 6d.—by post 2s. 10d.

A general Prospectus for the coming Winter Session, as well as detailed information regarding any department of the University, may be had on application to

J. MAITLAND ANDERSON, Secretary. University of St. Andrews, 26th August, 1897.

THE LEEDS SCHOOL of ART

A MASTER of DESIGN is REQUIRED for the LEEDS SCHOOL of ART, to commence duties at the middle of September, at £150 per annum. Application, stating age and experience, together with copies of Three Testimonials, to be sent not later than September 11th, to Mr. J. O. DAYSON, Secretary, The Institute, Cookridge Street, Leeds, from whom any further particulars may be obtained.

THE DURHAM COLLEGE of SCIENCE, NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.

PRINCIPAL—REV. H. P. GURNEY, M.A., D.C.L. The College forms part of the University of Durham, and the University Degrees in Science and Letters are open to Students both sexes.

In addition to the Departments of Mathematics and Natural Science complete Courses are provided in Agriculture, Engineering, Naval Architecture, Mining, Literature, History, Ancient and Modern Languages, Fine Art, &c. Residential Hostels for Men and for Women Students are attached to the College.

The 27th SESSION begins SEPTEMBER 27th, 1897. Full particulars of the University Curricula in Science and Letters will be found in the CALENDAR (price 1s. 4d.). Prospectuses on application to the SECRETARY.

THE AUTHOR'S HAIRLESS PAPER-PAD.

(The LEADENHALL PRESS, Ltd., 50, Leadenhall Street, London, E.C.)

Contains hairless paper, over which the pen slips with perfect freedom. Sixpence each. 5s. per dozen, ruled or plain.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

TWO-AND-A-HALF per CENT. INTEREST allowed on DEPOSITS repayable on demand.

TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS, on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

STOCKS, SHARES, and ANNUITIES purchased and sold.

SAVINGS DEPARTMENT.

For the encouragement of Thrift the Bank receives small sums on deposit and allows interest monthly on each completed £1.

BIRKBECK BUILDING SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A HOUSE

FOR TWO GUINEAS PER MONTH.

BIRKBECK FREEHOLD LAND SOCIETY.

HOW TO PURCHASE A PLOT OF LAND

FOR FIVE SHILLINGS PER MONTH.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars post free.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

A NEW AMERICAN NOVEL.

Thirty-five Thousand Copies have already been Sold

PRICE SIX SHILLINGS.

THE CHOIR INVISIBLE.

By JAMES LANE ALLEN.

GUARDIAN.—"One of those rare books that will bear reading many times."

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Certainly a book that should be read by all those who ask for something besides sensationalism in their fiction."

ACADEMY.—"The Choir Invisible" is a fine achievement."

SECOND EDITION, now ready.

With Illustrations, 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

A RIDE THROUGH WESTERN ASIA.

By CLIVE BIGHAM. Part I. ASIA MINOR. Part II. PERSIA, North to South. Part III. TURKISH ARABIA. Part IV. PERSIA, West to East. Part V. CENTRAL ASIA.

GUARDIAN.—"We have met with few travellers' books which tell so much and so well in so short a space."

With Illustrations and Maps, 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

WITH the TURKISH ARMY in THESSALY. By OLIVE BIGHAM, Special Correspondent of the Times, Author of "A Ride Through Western Asia."

TIMES.—"Forms a valuable record of the war as seen from the Turkish point of view."

VOLUME II. and PART XX. now ready.

THE HISTORY OF MANKIND. By

Professor FRIEDRICH RATZEL. Translated from the Second German Edition by A. J. BUTLER, M.A., with Preface by E. B. TYLOR, D.C.L. With Coloured Plates, Maps, and numerous Illustrations in the Text. In 30 monthly parts at 1s. net, and in 3 volumes, super-royal 8vo, 12s. net each.

SHILLING CLOTH EDITION of

CHARLES KINGSLEY'S

WESTWARD HO! HEReward the WAKE.
TWO YEARS AGO. ALTON LOCKE.
YEAST. HYPATIA.

Medium 8vo, 1s. each.

MACMILLAN & CO. (LIMITED), LONDON.

THE FORUM.

1s. 6d.—SEPTEMBER, 1897.—1s. 6d.

A PLEA for the NAVY. Hon. H. A. HERBERT
ALASKA and the NEW GOLD-FIELD. Prof. WM. HEALEY DALL
STRIKES and the COAL-MINERS. SAMUEL GOMPERS
HAWAII and the CHANGING FRONT of the WORLD. Hon. J. R. PROCTOR

WHAT WOMEN HAVE DONE for the PUBLIC HEALTH. EDITH PARKER THOMSON
AMERICAN ANNEXATION and ARMAMENT. MURAT HALSTEAD
THE SUPREMACY of RUSSIA. Prof. THOMAS DAVIDSON

THE HISTORICAL NOVEL. Prof. BRAND R. MATTHEWS
THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION and RATE-MAKING. Dr. JOSEPH NIXON, JUN.

UNCONSTITUTIONALITY of RECENT ANTI-TRUST LEGISLATION. DAVID WILLCOX
IS the CUBAN CAPABLE of SELF-GOVERNMENT? THOS. GOLD ALFORD, JUN.

London: G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS, 24, Bedford Street, Strand.

Price 2d., by post 2½d.; yearly subscription (including Supplements), 2s. 8d.

THE LITERARY GUIDE:

A Rationalist Review.

Devoted mainly to Books and Publications which deal with Religion, Philosophy, Science, and Ethics from a Rationalist standpoint.

THE SEPTEMBER NUMBER CONTAINS:

MR. HALL CAINE'S "CHRISTIAN."
ICONOCLASM in EXCELSIS.
MR. BARING-GOULD'S "ST. PAUL"
THE GROWTH of HUMAN NATURE.
TRAINING YOUNG CITIZENS.
AMERICAN HETERODOXY.
A THOUGHTFUL MAN'S RELIGION.
SIGNS and WARNINGS (gleaned from the Religious Press).
RANDOM JOTTINGS.
CHATS about BOOKS—VII. With Dr. R. BITHELL.
SAMUEL LAING: IN MEMORIAM.
GERMAN CRITICS at WORK
Etc., Etc.

*. Copies of the July issue, containing two important Supplements, may still be had, price 2d., by post 3d.

London: WATTS & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E.C.

CASSELL &amp; COMPANY'S LIST.

COMPLETION OF "SOCIAL ENGLAND."

SOCIAL ENGLAND.

Edited by H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L.

Vol. VI. (completing the Work) embraces the Period from the Battle of Waterloo to the General Election of 1885. Price 18s. [Now ready.]

FAMILIAR WILD FLOWERS.

By F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A. With 300 beautifully Coloured Plates. Fifth and Concluding Volume. 3s. 6d. [Now ready.]

SCIENCE FOR ALL.

Cheap Edition. Edited by Dr. ROBERT BROWN, M.A., F.L.S., &c., assisted by Eminent Scientific Writers. With about 1,700 Illustrations. Complete in 5 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. I. ... [Now ready.]

Vol. II. ... [Ready Sept. 15th.]

BRITISH BATTLES ON LAND AND SEA.

By JAMES GRANT. With about 800 Illustrations. Complete in 4 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

RECENT BATTLES. [Now ready.]

Vol. I. (1066-1743) ... [Ready Sept. 15th.]

CHEAP EDITION OF BISHOP ELLICOTT'S COMMENTARY FOR ENGLISH READERS.

Embracing the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS. 8 vols.

THE OLD TESTAMENT. 5 vols., 4s. each.

THE NEW TESTAMENT. 3 vols., 4s. each.

Per Set of 8 vols., 30s.

Vol. I. ... [Ready Sept. 8th.]

Vol. II. ... [Ready Sept. 15th.]

LIBRARY EDITION OF WORKS BY ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

6s. each.

TREASURE ISLAND.

[Now ready.]

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE.

[Ready about Sept. 15th.]

FAMILIAR GARDEN FLOWERS.

By F. E. HULME, F.L.S., F.S.A. With beautifully Coloured Plates. Popular Edition. Complete in 5 vols., 3s. 6d. each.

Vol. I. ... [Ready Sept. 15th.]

CHUMS YEARLY VOLUME

For 1897. With 12 Coloured Plates, over 1,000 Pictures, Six Exciting Serial Stories, &c., &c., &c. Cloth, 8s. [Now ready.]

BO-PEEP YEARLY VOLUME

For 1897. With 8 Coloured Plates and numerous Pictures in Colour. Boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d. [Now ready.]

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED.
London, Paris and Melbourne.

REMAINDERS A SPECIALITY.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,

REMAINDER AND DISCOUNT BOOKSELLER,

265, HIGH HOLBORN, and 57, WIGMORE ST., LONDON.

A FEW RECENT PURCHASES.

Goncourt.—Edmond and Jules de

Goncourt: with Letters and Leaves from their Journals, Compiled and Translated by M. A. BELLOC and M. SERDLOCK, with 8 Portraits, 2 vols., 8vo (pub. 32s.) ... Heinemann 3 9

"These two handsome volumes are compiled from the letters and journals of the two famous brothers, who may be considered the founders of that school of realistic fiction which to-day counts so many disciples on both sides of the channel." Vanity Fair.

Bourget (Paul) Outre-Mer, Impressions of America, with Frontispiece, Portrait, demy 8vo, cloth (pub. 16s.) ... Fisher Unwin 3 6

"In this book there is scarcely a page which will not delight, and most of them will instruct. It is a volume which I have read with unflagging interest, and which every student of the most interesting country, and the most interesting race in the world ought to peruse and digest." T. P. O'Connor in the Weekly Sun.

Cameron (V. Lovett) Our Future

Highway to India, Illustrations and Map, 2 vols., crown 8vo (pub. 21s.) ... Macmillan 3 6

"A work of great service to geography, and of the utmost interest to all who follow with serious attention the progress of events affecting what, in this country, is broadly and generally known as the Eastern Question." Daily Telegraph.

"A delightful book, which everybody will be sure to read." Graphic.

Cruise of H.M.S. "Bacchante,"

1879-1882, Compiled from the Journals, Letters, and Note-Books of PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR and PRINCE GEORGE OF WALES, with Additions by the Rev. JOHN NEALE DALTON, Canon of Windsor, with Maps, Plans, and Illustrations, 2 vols., medium 8vo, cloth (pub. 52s. 6d.) ... Macmillan 9 0

"There are few even in these halcyon days of travel who have seen so much of the world under favourable circumstances for observation as the two Princes whose journals and letters form the substance of these entertaining volumes. On August 4th the Bacchante was once more in the English Channel, after a happy and successful voyage, during which the two Princes had acquired that knowledge of countries, cities, and men, which is of such immense value to those who fortunately possess it." Morning Post.

"A work full of instruction and interest, though thoroughly practical and business-like." Daily Telegraph.

Crawford (Oswald) A Year of Sport

and Natural History: Shooting Hunting, Coursing, Falconry, and Fishing; with Chapters on Birds of Prey, the Nidification of Birds, and the Habits of British Wild Birds and Animals, edited by OSWALD CRAWFORD, with numerous Illustrations by FRANK FELLER, OCEIL ALDIS, STANLEY BEECHLEY, C. E. LODGE, &c., demy 4to, cloth, gilt top (pub. 21s. net) ... Chapman & Hall 8 0

"Full of vigour and instinct with the spirit of the open air. This is a fascinating volume; it is a book for the busy man to keep by him in the serious months of the year—the book that makes him feel young again, and careless as ever. So one may take, out of season and by proxy, the holiday which all that makes life worth living." National Observer.

Jephson—The Platform: its Rise

and Progress, by HENRY JEPHSON, 2 vols., 8vo (30s. net) ... Macmillan 3 9

"Mr. Jephson is undoubtedly the first writer to treat the platform systematically, and to study it in its historical development and constitutional bearing. The interest and importance of the book are great, and its merits conspicuous. The historical facts and their sequence are well displayed, and Mr. Jephson's industry and research are worthy of high commendation." Times.

North (Marianne) Recollections of a Happy Life (2 vols.), and Some Further Recollections of a Happy Life (1 vol.), Edited by her Sister, Mrs. J. A. SYMONDS, with Portraits, 3 vols., large crown 8vo (pub. 25s. 6d. net) ... Macmillan 7 6

"There can be little doubt about the reception which the book will meet with; it must at once take its place in the first rank among the records of travellers' experiences which have contributed a special charm to the literature of our time." Athenaeum.

LIBRARIANS and BOOKBUYERS generally are invited to write for CATALOGUES, either to 265, HIGH HOLBORN, or 57, WIGMORE STREET, CAVENTISH SQUARE, LONDON.

CONTENTS.

REVIEWS	PAGE
A Prince of India on the Prince of Games ...	175
Knight's "Wordsworth" ...	176
Burma Old and New ...	177
John Shakespeare's Creed ...	178
The Vanquished Greek ...	179
FROM CROWDED SHELVES ...	180
THE WEEK:
Chronicle of New Books ...	181
New Books Received ...	182
NOTES AND NEWS ...	182
THREE NEGLECTED BOOKS: II. "The Twilight of the Gods" ...	183
THE BOOK MARKET:
"Remainders" ...	184
ART ...	185
DRAMA ...	186
SCIENCE ...	187
CORRESPONDENCE ...	187
FICTION SUPPLEMENT ...	61-64

REVIEWS.

A PRINCE OF INDIA ON THE PRINCE OF GAMES.

The Jubilee Book of Cricket. By K. S. Ranjitsinhji. (Blackwood & Sons.)

THERE is more than a mere publisher's appropriateness in the title of this book. This Jubilee year is the apogee of the British Empire; it may also fairly be considered as the apogee of cricket. The art of preparing consummate wickets—wickets which make batting an ease and a delight, bowling a game of patience and endurance—has reached its height. A brilliantly sunny summer has done such wickets full justice; and a wonderful fertility of consummate batsmen has taken full advantage of the wickets and the weather. Yet—extraordinary to relate—it has also been a year in which bowlers have distinguished themselves. A race of bowlers has arisen capable of coping with these conditions. It might be supposed that they would be solely slow or at least medium-pace bowlers. But not so. Three of the most successful bowlers of the season have been Richardson, Mold, and Kortright—all three fast bowlers. What it means, in the way of endurance, for a fast bowler to keep up pace and length through these enormous innings, on wickets enough to numb the pluck of any bowler, only a thorough cricketer can understand. Yet another consideration completes the appropriateness of the title. The peculiar feature of the Jubilee has been the way in which it has drawn attention to the bonds between England and its great dependencies: and the batsman of the day who is acknowledged to be the most consummate in style and all-round power (though he may not be at the head of the averages) is an Indian Prince. This batsman, Prince Ranjitsinhji (perhaps the finest who has appeared in England, except Grace), is the author of this Jubilee Book of Cricket. A native of India teaches Englishmen their own national game; and they all, with one accord, hasten to sit at his feet. He is not only a practical master in the game, but he has analysed it as a critic analyses the laws of literature. The book is illustrated with a profusion of instantaneous photographs of the principal cricketers, showing their attitude in bowling, fielding, wicket-keeping, or play as batsmen, which would alone render it uniquely valuable. And the whole range of cricket is covered with the utmost minuteness by Prince Ranjitsinhji's pen. Training and outfit, fielding in all its branches, bowling, batting, captaincy, and umpiring are the principal divisions of his work. No details are too minute for his consideration. For example, in the outset of the chapter on batting he instructs the batsman how to choose his bat, and with regard to his choice of batting-gloves and leg-guards. And very valuable his advice will be found. He has subjected everything, in fielding, bowling, and batting, to an unprecedented process of analysis, which for the first time provides us with a text-book at all points corresponding to modern needs. The older books were in effect based on the laws handed down from the times of under-hand bowling. But the methods of modern good-length bowling, with off and leg-break, a crowded off-field, and few chances for leg-hitting, you will seek in vain in them. The "pull" is mentioned by them only to be reprobated. Prince Ranjitsinhji discards tradition, and teaches the game as it is now played. The "pull" and the "hook" figure largely in his instructions, and he is justly severe on the coaches who ban both as illegitimate. Nevertheless, there was real reason, which he does not recognise, for the proscription of these strokes by the old players. He himself recognises that they are dangerous off a fast bowler, even on a true wicket, and that on a wicket rendered slippery by rain which has affected the surface, or a "sticky" wicket, they must be eschewed. Now the rough character of the old wickets always enabled the bowler to get plenty of work on the ball, and so the "pull" or the "hook" were really rash and ruinous strokes, were the wicket as dry as you please.

Detailed criticism of a work covering minutely the whole range of cricket is impossible in a review. I can offer only a few scattered commentaries on particular points. Prince Ranjitsinhji has done well to place fielding foremost, in the hope, as he says, that by so doing he may stimulate attention to the most neglected, yet very important, branch of the cricketer's art. Fine fielding is very largely the work of a captain who is himself a fine fielder, and knows its vast importance in winning matches. Many a match has been won rather in the field than at the wicket. And, if only a boy will set himself really to study its niceties, it is a most fascinating branch of cricket. Prince Ranjitsinhji remarks on the splendid opportunities of cover-point, and cites the Rev. Vernon Royle as the cover-point to whom all cricketers give the palm during the last thirty years. "From what one hears," he says, "he must have been a magnificent fielder." He was. And I notice the fact, because Vernon Royle may be regarded as a concrete example of the typical fielder, and the typical fielder's value. He was a pretty and stylish bat; but it was for his wonderful fielding that he was played. A ball for which hardly another cover-point would think of trying, he flashed upon, and with a single action stopped it and returned it to the wicket. So placed that only a single stump was visible to him, he would throw that down with unfailing accuracy, and without the slightest pause for aim. One of the members of the Australian team in Royle's era, playing against Lancashire, shaped to start for a hit wide of cover-point. "No, no!" cried his partner; "the policeman is there!" There were no short runs anywhere in the neighbourhood of Royle. He simply terrorised the batsmen; nor was there any necessity for an extra cover—now so constantly employed. In addition to his sureness and swiftness, his style was a miracle of grace. Slender and symmetrical, he moved with the lightness of a young roe, the flexuous elegance of a leopard—it was a sight for an artist or a poet to see him field. Briggs, at his best, fell not far short in efficiency; but there was no comparison between the two in style and elegance. To be a fielder like Vernon Royle is as much worth any youth's endeavours as to be a batsman like Ranjitsinhji, or a bowler like Richardson.

In the chapter on bowling Prince Ranjitsinhji shows that he has studied this art as closely as his own art of batting. He is full of wise counsel with regard to all the styles of bowling, and their relation to the various kinds of wickets and batsmen. Nothing in his book is more useful than his analysis of a typical game on a good wicket (from a bowler's standpoint) between two first-class sides. The batting side, under thinly disguised names, is easily to be recognised as Surrey; the bowling side, from the absence of names, is harder to be recognised. It is evidently an actual match which the writer had the chance of observing; therefore, it is possible that the other side may be Sussex. I am glad to see that Prince Ranjitsinhji, showing in this the independence and actuality which he displays throughout his book, does not think it beneath him to recognise the possible value of lob-bowling, to expound its principles, and recommend its cultivation by cricketers who are that way inclined. He even goes so far as to surmise that other kinds of under-arm bowling might prove baffling to present-day batsmen if they were revived. I am of opinion that this would certainly be the case. On one point I think that the author does not quite bring out the peculiarities of under-arm. Namely, that "good-length bowling" is not as continuously necessary to under-arm as to over-arm bowling. Now, I think that the under-arm bowler can afford to pitch his balls well up, more than the over-arm bowler can; and that it often pays to do so—at least, against the present race of batsmen, who are unaccustomed to under-arm. For two reasons. In the first place, the over-arm bowler shrinks from pitching his balls up on account of the extra exertion involved. He does so only occasionally, as Prince Ranjitsinhji states, on account of this exertion. The under-arm bowler, on the contrary, because of the ease and naturalness of his action, can pitch his balls well up without any difficulty. In the second place, because of the difference of trajectory between the two methods of bowling. An over-arm ball describes approximately a parabola, and when it is well pitched up comes therefore thoroughly on to the bat. But the drop of an under-arm ball, particularly if it be slow, is so much more sudden that it may comparatively and roughly be considered a straight drop. Even if fast or quick-medium, it is much more abrupt in descent than a like over-arm ball. Consequently a batsman who attempts to clout a well-pitched-up under-arm as he would a like over-arm ball stands a fair chance of playing over it, especially when he is unaccustomed to this kind of bowling. If, on the other hand, he plays back, it is difficult to get the ball away. So that he may be deceived, and if he adopts caution is not likely to score off the ball. Yorkers, again, are perfectly easy to an under-arm bowler; they put no great strain on the weakest arm. Admirable are all the author's lessons on bowling, had we space to follow them; and admirable his concluding declaration that it is head-work, and the study of the batsman's peculiarities, which puts the crown on a bowler.

"There are bowlers," he says, "who for some reason or other seem to fascinate the batsman, and make him do what they want in spite of himself. . . . The batsman has to fight not only against the particular ball bowled, but against a mysterious unseen influence. There are 'demon' bowlers in more senses than one. They are few and far between; but when they come, they win matches by their own individual might."

In other words, genius tells in cricket as in all else.

In batting, Prince Ranjitsinhji is on his own ground, and his instructions are up to the latest date. He dwells on forward play in a manner not to be met in the older treatises, though he confesses that his own predilections (as might be expected from a player so quick of eye and supple of wrist) are towards back play. His minute and perfect instructions must be sought in the book. Only one point I will comment on, because it is not borne out in the illustrations, though the author seems to imagine it is. He says, quite truly, that the position of the left (that is, the upper) hand should be changed in the forward stroke. That is, the left hand should be shifted round the bat, so that the finger-tips are presented towards the bowler, instead of the back of the hand, as in the ordinary position of holding the bat. Some players, he allows, do not so twist the upper hand round the bat in playing forward. He refers to the illustrations to exemplify the action. But, unless my eyes are deceived, all the batsmen here photographed in the act of playing forward have the left hand unchanged. If so, it is a singular chance; for there can be no doubt of its advantage. The position of the hand may be understood by reference to the portrait of Prince Ranjitsinhji playing back; for here he has the left hand shifted round as it should be in forward play. It is advisable, above all, in forward defensive play. And this because it guards against the two chief dangers in such play. These are, that the bat may not be kept straight, so as to cover the stump from top to bottom; and that the tip of the blade may be pushed forward in advance of the upper portion of the blade, so as to put the ball up and give a catch. If the left hand be not shifted round, it exercises by its position a natural drag upon the handle of the bat, so as to deflect the upper portion of the blade to the left, and leave the superior portion of the stump exposed. Moreover, besides this lateral deflection of the handle, and consequently of the upper part of the blade, it also exercises a backward drag upon them, so as to leave the tip of the blade dangerously advanced, with the likelihood of a catch. Careful practice may overcome both these tendencies; but in a moment of excitement and inattention they are liable to assert themselves with ruinous results. Whereas the twisting of the left hand round the handle mechanically keeps the bat straight, and the upper portion of the blade well advanced over the lower. A single experiment and comparison will convince any player of this. Another point which may be learned by studying the various photographs of Prince Ranjitsinhji batting given in this book is, that a batsman will do well to alter the relative position of his hands in varying kinds of play. Thus, the Prince's ordinary position at the wicket is with the two hands together at the top of the handle; but in back play his right hand is slid down towards the blade. In glance-play back and forward, his right hand is apparently about two inches above the blade, but well separated from the left hand. Some batsmen, who go in for steady play, ordinarily keep the right hand a little above the blade, and apart from the left. Such a batsman, if he lunges forward to drive a ball, where an inch or two of reach makes all the difference, will do well to slide the right hand up to the left at the top of the handle, in order to get the full length of the bat in reaching out at the ball. In fact, any adaptable batsman will find the use of not keeping his hands in one uniform stiff position for all kinds of strokes. Here is part of the value of the instantaneous photographs in this book. It may be doubtful whether Prince Ranjitsinhji himself was conscious of this feature in his play—at least, he never mentions it; and so the photographs supply hints sometimes not given by the author.

Upon back play, and the methods of making it available for offensive purposes, the author is excellent. The subtlest and newest refinements of stroke all round the wicket are expounded with beautiful clearness: the drive to cover-point or extra-cover, the peculiar stroke with a horizontal bat between a forward-cut and a drive, leg-glances and forcing-strokes on the on-side; and, above all, those once-condemned strokes, made possible by the perfection of modern wickets, the pull and the hook. These are described with a perfect lucidity only to be expected from a batsman who is himself a master of them. There is one very significant omission. The draw, that most stylish stroke of the older batsman, is never once described. The conditions of modern bowling have, indeed, rendered it obsolete. The last time I saw it used was by A. P. Lucas in a match between England and Australia. On wrist-play he is very strong, as might be supposed from the most beautiful wrist player in England. But for all these niceties I can only refer the reader to the book, promising him, if he be a cricketer, that he has a rich treat of scientific analysis. Prince Ranjitsinhji's exclusive part is completed by two excellent chapters on Captaincy and Umpiring.

Fully another half of the book, however, is taken up by summary reviews of English cricket, under the headings of Public School, University, and County Cricket. The excellent introductory article on public school cricket is by Mr. W. J. Ford; and then follow succinct accounts of all the chief public schools in England. Oxford cricket is admirably dealt with by the old Oxonian, Mr. T. Case; and for Cambridge, Mr. W. J. Ford again takes up the pen. The history of the M.C.C. is dealt with; and then follow articles on all the counties, in many cases signed by leading exponents of county cricket, such as Mr. Hornby in the case of Lancashire. One of the most attractive of all is that on Hampshire, on account of a long quotation from a very interesting article contributed by Mr. E. V. Lucas to the Morning Post last year, dealing with the old Hambledon Club. Talk of modern enthusiasm for cricket! It is nothing to that of the ancients of the game. Witness this of the Rev. John Mitford, describing a visit he paid to Beldham's cottage, when that veteran of Hambledon and Surrey was in his last years:

"In his kitchen, black with age, hangs the trophy of his victories, the delight of his youth, the exercise of his manhood, and the glory of his age—his BAT. Reader, believe me when I tell you, I trembled when I touched it; it seemed an act of profaneness, of violation. I pressed it to my lips, and returned it to its sanctuary."

Let that fine bit of rhodomontade put you in tune for approaching the best analysis of cricket yet produced, written by a magnificent cricketer. Some faults of get-up and in the reproduction of the photographs there are; but I have not the heart to particularise them.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

KNIGHT'S "WORDSWORTH."

The Poetical Works of William Wordsworth.
Edited by William Knight. Vol. VIII.
(Macmillan & Co.)

WITH this volume Mr. Knight brings to a close his elaborate and most complete edition of Wordsworth's poems. One admirable feature of this edition is that Wordsworth's fanciful and baffling arrangement of his poems under certain headings—such as "Poems of Sentiment and Reflection," "Poems of Fancy," "Poems of Imagination," &c., is departed from. Wordsworth, being above all things systematic and philosophical, was desirous to give a kind of symmetrical air to his poems; to make them appear an organic whole, arranged upon certain systematised lines. But, in fact, this was untrue, artificial. He was the most occasional of poets—apart from his great, but abortive, poem "The Recluse," of which the "Prelude" and the "Excursion" were portions. His poems were composed (to their great advantage) as occasion prompted; and it was an afterthought to gather them into certain categories, and make them appear parts of an organic whole. Their only unity is that of temperament and temperamental development. Accordingly Prof. Knight has done a valuable work in reducing them to chronological order; so that we are enabled to study the development—and the decline—of a great poet. His sole departure from this arrangement is in the case of two poems. It is a departure suggested—as he tells us—by Mr. Aubrey de Vere; and we owe a debt to Mr. de Vere for the suggestion. In the first place, the great "Ode on Intimations of Immortality" is placed at the end of Wordsworth's latest work, as being the crown, both poetically and philosophically, of the poet's achievement. In the second place, Wordsworth's sole Laureate Ode is remitted to the appendix, on the ground that evidence shows it to have been the work of Edward Quillinan—at the most, touched by Wordsworth. It needs no external evidence for the fact to any understander of poetry. The ode is not the work of a poet at all—least of all Wordsworth. The abominable mockery of metre, the academic diction—half a century behind that of Wordsworth—sufficiently show that the austere poet never could have written it. With these exceptions, we have Wordsworth's poems in the order in which they were written; which is the most useful order, except where a poet has really given organic unity to a series of poems. No one would dream, for example, of resolving Rossetti's "House of Life" into chronological order. But, generally speaking, Wordsworth's were absolutely poems of occasion; and the chronological order is an immense gain. It enables us to study accurately the poet's development and decline; which is always in itself a gain, though some poets forbid it by the excellent judgment with which they have arranged their poems in vital and organic connexion.

This volume divides itself into two sections. Firstly (with the exception of the great ode), the poems of Wordsworth's later years; secondly, very early poems, and poems recovered from various sources, which Wordsworth did not include in his published works—for the most part justly. This inevitably implies that there are few treasurable things in this last volume. It shows, only too clearly, that Wordsworth, like Tennyson, in his later years declined. Nay, he declined much worse than Tennyson; for Tennyson was a careful external artist, and was able to maintain a certain level of workmanship even when his inspiration had fled from him. Whereas Wordsworth had not a particle of external art: at his best period, there was an extraordinary intermixture of superb felicity and prosy twaddle. When, owing to declining strength, his inspiration forsook him, he became altogether a vendor of goody-goody twaddle: most unimpeachably virtuous, most unendurably long-winded and commonplace. And the less of a poet he grew, the more appalling was his "he-that-heareth-not-the-prophets" air. Never was a poet more absolutely dependent on inspiration, less capable of working-up uninspired passages by means of art, so as to make them appear not unworthy companions of the inspired passages. So that he is either unapproachable or unendurable; and very often both in the compass of twenty lines. When it comes to his final period, he is "most tolerable and not to be endured." Unfortunately, this is precisely the Wordsworth that Wordsworthian poets too often imitate; because it needs no inspiration to imitate him. And it is also the Wordsworth that Wordsworthian readers too often admire; because it needs no deep poetic sense to admire him. Such readers will find in this last volume of Prof. Knight an abundant treasury. The few who love the inspired Wordsworth will be very tired over it. Nor is the second section, consisting of Wordsworthian treasure-trove from many sources, likely to recompense them. Almost the only exception is "Home at Grasmere," and another fragment, both connected with the unexecuted "Recluse." "Home at Grasmere," in particular, has many fine passages, though it is very unequal. But what shall we say of the "Sonnet on Seeing Miss Helen Maria Williams Weep at a Tale of Distress," and similar very early poems? Simply that they show how very badly Wordsworth could write in his youth. And yet it has one good idea in it, which anticipates the sonnet of Blanco White. But then the idea had already been anticipated by Sir Thomas Browne, and another writer of about the same period. Really, the most valuable of these gleanings belongs not to Wordsworth at all. It is a poem of Coleridge's, addressed to Wordsworth under the title of "Axiologus," and preserved by Mr. Dykes Campbell. Prof. Knight is careful to say that he does not know the source from which Mr. Dykes Campbell got it. But the internal evidence is abundantly sufficient. It is in hexameters; and Coleridge was fond of such experiments. There is an acknowledged poem of his to Wordsworth in hexameters. Above all, the ideas are such as could only belong to Coleridge; particularly the conclusion, with its depth of mystical philosophy (if we may use such a term). Here it is:

"This is the word of the Lord! it is spoken, and Beings Eternal
Live and are born as an infant, the Eternal begets the Immortal—
Love is the Spirit of Life, and Music the Life of the Spirit!"

"Music," be it observed, here signifies poetry in general—song—as well as music technically so called. It is Coleridge beyond all possibility of mistake; and the last line is as deep an utterance as Coleridge ever gave vent to.

This reminds us that, in the first section, the poem "On the Death of James Hogg," for the most part poor and prosaic, contains a few not unworthy lines upon the death of Coleridge:

"Nor has the rolling year twice measured,
From sign to sign, its steadfast course,
Since every mortal power of Coleridge
Was frozen at its marvellous source."

"The rapt One, of the godlike forehead,
The heaven-eyed creature, sleeps in earth."

It is pleasant to read this tribute, since Wordsworth's egotism, his inability to forgive a censure, brought about a rupture with Coleridge, which lasted to the day of that weak and unfortunate poet's death. When it was too late even the self-centred Wordsworth remembered the early days which he had better have remembered before. Alas, with how many is that the case! If we bestowed upon our friend while it could benefit him the love and regret we pour out over his grave!

In conclusion, this is an edition of Wordsworth which can never be superseded. To our mind, it errs with all modern editions in reviving trivialities which the poet himself destined to oblivion. Useless in all cases, it is peculiarly mistaken in the case of Wordsworth, who himself perpetuated too much which he should have let die. What even Wordsworth thought unsuccessful, why should any editor resuscitate? But since such is the fashion, we can only say that Prof. Knight has followed it with entire completeness. If a definitive edition must include everything which ever fell from a poet's pen, this edition is indeed definitive. And Mr. Knight's notes give every information which could be desired. It is, what Mr. Aubrey de Vere calls it in his letter to Prof. Knight, "a monumental edition."

BURMA OLD AND NEW.

Wanderings in Burma. By George W. Bird. (Simpkin & Co.)

OVER a decade having elapsed since the British occupation of the whole of Burma, a trustworthy book was much needed on the period of transition from the unstable and capricious rule of the native princes to the establishment of a firm and just administration of the country. Such a work is here presented to the reader, although under a singularly misleading title, and in a form scarcely more attractive than that of an ordinary guide-book. Indeed, the arrangement of the subject matter is throughout that of a Murray or a Baedeker, while the style nowhere rises above the level of what may be looked for in such practical and methodic manuals. Probably Mr. Bird does not himself expect this handsome and well-printed volume to be classed as literature, nor would there be any cause for complaint on this score but for the expectations awakened by the title, taken especially in connexion with a land so full of picturesque beauty and human interest as is the lovely valley of the Irawadi. But we have here neither descriptions of scenery, personal reminiscences, nor incidents of travel, nor yet any "wanderings" on the part of the author: but only directions put in the baldest language, by following which the reader may do the wanderings for himself. He will, however, find in Mr. Bird a trusty guide, who betrays on every page a minute and accurate knowledge of the land and its inhabitants, its physical features, natural resources, history, and especially its innumerable monuments past and present—such a knowledge, in fact, as could be acquired only by 'a personal experience of twenty years' residence in the country.' (Preface.)

Herein, of course, lies the permanent value of the book, which will not be read to while away an idle hour and then be forgotten, but will be put carefully by, to be confidently consulted as occasion arises—that is, whenever information of any kind is wanted on the manifold historical, archaeological, ethnological, geographical, and political relations of "Burma Old and New."

Mr. Bird is nothing unless systematic; hence his rich materials are formally arranged under two broad divisions—an "Introduction" comprising about one-third of the volume, and twenty-four "Routes" all the rest. In the Introduction a useful geographical summary is followed by a reprint, from the Rangoon Gazette, 1896, of Col. Woodthorpe's somewhat full account of the Shan States, formerly dependent on Burma and now under British administration. Here the term Shan is said to be a Burmese word, and referred to the same root as Siam, and it is added that "the British Shans generally call themselves Tai, in Siamese Itai." These and similar statements, though constantly met in ethnological writings, are both misleading and to some extent inaccurate. It is not to be supposed that the Siamese take their national name from the Burmese, and, in fact, they carefully distinguish between Siam (Sayam) and Shan, which again is not a Burmese but a Chinese word, standing probably for Shan-yen or Shan-tsè, "Highlanders." It is true that all the civilised branches of this wide-spread family call themselves Tai (T'hai in Siamese)—i.e., "Free," or "Noble," in a general way, but each group has its own special designation, and Mr. Carl Bock tells us that the proper name of the "British Shans" here in question is Ngiau, which thus corresponds to Lao, the collective name of the more southerly Tai people, most of whom have recently passed from Siamese to French control.

Among the other topics touched on in the Introduction, reference may be made to the languages current in the country, the account of which is unfortunately much too short to be of any practical use. The Talaing, an ancient language formerly dominant throughout the lower provinces, is classed as a member of the "Mon-Annam" linguistic family, which family, created, if we remember right, by the Viennese ethnologist, Fr. Müller, has no existence. Dr. Forchhammer, who published some old Talaing (Mon) inscriptions at Rangoon in 1882, has shown that the affinities of this language are not with Annamese, but rather with Dravidian, and the term Talaing itself is obviously a Burmese form of Telinga—i.e., the Telugu dialect of Dravidian. Yet the resemblances are probably not more than verbal, due to the influence of Hindu culture, and for the present it seems the safer course to regard Talaing as a stock language, with no known relationship to any other form of speech. Of such isolated tongues there is no lack in other parts of Indo-China, as in Camboja (Khmer, Kuy, &c.), and among the numerous Noga tribes of the South Assamese Hills.

Whoever has the patience to follow all the twenty-four routes here laid down by rail and river to every part of the Irawadi basin, and beyond it to the neighbouring coast islands, will be rewarded by a very accurate knowledge, especially of the topography and archaeology of that region. Many of the famous historical sites, such as Pegu, Pagan, Ava, and Amarapura, with their countless pagodas either in ruins or still erect, their huge bells and Buddhas, some prostrate, some still in situ, have already been described by Yule, Forbes, and other more recent writers. But nothing escapes the antiquarian zeal of Mr. Bird, who does all this over again, inspects and measures everything for himself, opens up new ground in all directions, and leaves the general impression that not a single statue, shrine, or temple in the whole of Burma can have eluded his vigilant search. Even the huge gun captured from the Arakanese in 1784, and now lying half buried in the thorny jungle at Amarapura, so that "a careful inspection is rather difficult," is nevertheless minutely inspected, and "the principal dimensions taken by the writer from actual measurements" duly tabulated in feet, inches, and half inches. Several hundred pages of such conscientious work are, however, apt to pall, even though relieved here and there by interesting excursions to ruby and jade mines, or else by historical references, myths or legends, in some of which folklorists will find much to interest them. Thus Lake Indaw, above Mandalay, is believed to be fathomless, yet people are never drowned in its waters, perhaps because the nats (spirits) are propitiated with offerings of gold by the local governors. Such offerings, however, need not necessarily be of 18 carats standard, and would often appear to be in fact associated with much "pious fraud." Most of the "endless and priceless treasures" deposited in the Mingun pagoda, are stated to be of little or no value:

"Images said to have been of gold and silver, but which, on closer inspection, proved to be a less valuable metal, marble images, plated models of pagodas and Kyaungs, sheets of coloured glass, white umbrellas, and a soda-water machine" (p. 317).

It should be mentioned that statistics and all other particulars are brought well up to date. The result is a picture of astonishing material and moral progress in every part of the country since the British occupation. Troublesome boundary questions towards China, Siam, and the French possessions have all been amicably settled; we hear no more of Dacoity scares, or even of the formerly chronic state of inter-tribal warfare among Kachins, Singphos, and other savage peoples in the extreme north. The Pax Britannica, with absolute security for life and property, prevails throughout the Irawadi basin, while the resources of the country are being rapidly developed by the extension of fluvial navigation and railway enterprise.

The book is well furnished with maps, topographical charts, plans, and illustrations, mostly from original photographs, supplied by Mr. L. C. Oertel and Signor Beato of Mandalay. A fuller index, however, is much needed, and there are far too many misprints—such as per mensum twice on one page (381); Uru on map for Uyu in the text; north-east for north-west (400); 95°-96° w. long. for 96°-97° e. long. (403); chota for chhota (385); and why are the Shans called "a sect" (373), most of them being orthodox and tolerably zealous Buddhists?

JOHN SHAKESPEARE'S CREED.

Shakespeare, Puritan and Recusant. By the Rev. T. Carter. (Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier.)

THE religion of Shakespeare has from time to time threatened to become a matter of serious controversy between the churches. A certain Archdeacon Davies, who lived at the end of the seventeenth century, and who possessed a MS. dictionary of biography, inserted in it a tradition to the effect that the poet died a Papist. This has been the starting-point for a dozen or more treatises of confirmation or refutation, in which every shred of evidence which could be brought forward in favour of the Catholicism or Protestantism of Shakespeare has been calendared and chronicled by anxious partisans. Baldly stated, the question—Was Shakespeare a Catholic or a Protestant?—is, of course, foolishness. The standpoint of the plays is a humanism to which the antithesis of opposing confessions has become a very dim and distant thing. Theological problems, indeed, rack and disturb the poet's mind, but they go deeper than any controversies of vestments or Church discipline or the nature of the Mass. The origin of evil and the moral government of the world—these are weighed in the balance; and you will not claim the framer of those terrible indictments in King Lear against the little wanton gods, who kill us for their sport, as Romanist or Anglican.

Mr. Carter, however, puts the issue in a more reasonable form. You may fairly ask, "Was the atmosphere in which the young Shakespeare was brought up, and which must have insensibly affected his whole attitude of thought, a Catholic or a Protestant one? What part did John Shakespeare, Bailiff of Stratford, play in the religious disputes of Elizabeth's reign? Last year, Mr. Yeatman, in his Gentle Shakespeare, revived the old notion that John Shakespeare was a concealed Catholic, and rested his case largely on the so-called spiritual will or profession of faith, which was said to have been found under the tiles of his house, and which bears the strongest internal and external marks of having been forged in the middle of the eighteenth century by John Jordan. Mr. Carter does not notice Mr. Yeatman's book—perhaps it hardly called for notice. His own view, however, is the diametrically opposite one. He holds that John Shakespeare was no Catholic, but a Protestant; and more than a Protestant, an extreme Puritan who suffered during the persecutions of Elizabeth's last decade. From this point of view Mr. Carter goes through the records of John Shakespeare's life, and tries to show how such notices as we have of the worthy glover fit in with his theory. On the whole, he has accomplished his task with accuracy and scholarship, though not without falling into several slips in the interpretation of somewhat complicated documents. There are mistakes, for instance, in the account of the various properties in Stratford, Snitterfield, and Wilmcote held by John and Mary Shakespeare, and of the transactions with respect to some of these properties in 1579 and 1580. But we do not think that these errors are of a kind greatly to affect the value of the main argument. With this argument we are willing to go some way. We have very little doubt that John Shakespeare is fairly to be put down as a convinced Protestant. He had his children baptized in the parish church, and, as Mr. Carter points out, he took a leading part in municipal affairs upon occasions when anti-Catholic measures were being carried out. An almost more important point is that Shakespeare's plays are permeated with a knowledge of the language and phrases of the English Bible, so intimate that it must surely have been acquired in early childhood. This, of course, would have been quite impossible in a Catholic family, even in one where open conformity was practised.

We take it, then, that Mr. Carter has made his case seem at least probable, so far as John Shakespeare's Protestantism is concerned. Unfortunately, he is not content with this. He will have it that John Shakespeare belonged to that section of Protestants for whom the English Church as established by Elizabeth failed to prove sufficiently comprehensive, and who, consequently, so soon as the stress of the Armada was past, came to loggerheads with the law. It is well known that in about the year 1579 a change came over John Shakespeare's life, that he began to sell or mortgage his property, that he was excused or failed to pay his contributions to various public purposes, that he withdrew from municipal work, and in the end was put out of the Corporation. These facts have generally been accepted as evidences of growing financial embarrassment. Mr. Carter would explain them as signs of disaffection with the anti-Puritan tendencies of those in authority. John Shakespeare, he says, alienated his property in order to put it out of reach of confiscation; he left the Corporation because it sided with the bishops; he refused to pay for the equipment of pikemen because they were intended for use in putting down Puritan conventicles. The case is ingenious and well-worked out; but, on the whole, it is not quite convincing. It explains the facts, no doubt, but then the old theory of poverty explains them also, and, to the plain man, without a preconceived theory to maintain, explains them rather better. Moreover, there is the Stratford tradition, handed on by Betterton to Rowe, that Shakespeare left school owing to the "narrowness of his circumstances and the want of his assistance at home," to be reckoned with, and the known fact of a great depression in the wool and other allied trades in the Midlands about 1580. Mr. Carter points out that the fact of John Shakespeare's ceasing to attend the Corporation meetings can hardly be taken as a proof of poverty, because by so doing he laid himself open to a heavy fine. Legally, no doubt, that was so; but we believe that the town accounts afford no evidence that the fines were actually inflicted. It was natural that the ruined man should find it difficult to hold up his head among his old associates, and it is not at all unlikely that the Corporation, after bearing with his non-attendance for some years, chose the charitable course of putting him out of the company without exacting any pecuniary penalty.

It is one of the ironies of literary history that the one fact which might have been expected to throw light on the matter proves, when examined, equally consistent with John Shakespeare having been a Catholic or a Puritan, poverty-stricken or a recusant. In 1592 his name appears in a list of Warwickshire recusants, drawn up by Sir Thomas Lucy under the Recusancy Act of that year. Unfortunately, this list contains both Puritans and Papists, and, moreover, John Shakespeare is included with eight others, of whom it is said that "these last nine coom not to Church for fear of processe for dette." We do not know why we should assume that this excuse was a false one.

THE VANQUISHED GREEK.

With the Greeks in Thessaly. By W. K. Rose. (Methuen & Co.)

Most careful readers of the newspapers during the Græco-Turkish War noticed the admirable despatches supplied to the Press by Reuter's special service from the side of the Greeks. Mr. Rose, who wrote them in the turmoil of battle or the hurry of flight, has done well to republish them, with the additional attraction of Mr. Maud's illustrations. The book is, as the author confesses, in the main a reproduction of the notes written on the spot and telegraphed to London. It lays no claim to polish, but has the vivid vigour of the man who sees and can set down on paper what he sees. On the whole, Mr. Rose, though no fanatical partisan of the Greeks, does something towards freeing them from the imputation of cowardice. This is what he saw during the struggle for the passes in the neighbourhood of Vigla:

"An exclamation from a soldier standing near by induced us to turn and look back. To our surprise we saw Prince Nicholas' battery limber up, move away past the custom-house, and disappear round the shoulder of Sidero Poluki. The movement was inexplicable. The officer in command of the leading line, which with so much toil had pushed along the crest of the high hills overlooking Vigla, when he saw the artillery vanishing, cried, 'We are betrayed,' and in impotent rage drew his revolver and shot himself. Presently an orderly, presumably despatched by Colonel Dimopoulos, came to each of the lines and ordered them to retire. There was nothing else for it; and the regular infantry sullenly and slowly marched back to the mouth of the pass. The irregular troops broke the formation which they had in some measure maintained, and began to clamber down the mountain side in little groups. They were excitedly discussing the strange order to retire, and condemning in unmeasured terms their officers. A common remark was, 'This will be a bad day for the Government; we could have taken Vigla in half-an-hour, and been at Damasi in the afternoon, if we had been allowed.'"

It would, of course, be a mistake to attach over-much importance to the criticism of infantry privates on the conduct of a campaign. But Mr. Rose saw enough to convince him that, while the Greek soldiers fought on most occasions with spirit, the Greek leaders were thoroughly incompetent. For example, one of the most disgraceful incidents of the campaign was the panic during the flight to Larissa, which is already familiar to English readers mainly through Mr. Rose's brilliant description. That flight was immediately caused by the retreat from Mati. Now Mr. Rose, describing a visit which he subsequently paid to the Crown Prince's headquarters, writes as follows:

"I had an interview with Col. Sapounyaki. . . . He rather astonished me during the conversation on the events of the previous fortnight, by saying that he never could understand why the Greek army had retreated from their position at Mati, or who had given the order for the retreat! That the chief of the Prince's staff should make this amazing statement was to me past comprehension."

It is impossible to read the vigorous chapters of Mr. Rose, who certainly has no prejudice against the Greeks, without coming to the conclusion that their failure was inevitable under any circumstance, but was hastened by the lack of all preparation for a campaign, and the utter ignorance of their leaders in all that pertains to its conduct.

But this, after all, has been dinned into our ears by all who have written on the subject, and they are very many. The most interesting things a war correspondent can now tell us about this unlucky war are his own personal experiences, his search for fighting, and his race for the end of the telegraph wire. Of these Mr. Rose has plenty to give. Such, for example, as his attempt to get from Volo to Athens by the hospital vessel Thessalia in the character of an attendant upon the wounded. He deceived Mrs. Ralli, the head of the Red Cross Hospital, but not a Greek lady doctor, who "recognised the eager correspondent, refused to believe in my disinterestedness, and bluntly declared that I was more anxious to reach Athens with my despatches than to care for the wounded. Protest was in vain. Mrs. Ralli's heart was hardened, and even a deck-passage was refused me."

On one occasion, while Mr. Rose was away at Athens, his dragoman was robbed by some Greek brigands. Two days afterwards the brigands were found in Volo offering Mr. Rose's English saddle and bridle for sale. They were repurchased at about a fifth of their value. At Domokos Mr. Rose with

Mr. Maud and a few companions were sleeping in a deserted house when news of a hurried retreat was brought :

"The little company had noticed as they lay four Greek soldiers entering the house and lying down in a corner, apparently exhausted. They had come there as much for the company as for the shelter. As Maud and his companions were turning to leave the house, he said to the dragoman, 'Give those poor beggars a chance of escape, and awaken them.' The dragoman approached and shook them, one after the other. They were sleeping the sleep that knows no waking. They had been grievously wounded, and, like the stricken deer, had sought a friendly lair in which to die."

Certainly among the many books that have dealt with the late war, this is by no means the least interesting and instructive.

FROM CROWDED SHELVES.

Waste and Repair in Modern Life. By Dr. Robson Roose. (John Murray.)

UNDER this title Dr. Robson Roose has collected a number of essays which he has written from time to time in the magazines on questions of hygiene and right living. The advice given is in all cases of the most orthodox and conventional kind. Dr. Robson Roose advises his readers against over-fatiguing themselves in pleasure or business, and against keeping late hours. Instead of drugs he recommends exercise. He thinks seven o'clock quite late enough for dinner, and that alcohol should always be taken in moderation, such a quantity as three or four ounces of whisky a day being decidedly excessive and injurious. Occasional holidays it appears are good, provided you take the sort of holiday best suited to your needs. The use of woollen or silk clothing and the avoidance of chills are another branch of Dr. Robson Roose's subject. He holds that the medical faculty are, at length, in a position to make successful war upon both diphtheria and cholera, and probably other germ diseases, and, needless to say, he is an advocate of pure water and plenty of ventilation. In fact there is no well-proved axiom of sanitary science that Dr. Robson Roose does not with admirable conscientiousness recapitulate. This is consequently a soothing and trustworthy volume for the valetudinarian. On the other hand, one looks in vain through its pages for an original idea or suggestion, while there is here and there a lamentable want of up-to-dateness. Davos Platz, for instance, Dr. Robson Roose recognises to be a beneficial place of resort for consumptives, but he knows so little about it that he describes it as being "six or seven hours by diligence from Landquart station, on the road from Zürich to Coire." Dr. Robson Roose ought surely to know that for the past five or six years there has been a railway open from Landquart to Davos, and that the diligence on that route has been superseded. By observing the simple rules of temperate living, Dr. Robson Roose thinks that life may be prolonged and the evils of old age mitigated, but in the end he recognises that the chief factor in longevity is heredity. "If you would be old," says this oracle in effect, "take care to be descended from a long-lived stock." "Take care to be descended from a sound stock" would not be a bad way of dealing with most of the evils of life treated in this volume.

Crime and Criminals. By J. Sanderson Christison, M.D. (Chicago: The W. T. Keener Co.)

THIS is a meagre volume of about 100 pages on a subject which might have been profitably treated in far greater detail. Dr. Christison, who is an American criminologist of wide experience, has plenty of information, but no literary capacity for expressing it. He exhibits little or no method in the description or the analysis of his cases, while the slipshod Americanisms of the text and an occasional reference to "London, England," prove a little disconcerting to the scientific reader. "Moral palsy," which is here stated to be a main characteristic of the criminal disposition, is a term new to us, but the condition to which it is applied ("moral insanity") is well known. Indeed, Dr. Christison is a strong adherent of the modern theory that the criminal is largely the victim of heredity :

"All so-called criminals," he contends, "may be divided into three great groups—namely, the insane, the moral paretic, and the selfish. The insane subject is chiefly at fault in the power of discerning; the moral paretic is chiefly at fault in the power of choice; and the selfish individual or criminal proper lacks in first principles, which constitute the basis of love in the humanitarian sense."

Of course there are infinite varieties of the abnormal mind, and Dr. Christison, after the manner of the European school, couples them with physical anomalies. He gives plates showing types of the abnormal jaw and of the degenerate ear. With regard to "moral palsy," which is the keystone of his theory, the author explains :

"It is simply an abnormal weakness of the will or loss of self-control. The subject may know a particular act is wrong, but is unable to refrain from doing it under special exciting circumstances or provocation. Moral palsy in one form or another is extremely common, and in its worst degree—for example, in some cases of inebriety—the will is so far destroyed that the individual is simply the creature of circumstances for the time being. . . . It is the borderland of insanity proper, and heredity, injuries, fevers, and ailments of all kinds may give rise to or contribute to it."

For a member of the Lombroso school, Dr. Christison seems occasionally to attach too much importance to "environment"; but the term is one that he uses in a wider sense than most psycho-physiological writers. "Heredity, as I view it," he explains, "is but another name for environment in the earliest stage of the individual's existence, the physiological factors of parental peculiarities becoming in one way or another anatomical in the child." That being so, why not employ heredity and environment each in its customary sense? In a volume full of criminal photographs it is odd by the way to find the portrait of "Ian Maclaren" given as a "type of the normal look, features, and contour of head." This is a new use for novelists.

A Concordance to the Greek Testament. Edited by Rev. W. F. Moulton and Rev. A. S. Geden. (T. & T. Clark.)

THREE things can, in our opinion, be properly demanded of the editor of a Biblical Concordance: it should include as many various readings as possible; its quotations should be full enough to recall the whole passage to the reader; and it should contain every word by which a passage can by any possibility be remembered. All the requirements seem to be fulfilled in Mr. Moulton's and Mr. Geden's work. The readings are those of Westcott and Hort, Tischendorf's eighth edition, and the text of the English Revisers; and the quotations are of such length that the editors find themselves compelled to apologise for the fact in the preface. As for the words included, they have erred, if anywhere, on the side of redundancy. There may be some reason for devoting twenty columns to the preposition ἐν, because a student of New Testament grammar might want evidence of its user in certain specified constructions. But what can be the use of allotting an equal space—only one column less than that given to ἵνα—to the pronoun αὐτός? Would anyone wishing to verify any quotation whatever from (say) the Vulgate dream of looking for it under the word ipse?

In an undertaking of so large a scope there are bound, of course, to be a few mistakes. Thus, in the Lord's Prayer, the word ἐπιούσιος, which the translators render "daily," is rightly marked as unknown in classical Greek. But the editors also say that it is used in the Septuagint, and we should be curious to know where. Our own impression is, that the word is to be found only in the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and is never met with in any other author, whether sacred or profane. It was doubtless this phenomenal rarity which led certain sects to substitute for it ὑπερούσιος (so that the Fourth Petition would read "Give us this day our supersubstantial bread")—a construction which, though rejected by the Revisers, seems to us to be worth consideration.

Such mistakes as these are, however, trifling enough in themselves, and, in the volume before us, extremely rare. The work is altogether well and carefully done, and forms a great advance on the Concordance of Bruder, which has till now held the field.

A Register of the Members of St. Mary Magdalen College, Oxford. By William Dunn Macray. New Series, Vol. II. (Frowde.)

THE new instalment of the Magdalen Register covers the period 1522-1575, and gives, firstly, extracts from the bursary accounts, and, secondly, notices of the fellows admitted during that period. It need hardly be said that Mr. Macray's information is exhaustive, and that this volume of the register, like the last, is a model for all work of the kind.

THE ACADEMY FICTION SUPPLEMENT.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1897.

NEW NOVELS.

A Woman of Moods: a Social Cinematographe. By Mrs. Charlton Anne (Ellam Fenwicke Allan). (Burns & Oates.)

We have all heard of the novel with a purpose: this is a novel with at least half a dozen. In short, Mrs. Charlton Anne is a lady with a certain number of ideas and a taste for propagandism, who looks upon prose fiction as the most convenient means of converting society to her doctrines. To begin with, she is a devout Roman Catholic, and her heroine restores two lost sheep to the fold of that communion, besides delivering herself of a good many obiter dicta upon the necessity of reforming Catholic schools. She has a great deal to say about falconry, which (for reasons not specified) is "the only natural sport" now available for man; and also about the provincial woman, conventionality, and county society. Her remarks upon the last I am disposed to quote:

"They are the best people in the world. They all have splendid balances at their banks, and the women all get their clothes from the best places in Paris. They do not consider London things good enough for them, even in these days of Cresser, Redfern, and Fenwick. They are all very kindhearted too. They vie with each other as to who shall give the biggest subscriptions to the local charities, and they entertain each other with great liberality. But they are just a set, a clique, not known out of their own narrow radius, and they do not become intimate with anyone who is not one of themselves. They never dream of asking anyone to stay with them who is not in a position—through want of means—to ask them back. This is the way they show their exclusiveness. They are the county people now, and have a right to pick and choose."

But the main thesis of the book is that it is very wrong for people with any hereditary taint to marry and have children; and in support of that view is set out the tragical story of Valeria Villiers, née de Salustri. Valeria was the daughter of a Yorkshire lady married to an Italian marquis: she was sent home to England quite young, was brought up in a convent, went out as a lady companion, and, being very beautiful, innocently supplanted her dearest friend, Clare Isham, in the affections of Ambrose Villiers. Clare, being a saint, perceived the situation, joined their hands, and withdrew into the community of the Bonnes Chrétiennes. Valeria was married and became the ideal mistress of an ideal house in Yorkshire (which the authoress prefers to call Talkshire, as she calls Eton Drinkley). In this ideal house nobody has breakfast—not, at least, a formal breakfast—and everybody is charming and unconventional. Here Valeria's mother comes to her; the marquis is dead, so is the other sister, and except for an occasional letter from the mother, Valeria has known nothing of her belongings since she was a child. In an evil hour she questions the Marchesa about them, and learns the fatal secret that her father died in a madhouse. Instantly this excessively sane and composed lady gives way to a burst of frenzy:

"'Mad! mad! Yes, that was it. I dreamed it a long time ago. Of course, you are quite right. Mad! what is that? Why, nothing!'"

From that day forward she became a little unlike herself; but that was readily explained by the fact that she was enchantée. In reality, however, she was shutting herself up and studying books upon mental disorder. Finally came the tragedy. Valeria was a woman of great energy and business capacity, but what she accomplished on the last night of her life is a record. At an hour not stated, but it was after her husband had gone to sleep, she got out of bed, put on a dressing-gown, took a razor from a drawer, came over to her husband and, after some moments of reflection, kissed him and uttered a few prayers. Then she went to her mother's room and cut that lady's throat; tried the nursery door, but it was bolted; retired to her oratory, where she became the mother of a still-born child; laid it out carefully, wrapped in her bridal veil, with candles and crucifixes; wrote a note to her husband, and by four o'clock was on her way to the river, at some distance from the house; jumped in, and was pulled out by a casual passer-by, and brought to the priest's house. Before she died, she remembered to send a message to a friend, whom she had been hypnotising, urging him to leave his wife on a fixed date. This, one would think, must have filled up her time; but in addition to this—for I decline to regard it as possible that she foresaw the case—she wrote two letters to her two elder children, to be given to them when they were fourteen, in which the circumstances of her death were narrated, and the duty enjoined upon them of vowing celibacy. Also she composed two still bulkier documents to be made over still later to the young people, one of which contained the scheme of a "new Order," in which all young ladies disqualified for marriage by disastrous lineage are invited to enrol themselves. Details of the working of this Order, under the superintendence of Valeria's daughter, are furnished in the last chapter.

It will sufficiently appear, I hope, from this analysis that Mrs. Charlton Anne is not a great novelist.

* * * * *
Kirkham's Find. By Mary Gaunt.
(Methuen & Co.)

After having read forty pages or so of this story I very nearly threw it aside. But conscience made me brave, and I persisted. And now I admit that I very nearly threw aside a book which is quite worth reading if you can get safely over the foolish and vulgar Australian family into whose circle we are forced at the beginning of the book. The family turns up again at intervals to annoy you, especially Phoebe Marsden, who determines to "do something" in the world, and keeps bees. But you will find some admirable sketches of life in the back-blocks of Australia, the search for gold, the fights with the aborigines, and so on. Here is a specimen of Miss Gaunt's descriptive style. It is a sketch of Ned Kirkham after a spell in his solitary out-station with no human being within five-and-twenty miles:

"How the night passed he could hardly have told, only it did wear away somehow, and when the moonlight began to pale before the rosy light of morning, and the sun rose up behind the jagged peaks in the east, he found himself away out on the plain, watching, with eyes that saw not, the glorious gold and grey of the sunrise, while he himself was an object of interest to hundreds of crows, who sat on the ground in rings round him, and flew cawing over his head. He laughed aloud as the sunlight shone on their handsome blue-black plumage.

'Why, they think I'm mad or lost,' he said aloud, and he waved his hands at them, and made some of them move lazily and leisurely into a back row. 'Not yet, mates, not yet. Have a little patience; I dare say your turn will come by and by,' and he turned round and went slowly back to his hut. And it angered him and worried him not a little that the crows came too.

Had they ever followed him before—had they? He tried to think. They were always there, of course, always ready to pounce on a poor sick sheep, or tear out the eyes of an unprotected lamb, but they had never looked at him like that before; he was sure they never had. They knew—oh, the crows were wise—that he would never go away from here now, that he would die here, and then they would pick out his eyes. Yes, they knew it very well. That would be the end, only it would not be just yet, and he must get back to see to the well, for that was what he was here for. The sheep would die if they had no water.

But when the windmill was fixed up, he ran hurriedly to his hut, looking furtively over his shoulder to see that the crows were not following him, and once inside he shut the door fast and pulled a box across it, and felt a sense of triumph in the fact that he had successfully outwitted them."

Now this strikes me as a fine bit of writing. The bush, the solitude, and, above all, the crows make up a picture of horror which a further touch would spoil. And there are several passages of equal force in the book. If Miss Gaunt would only manage to raise her dialogue to the level of her descriptive writing she would produce a good novel. As it is, she does not realise that dialogue is worth taking trouble over. It should be indicative of character. Miss Gaunt's dialogue is sloppy, careless, and without characterisation. The conversation of men over a camp fire in the bush is the conversation of the young ladies in the Marsden school-room, with the addition of such expletives as "By the Lord Harry." I am continually exasperated in the course of reading by such dialogue. But I cannot call to mind a book which has so exasperated me and delighted me by turns.

* * * *

One Heart One Way. By W. Raisbeck Sharer.
(Hurst & Blackett.)

Unless Mr. Sharer is irretrievably committed to the writing of novels I would counsel him to cease. He has written a ridiculous book. It is the story of a hero, a villain, a murder, and two girls. John Watson is the hero, Frederick Orran the villain. This is how Orran makes his entry:

"Mr. Drayman was about to enter on a long defence of scientific nomenclature when there was a sudden crash of glass, and through the French window, shivering the frames before him, a man burst into the room. The girl gave a little startled cry, for the man's face was hideous; he had cut himself with the glass, and the blood was trickling down, but it was the malignant expression, the wild stare of the eyes, that made him horrible. Frederick Orran, for it was he, looked like a madman.

Mr. Drayman motioned the girl to leave the room, and with the obedience of perfect love she crept quietly away.

'Orran!' said Mr. Drayman sternly, when she had gone, 'What do you mean by this?'

The question was natural, for there was really no reason why Orran should make so painful an entrance, except that he was a villain. Well, Orran blackmailed Mr. Drayman and made that gentleman's life a burden because he was the illegitimate son of Mr. Drayman's dead brother. Orran murdered Mr. Drayman, and John Watson was of course arrested. Mina, daughter to Drayman and in love with Watson, though she finds out the truth, cannot tell it because she has promised Orran's dying mother to befriend him.

"I must let my lover die," she thought, "without an effort to save him, because my uncle's sin has cursed the murderer's life beyond amend."

It is a hard saying, but typical of the author's style.

Mina is a girl who "trips" and "coos." Rose is a girl who only trips. She takes up with Orran, but does not appear to suspect him of being a particularly bad lot, though she reflects upon

"the crushing horrors of a night when Orran returned home looking like a demon, and made her burn his bloody clothing piecemeal on the fire while he sat near her on the bed, counting out a pile of gold, and watching her from one corner of his eyes with a sinister look that made her blood run cold."

However, the book ends at last, happily for the hero and the heroine, most happily for the reviewer.

* * * *

A Welsh Singer. By Allen Raine.
(Hutchinson & Co.)

This story of Ieuan and Mifanwy, shepherd boy and shepherd girl, who used to watch each other from the slopes of Moel Mynach and Moel Hiraethog during the day, and at night sleep under the roof of Ianto and Shân, who had brought them up in the simplest tenderness, has a certain refreshing simplicity and charm. The probabilities are outraged too often; but that is matter of small consequence in such a book. I am not so much interested in the fact that Ieuan became a successful sculptor and Mifanwy a great singer in the course of an incredibly short time, as in the skilful portrayal of the simple and passionate girl whose heart always reached back with longing to "the thatched cottage, the scent of the peat fire, the patch of silver moonlight on the floor."

Those parts of the story dealing with London are stilted and tame compared with the rest of the book, and might well have been compressed. Tom Pomfrey, the circus man who sacrifices his life for Mifanwy, is drawn with some conviction, but with too heroic a pen; one is a little tired of these self-sacrificing gentlemen, always at hand in an emergency, of impeccable virtue and colossal will. If Allen Raine will take a little more care with his (or her) plots, avoid diffuseness and cultivate a firmer style, I think he should write a good novel. He has many qualifications for his task—a sense of colour, some insight, and an unaffected sympathy. With these, and what patient work may add to them, something much better than A Welsh Singer should be produced.

* * * *

Stapleton's Luck. By Margery Hollis.
(Bentley & Son.)

Stapleton's luck looked very bad indeed when he had been robbed of all his own and some of his employer's money, and when that gentleman "briefly informed him that he would dispense with his further services." Certainly a man who goes to a theatre with a large roll of notes in his pocket, and afterwards to the rooms of a person whom he neither likes nor trusts, is something of a fool. It is true that he had got into a street-row on account of a drunken companion, and had received a smashing blow on the head from a rough; but that was no reason why he should go to the other man's rooms instead of his own. However, he went, and so did the notes, for Searle obliged him with a glass of drugged brandy.

The rest of the story is concerned with the bringing home of the robbery to the right man. Most of the action passes in an English country town, and in the house of a Methodist linen-draper, into whose employment Stapleton enters for the purpose of keeping the thief in sight. It is, I think, in the delineation of Mr. Francis Marsh and his brother's family that the best work in the book occurs. One feels the deplorable, hide-bound, self-satisfied atmosphere in which such people live, an atmosphere of teas and ministers, of eternal punishment and the main chance. Rosalind Fowler, a poor relation of these Marsh's, who keeps the house-keeping books, and with whom Stapleton falls in love, is not of their class.

"I hope you did not forget to set a watch on your tongue," said Mrs. Marsh solemnly. "You will have to give an account of every idle word some day, you know. Charlotte is too fond of talking," continued Mrs. Marsh, when Charlotte had gone. "I wish you would discourage her when she attempts to waste your time and hers in profitless chatter. You should try to lead her to think of higher things; you are older than she is, Rosa. . . ."

Rosalind made no reply. She could not undertake to promote Charlotte's spiritual welfare, for she felt quite unequal to the task.

"I trust in future you will remember this. You must not be ashamed of speaking for your Saviour. Who knows what good a word spoken at the right time may do? And now," she went on, descending to mundane interests, "get me your account-book. I hope it is neater than it was last time!"

There was a minister under whom the Marsh family were fond of "sitting":

"Mr. Evans was great in prayer. It was stated that once, when he was conducting a service in a colliery village in the north, an excited pitman sprang to his feet in the course of the prayer, exclaiming: 'Thou canna get ower that, Lord!'"

The book is too long, and the dialogue painfully wordy, but the plot is developed with some ingenuity. Stapleton's luck is as good at the end as it was bad at the beginning of the story, for the money is restored, his old employer takes him into partnership, and he marries Rosalind. All of which is perfectly satisfactory to everyone concerned, except the villain.

* * * *

An American Emperor: The Story of the Fourth Empire of France.
By Louis Tracy. (C. Arthur Pearson, Limited.)

Current fiction may crudely be divided into two classes, of which the worthier has some claim to be ranked as literature, whilst the other has none. An American Emperor falls within the second rank. It is written in choice Journallese, and flounders heroically in the realms of the impossible, thus becoming a sort of relation to a fairy tale. At the same time, it is quite as well worth reading as stories more ambitious, and it is perfectly wholesome. It has "go" and energy, and will, doubtlessly, interest an important fraction of the young mob of indiscriminate readers with tastes polished up to the Sixth Standard of the Board School, although the majority of these will be disappointed that "an American Emperor" was not Emperor of America, but only a proleptic though successful rival of the late General Boulanger. Jerome K. Vansittart was a hundred-fold millionaire. He owned, as unconsidered trifles, two trans-continental railroads and three magnificent lines of Atlantic steamers. Here the likeness to the millionaire of daily life ceases and the demigod begins. The blend is modified, however, by a magnificent infusion of Guy Livingstone and a dash of Monte Cristo. The story is of the "monstr' horrend' inform' ingens" sort, as Browning would have said, and has graphic force. When the hero comes on the scene his age is twenty-six, and he has the advantage of a Winchester (England) education, to which he has added an athletic record at Yale. In consequence of these privileges, we find him ready to fight "Arizona Jim," the chief jocular character, in the Central Park, New York, for the mere fun of the thing, but to the reader's lasting regret this Homeric conflict never comes off. Among his many other splendid possessions, Mr. Vansittart also owns a friend who takes life in an airy and dashing manner—the "classmate" at Winchester "who used to go shares with him in sixpennyworth of ginger-bread and oranges." Eton's ancient rival will recognise her manners and customs in this realistic touch.

Mr. Vansittart not having yet fallen in love, does so in the first chapter with Mademoiselle Montpensier, "the lineal descendant of two lines of the Kings of France." Since "by the Salic law a woman may not ascend the throne of France, and by the same law she who inherits that domain cannot marry other than its ruler," the young American decides that he must become Emperor of the French in order to gain the object of his affections. He, therefore, invades Paris, armed with his cheque-book and millions to the nth Power. Thanks to the example set by the late Mr. Barnum and the deceased General Boulanger, he soon becomes the idol of society and the populace, takes out his papers as a French citizen, and dazzles the world by a magnificent scheme to let the sea into the Sahara. The desert affords the millionaire an opportunity of leading the French army, which he has on loan from the Republic, to brilliant victory over the Arabs. By triumphs such as these, and an unproved cousinship with a Buonaparte, he finally induces his troops to shout "Vive l'Empereur!" at convenient moments. Having thus acquired the imperial throne of France, he decides, however, that he does not want it, because Mademoiselle Montpensier desires to marry Prince Henri of Navarre, and he wishes to make Miss Harland, the sister of his Winchester "class-mate," Mrs. Jerome K. Vansittart. He, therefore, abdicates, and nominates Prince Henri of Navarre as King of France in his stead. The curtain descends on this magnificent act of renunciation, and a Sahara on the point of doubling the wheat supply of the world.

There is enough in the story to make the schoolboy gasp with wonder, but the more fastidious who undertake it may find so much bustle and excitement a little indigestible. For those who have quite healthy stomachs, and a contempt for style, the book may be recommended. It is illustrated in harmony with the style, and also has a dedication. In a briefly dignified preface I learn that, "personally, the author likes Vansittart," and that if the public buy the book in sufficient quantities we may expect to meet our hero again "at the earliest possible date." I hope, therefore, to renew an interesting acquaintance.

MISS BRADDON AT WORK.

FROM an interesting account of "Miss Braddon at Home" in the current Windsor Magazine, we take the following:

"And now for the writing of the fifty-six books. If the calculation of Miss Braddon's literary works were to begin with their beginning they would be numbered probably by many hundreds, for she began to write stories as soon as she could hold a pen. She was the youngest of her family, the youngest by several years. Her brother, who was nearest to her in age, went out to India as a lad, and after his departure her life was rather lonely. Her home throughout her childhood and early girlhood was by the Thames, first at Chiswick and then at Barnes, and this early association created in her a love of the river which has only grown stronger through years. One can easily imagine that Father Thames was a veritable friend and companion to the solitary and imaginative child. But she had other companionship too. From the time when she could read at all Miss Braddon was a voracious reader. From her books came her great amusement and pleasure. Her authors were far beyond her years. For her, Dickens, Scott, Shakespeare, Goldsmith took the place of the ordinary children's story-tellers. The very first novels which she read were the Vicar of Wakefield and Kenilworth, and these first readings she had never forgotten. She had a passion for the stage and for all things dramatic, and she wrote innumerable plays as well as stories. In that white-panelled room, of which I have already spoken, is a very fine Chippendale cabinet. If this cabinet is opened two shelves are revealed filled with portly and imposing volumes. These are the MSS. of some few of Miss Braddon's novels, and they are very interesting to see. In the first place, Miss Braddon has two distinct handwritings, one for her correspondence and the ordinary business of life, and the other for her novels. This latter is a backwards hand, smaller, neater, and clearer than the other. The neatness of her MS. is an important point in Miss Braddon's eyes, and it makes her unhappy to produce an unsightly page. She makes very few corrections, sometimes, indeed, scarcely one in a page. With all this, the speed at which she writes is considerable. When things go well with her she produces on an average three closely-written pages of MS., that is, say, about fifteen hundred words, in an hour.

She works, nowadays, in the mornings from eleven to one o'clock, and then she goes for a constitutional before lunch. But in bygone days it was no uncommon thing with her to work all day long, not even leaving her 'den' for luncheon. When she first applied herself seriously to novel-writing it was her habit to write straight 'off the reel,' so to speak, sometimes without knowing what was to be the end of her story. But gradually her method changed. She took to making 'skeletons'—a rough outline of plot and characters—and to-day she makes extensive sketches before she actually begins to write. Of unruly plots and unruly characters—plots that promised splendidly and then broke down unexpectedly in the middle, characters that ungratefully refused to develop according to the requirements of their creator—she has had a varied experience. Sometimes a plot has turned out so entirely refractory that it has had to be left severely alone; on more than one occasion Miss Braddon has found herself unable to finish a story, has put it away for many months, and has then taken it up and found it work out smoothly and easily. But she has never yet found herself short of ideas or of material. The suggestions for her plots dawn for her out of all kinds of places. The germ of her last book, London Pride, was found by her forty years ago in an account in the State Trials of the trial of Lord Grey of Wark. Her characters are for the most part spun out of her own brain—though here and there observation of a friend or acquaintance supplies her with a first vague outline. But perhaps the most interesting because the most unusual feature in her method lies in her occasional adoption of a piece of advice given her many years ago by the first Lord Lytton, whose severe but kindly criticism of her earlier novels was most helpful.

He advised her to attack her third volume after finishing the first, and to bring to bear all possible thought and work upon the dénouement, afterwards filling in the middle and less dramatic part of her story, and thus avoiding the hurried manner and air of fatigue so often found in the tyro's concluding chapters.

This course Miss Braddon has pursued, not invariably, but more than once or twice. London Pride, already quoted, is a case in point.

Miss Braddon is no great novel reader, as has been said, but she is well in touch with all the literary developments of the day, and she has very definite and well-founded opinions on all points connected therewith. She has her admirations, and she has her detestations—as every shrewd and cultivated woman must have—but these of course are for private circulation only."

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR

AND BOOKSELLERS' RECORD.

A HIGH-CLASS PAPER FOR PUBLISHERS, BOOKSELLERS, LITERARY MEN, BOOK COLLECTORS, LIBRARIANS, AND ALL WHO TAKE AN INTEREST IN THE WORLD OF LETTERS.

Published every Saturday, price 1½d.

Amongst the General Contents of the Paper are—ARTICLES ON CURRENT LITERARY SUBJECTS—NOTES AND NEWS REGARDING BOOKS—CONTINENTAL NOTES—AMERICAN NOTES—JOTTINGS ABOUT LIBRARY SALES—REVIEWS OF NEW BOOKS AND MAGAZINES—REGULAR LISTS OF BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN AND AMERICA—LEADING FOREIGN PUBLICATIONS—BUSINESSES FOR SALE—SITUATIONS WANTED, AND SITUATIONS VACANT—BOOKS WANTED TO PURCHASE, AND BOOKS FOR SALE—TRADE CHANGES.

The characteristics of the Literary matter, and of the Advertisements, make the Publishers' Circular and Booksellers' Record a most comprehensive record of current literature.

Subscription Terms and Advantages to Annual Subscribers.

FOR FIFTY-TWO WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE*	8 6
FOR TWENTY-SIX WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	4 6
FOR THIRTEEN WEEKS, INCLUDING POSTAGE	2 6

* The Annual Subscription to America and Foreign Countries included in the Postal Union is Eleven Shillings.

N.B.—The ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION INCLUDES the large EXPORT and EDUCATIONAL NUMBERS, the SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHRISTMAS NUMBER, and also the privilege of a four-line Advertisement free each week in the out-of-print Books Wanted column.

NOW READY.

BOOKS of the YEAR 1896.

Royal 8vo, pp. over 220, cloth limp, 5s. net; or half-roan limp, 6s. 6d. net.

THE ANNUAL VOLUME

English Catalogue for 1896

differs from its predecessor in this respect, that it gives the FULL TITLE

With Duplicate, and in many cases Triplicate, Classification under one general alphabet, of every book, instead of as hitherto abbreviated Titles, consequently

The Bulk of the Catalogue is increased by over 80 pages, whilst the price (5s. net) remains the same.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The English Catalogue" is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"The English Catalogue of Books" is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records. The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

London:

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & COMPANY, LTD.,
St. Dunstan's House, Fetter Lane, Fleet Street, E.C.

LONDON LIBRARY,

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—H.R.H. THE PRINCE OF WALES, K.G.

President—LESLIE STEPHEN, Esq.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE; the Very Rev. the DEAN of LLANDAFF; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.; Sir HENRY BARKLY, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., F.R.S.

Trustees—Right Hon. Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, Bart., M.P., F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL of ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee—

Rev. Canon ALGER.	AUSTIN DONSON, Esq.	Sir C. M. KENNEDY, C.B., K.C.M.G.	SIDNEY J. LOW, Esq.
Dr. J. H. BRIDGES.	SYDNEY GEDGE, Esq., M.P.	K.C.M.G.	FRANK T. MARZIALS, Esq.
Sir F. W. BURTON.	EDMUND GOSSE, Esq.	W. E. H. LECKY, Esq., D.C.L., M.P.	ST. GEORGE MIVAT, Esq., F.R.S.
Professor LEWIS CAMPBELL.	Mrs. J. R. GREEN.	Rev. STANLEY LEATHES, D.D.	Sir F. POLLOCK, Bart.
R. COPLEY CHRISTIE, Esq.	FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.	SIDNEY LEE, Esq.	Rev. Dr. RIGGS.
J. W. COURTROPE, Esq., C.B.	Sir C. P. LEBERT, K.C.S.I.	W. S. LILLY, Esq.	H. R. TEDDER, Esq.
EARL of CREWE, K.P.

The Library contains about 175,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership according to age. Fifteen volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 2 vols., royal 8vo, price 21s.; to Members, 16s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, Secretary and Librarian.

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,

LONDON,

PRODUCERS and PUBLISHERS of
PERMANENT PHOTOGRAPHIC REPRODUCTIONS
OF
FAMOUS WORKS OF ART.

AUTOTYPES of the OLD MASTERS in the GREAT CONTINENTAL GALLERIES.

Embracing almost the whole of the Masterpieces of the Great Artists of the Fifteenth, Sixteenth, and Seventeenth Centuries, and rich in examples of the Italian, Flemish, Dutch, German, French, and Spanish Schools of Painting.

BRITISH ARTISTS of the VICTORIAN ERA.

Through the courtesy of the owners, the Autotype Company are enabled to publish Autotype Reproductions of several important works lately exhibited at the Corporation of London Art Gallery, Guildhall. The Series includes notable examples of:

J. M. W. TURNER, R.A.	D. G. ROSSSETTI.
DAVID COX.	F. SANDYS.
FRED WALKER, R.A.	J. P. PATTIN, R.A.
S. COOPER, R.A.	Etc.

The Reproductions, printed in permanent sepia pigments, measure about 18 inches longest line, and are sold at the uniform price of 12s. each.

SELECTED PICTURES from the PARIS SALONS.

A NEW SERIES of REPRODUCTIONS of FAMOUS WORKS in the NATIONAL GALLERY, LONDON.

THE ENGLISH SCHOOL of LANDSCAPE PAINTING.

Autotypes after TURNER, CONSTABLE, GIRTIN, COTMAN, CROME, DAVID COX, CLARESON STANFIELD, CECIL LAWSON, etc., etc. Those interested in Art, and in the recent developments of the Photographic Reproductions of Pictures, are invited to inspect the Company's extensive Collection of Autotypes and Autographs of all Schools now on view at their Gallery, 74, New Oxford Street, where may also be seen a series of framed examples of specially designed patterns made in oak, walnut, and other hard woods.

Catalogues and Price Lists sent free on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY,
74, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY.

For the CIRCULATION and SALE of all the BEST

ENGLISH, FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN
AND SPANISH BOOKS.

TOWN SUBSCRIPTIONS
from ONE GUINEA
per annum.

LONDON BOOK SOCIETY (for weekly exchange of Books at the
houses of Subscribers) from TWO
GUINEAS per annum.

COUNTRY
SUBSCRIPTIONS from
TWO GUINEAS per annum.

N.B.—Two or Three Friends may
UNITE in ONE SUBSCRIPTION,
and thus lessen the Cost of
Carriage.

Town and Village Clubs supplied on Liberal Terms.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists of Books gratis and
post free.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS

NOW OFFERED AT

Greatly Reduced Prices.

A NEW CLEARANCE LIST (100 pp.)

Sent Gratis and post free to any address.

The List contains: POPULAR WORKS in TRAVEL, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, SCIENCE, and FICTION. Also NEW and SURPLUS Copies of FRENCH, GERMAN, ITALIAN, and SPANISH BOOKS.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, Limited,

30-34, NEW OXFORD STREET; 241, BROMPTON ROAD S.W.; 48, QUEEN VICTORIA STREET, E.C., LONDON; and
at BARTON ARCADE, MANCHESTER.

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

TO

"THE ACADEMY."

The following have already appeared:—

	1896.
BEN JONSON ... ..	November 14
JOHN KEATS ... ..	" 21
SIR JOHN SUCKLING ... ..	" 28
TOM HOOD ... ..	December 5
THOMAS GRAY ... ..	" 12
ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON ... ..	" 19
SIR WALTER SCOTT ... ..	" 26

	1897.
SAMUEL RICHARDSON ... ..	January 2
THOMAS DE QUINCEY ... ..	" 9
LEIGH HUNT ... ..	" 16
LORD MACAULAY ... ..	" 23
ROBERT SOUTHLEY ... ..	" 30
S. T. COLERIDGE ... ..	February 6
CHARLES LAMB ... ..	" 13
MICHAEL DRAYTON ... ..	" 20
WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR ... ..	" 27
SAMUEL PEPYS ... ..	March 6
EDMUND WALLER ... ..	" 13
WILKIE COLLINS ... ..	" 20
JOHN MILTON ... ..	" 27
WILLIAM COWPER ... ..	April 3
CHARLES DARWIN ... ..	" 10
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON ... ..	" 17
HENRY WADSWORTH LONG- FELLOW ... ..	" 24
ANDREW MARVELL ... ..	May 1
ROBERT BROWNING ... ..	" 8
THOMAS CARLYLE ... ..	" 15
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY ... ..	" 22
CHARLES DICKENS ... ..	" 29
JONATHAN SWIFT ... ..	June 5
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE THACKERAY ... ..	" 12
WILLIAM BLAKE ... ..	" 19
SIR RICHARD STEELE ... ..	" 26
ALEXANDER POPE ... ..	July 3
DOUGLAS JERROLD ... ..	" 10
FRANCIS BACON ... ..	" 17

EPPS'S COCOAINE.

COCOA-NIB EXTRACT.
(TEA-LIKE.)

The choicest roasted nibs (broken-up beans) of the natural Cocoa on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1897.

No. 1322, New Series.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

	YEARLY.	HALF-YEARLY.	QUARTERLY.
	£ s. d.	£ s. d.	£ s. d.
If obtained of a Newsvendor or at a Railway Station . . .	0 13 0	0 6 6	0 3 3
Including Postage to any part of the United Kingdom . . .	0 15 3	0 7 8	0 3 10
Including Postage to any part of France, Germany, India, China, &c. . . . .	0 18 0	0 9 0	0 4 6

THE ACADEMY is published every Friday morning. Advertisements should reach the office not later than 4 p.m. on Thursday.

The EDITOR will make every effort to return rejected contributions, provided a stamped and addressed envelope is enclosed.

Occasional contributors are recommended to have their MS. type-written.

All business letters regarding the supply of the paper, &c., should be addressed to the PUBLISHER.

Office: 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

THE WEEK.

CHRONICLE OF NEW BOOKS.

[This article is a chronicle of books published during the week. Reviews will follow.]

TO the fast-filling arena of publishing enter Mr. Lang's ghosts! They come in a pale green cover with a graceful and rather necromantic design, in which three ghostly figures are seen rising from as many braziers. Mr. Lang opens his preface thus:

"The chief purpose of this book is, if fortune helps, to entertain people interested in the kind of narratives here collected. For the sake of orderly arrangement the stories are classed in different grades, as the advance from the normal and familiar to the undeniably startling. At the same time, an account of the current theories of Apparitions is offered in language as free from technicalities as far as possible. According to modern opinion every 'ghost' is a 'hallucination,' a false perception, the perception of something which is not present."

Here Mr. Lang remarks that he does not discuss the psychological and physiological aspects of perception, nor the visions of insanity, delirium tremens, drink, or even of remorse and anxiety; but, quoting Prof. William James, only "sporadic cases of hallucination, visiting people only once in a lifetime, which seems to be by far the most frequent type." Mr. Lang concludes a sparkling preface with a criticism of a recent famous correspondence:

"While this book passed through the press a long correspondence, called 'On the Trail of a Ghost,' appeared in the Times. It illustrated the copious fallacies which haunt the human intellect. Thus it was maintained by some, and denied by others, that sounds of unknown origin were occasionally heard in a certain house. These, it was suggested, might (if really heard) be caused by slight seismic disturbances. Now, many people argue, 'Blunder-stone House is not haunted, for I passed a night there, and nothing unusual occurred.' Apply this to a house where noises are actually caused by young earthquakes. Would anybody say: 'There are no seismic disturbances near Blunderstone House, for I passed a night there, and none occurred'? Why should a noisy ghost (if there is such a thing) or a hallucinatory sound (if there is such a thing) be expected to be more punctual and pertinacious than a seismic disturbance? Again, the gentleman who opened the correspondence with a long statement on the negative side, cried out, like others, for scientific publicity, for names of peoples and places. But neither he nor his allies gave their own names. He did not precisely establish his claim to confidence by publishing his version of private conversations. Yet he expected science and the public to believe his account of a conversation with an unnamed person, at which he did not and could not pretend to have been present. He had a theory of sounds heard by himself which could have been proved or disproved in five minutes by a simple experiment; but that experiment he does not say that he made. This kind of evidence is thought good enough on the negative side. It certainly would not be accepted by any sane person on the affirmative side. If what is called psychical research has no other results, it at least enables us to perceive the fallacies which can impose on the credulity of common sense."

Mr. Lang's book is issued by Messrs. Longmans & Co., and contains over three hundred pages.

Mr. H. D. Traill has collected into a volume of some three hundred pages, under the title of The New Fiction, and Other Essays on Literary Subjects, a number of his recent critical papers. The paper on "The New Fiction" consists mainly of a severe examination of Mr. Morrison's A Child of the Jago. Of the "new realism" Mr. Traill says: "It is unreal with the falsity of the half truth, and as old as the habit of exaggeration." The subjects of the ten succeeding papers range from "The Politics of Literature" to "Lucian," and from "Samuel Richardson" to "The Future of Humour."

Mr. Edward Whymper has written a Guide to Zermatt on the same lines as his Guide to Chamonix, which was published by Mr. Murray last year. The new Guide "treats more or less of what may be called the Zermatt district, embracing the cream of the Alps; but it is not easy to define the limits of the district, which includes the Saas Thal as well as the Nicolai Thal, and extends right and left into Switzerland, and southwards into Italy." The book is well illustrated, partly from original drawings or photographs, and partly from Mr. Whymper's Scrambles Amongst the Alps.

A book that will interest many Burns students is Burns' Clarinda: Brief Papers concerning the Poet's Renowned Correspondent. These papers have been collected by John D. Ross, the author of many contributions to Burns lore. After referring to the increased interest which has been taken of late years in the men and women who helped to shape the career of Burns, particularly "Bonnie Jean," and "Highland Mary" (to whom a statue was erected last year at Dunoon), Mr. Ross writes:

"The present volume deals with another of the loves of Burns—the hapless Clarinda. It is safe to say that the memory of this gifted but unfortunate woman is held in high esteem for her genuine worth more than it was forty years ago. Then it was clouded because people did not understand, did not have the means of understanding, her character, her career, or the story of her innocent intimacy with the poet. Since then her life-story has been searched, been weighed, been commented on; the closest scrutiny has been bestowed on her actions, her words, her writings; and the most scalpel-like dissection has been made even of her thoughts as far as they have become recoverable. Out of all this she has emerged without a stain, with the early cloud rolled away, and with, as her only weakness, an acknowledged love for the heartless scamp who wrecked her life."

Certainly there should be no want of fidelity in the portrait of Clarinda contained in these pages if variety of treatment counts. We have, from various pens, "Glimpses of Clarinda," "The Real Clarinda," "All About Clarinda," "Views Concerning Clarinda," "Clarinda in Old Age," "How I Lost the Opportunity of Meeting Burns' Clarinda," and "Clarinda."

Posterity: Its Verdicts and Its Methods is a book of the Looking Backward order, and in it, as in that, a doctor plays an important part in the story. But whereas Dr. Leete revived the patient in the next century; here the doctor sends him thither. The doctor puts the would-be student of posterity to sleep; and almost the first words he hears on waking are: "This is the year 2100, and you are a guest of the police-office of the Windsor district of London. Be good enough to tell me in what year you were interred, in order that I may enter your name on the district register. You may then obtain a passport, and eventually, no doubt, a certificate of citizenship." The discussion of social questions follows as a matter of course.

Nowhere, probably, is Browning's poetry studied by so compact a body of enthusiasts as at Boston. We have received evidence of this in a portly volume entitled The Boston Browning Society Papers. These papers have been selected to represent the work of the Society from 1886 to this year. They number two dozen, and their subjects include such as the following: "Browning's Theism," "Browning's Philosophy of Art," "Browning's Mastery of Rhyme," "Homer and Browning," "The Classical Element in Browning's Poetry," &c. The volume, which is very well printed, runs to nearly five hundred pages, and is issued by the Macmillan Company in New York, and by Messrs. Macmillan & Co. in London.

In his Introduction to the new edition of Masterman Ready, which Messrs. Macmillan now add to their list of Three-and-sixpenny Standard Novels, Mr. David Hannay has some interesting remarks on story-books "written for young people." After remarking that such books are usually short-lived, Mr. Hannay says:

"When they do survive, as in the cases of Sandford and Merton and The Fairchild Family, it is because the 'grown-ups' who were compelled to read them in their childhood remember enough to be able to enjoy their absurdity. It is indeed said that children do enjoy The Fairchild Family; but one would like to know what experiments have been made to establish the truth of that doctrine, and also whether they were honest. As for Sundford and Merton, it is an admirable subject for burlesque, and it is an interesting document to the literary critics; but if they let it alone it is in the last degree doubtful whether any child would be induced to read it on the recommendation of another child, and whether it would not be very speedily forgotten. Now, the literary critics might, with one consent, agree never to mention Robinson Crusoe, and yet it would not be the less read, because every boy or girl who had read it would sing its praises to other boys or girls, who would clamour until they got it. Robinson Crusoe was assuredly not written for children, but it abounds in the qualities they like, and they love it. Masterman Ready they love, because it has so many of the same qualities as Robinson Crusoe.

This edition of Masterman Ready is illustrated with spirited pen drawings by Mr. Fred Pegram.

NEW BOOKS RECEIVED.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM. With Plans. Houlston & Sons. 6d.

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

VICTORIA (QUEEN AND EMPRESS). By Richard Davey. The Roxburghe Press. 2s. 6d.

BURNS' OLARINDA: BRIEF PAPERS CONCERNING THE POET'S RENOWNED CORRESPONDENT. Compiled from Various Sources by John D. Ross, LL.D. John Grant.

POETRY AND BELLES LETTRES.

THE NEW FICTION, AND OTHER ESSAYS ON LITERARY SUBJECTS. By H. D. Traill. Hurst & Blackett.

FICTION.

AN AMERICAN EMPEROR: THE STORY OF THE FOURTH EMPIRE OF FRANCE. By Louis Tracy. C. A. Pearson, Ltd. 6s.

SCOTTISH BORDER LIFE: A SERIES OF ORIGINAL SKETCHES. By James C. Dibdin. Methuen & Co. 3s. 6d.

OLD TIMES IN MIDDLE GEORGIA. By Richard Malcolm Johnston. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

MERRY PLAYERS. By Mrs. Aymer Gowing. F. V. White & Co.

LADY MARY'S EXPERIENCES. By Mrs. Robert Jocelyn. F. V. White & Co.

A SWEET SINNER. By Hume Nisbet. F. V. White & Co.

PARTY MICHAEL. By Maurus Jókai. Jarrold & Sons. 6s.

BY RIGHT OF SWORD. By A. W. Marchmont. Hutchinson & Co.

THE TYPE-WRITER GIRL. By Oliver Pratt Rayner. C. Arthur Pearson. 3s. 6d.

MASTERMAN READY; OR, THE WRECK OF THE "PACIFIC." By Captain Marryat. With Illustrations by Fred Pegram, and an Introduction by David Hannay. Macmillan & Co. 3s. 6d.

FORTUNE'S FOOTBALLS. By G. B. Burgin. C. Arthur Pearson. 3s. 6d.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

A GUIDE TO ZERMATT AND THE MATTERHORN. By Edward Whymper. John Murray. 3s.

FOREIGN.

LA FÉE SUSPENSE. Par Gyp. Calmann Lévy (Paris).

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE BOSTON BROWNING SOCIETY PAPERS, 1886-1897. Macmillan & Co.

THE BOOK OF DREAMS AND GHOSTS. By Andrew Lang. Longmans, Green, & Co. 6s.

FOURTEENTH AND FIFTIETH ANNUAL REPORTS OF THE BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY TO THE SECRETARY OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION. Government Printing Office, Washington.

THE DURHAM COLLEGE OF SCIENCE, NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE. Calendar for the Session, 1897-98.

POSTERITY: ITS VINDICTS AND METHODS, OR DEMOCRACY A.D. 2100. Williams & Norgate.

NOTES AND NEWS.

IT will be interesting to see if Mr. William Watson's fine poem, "The Unknown God," calls forth a reply from Mr. Kipling. Mr. Watson's verses are distinctly a challenge. They adopt the same metre as Mr. Kipling's "Recessional," and the refrain of that poem—"Lest we forget, lest we forget"—is skilfully employed in one of the stanzas:

"Best by remembering God, say some,
We keep our high imperial lot.
Fortune, I fear, hath oftenest come
When we forgot—when we forgot!"

Mr. Kipling is not the man to shrink from this combat, and there are many joints in Mr. Watson's armour.

MEANWHILE, according to the British Weekly, Mr. Kipling's most recent poetical effusion is of a humorous nature. He has sent to Lady Marjorie Gordon, the juvenile editor of Wee Willie Winkie, the following jingle:

"There was once a small boy of Quebec,
Who was buried in snow to the neck.
When asked: 'Are you friz?'
He replied: 'Yes, I is,
But we don't call this cold in Quebec.'"

Beneath these lines may we read Mr. Kipling's impenitence concerning "Our Lady of the Snows"?

Not till the spring of 1898 will Mr. Kipling's new volume of collected stories appear.

By the death of Mr. Edwin James Milliken Punch loses a valuable member of its staff. Mr. Milliken's principal contributions to that paper were the subject of the weekly cartoon, which more often than not was the result of his suggestion, and the more serious occasional verse. His rhyming faculty was great, although his hand was somewhat heavy, and his ear often defective. The "'Arry" letters were his, and the Byronic "Child Chappie's Pilgrimage," which was very popular both in the paper and in book form.

THE late Mr. Stevenson did something to show us what the dedication of books should be. The author of a new novel, Fortune's Footballs, has done his best in the following example to show us what they should not be:

TO SIR HENRY IRVING.

DEAR SIR HENRY,—

You may remember how I carried off the glass from which you drank after the first performance of "Becket." History repeated itself—with a difference. The Pretender's adherent sat upon his goblet, and broke it. A domestic broke mine. Were I master of golden phrase and honeyed speech, I would tell you prettily of the pang it cost me to lose my goblet. But rough am I, of uncouth tongue, with no better reparation to make for my original offence than to aggravate it by laying this poor tale at your feet.

Believe me, dear Sir Henry,

Yours very sincerely,

THE AUTHOR.

The British Review and National Observer has but just ceased to be when we learn of a new weekly paper which will appear in the autumn. This is the Parthenon, which, though primarily erudite and educational, with a distinct University flavour, will also print articles of general interest to cultured minds.

AN anonymous writer in the Contemporary Review is greatly exercised over the treatment which new poets receive at the hands of reviewers. He recalls some of the old threadbare blunders of the beginning of the century—the mistaken attacks on Wordsworth and Keats, and so on; he then touches upon the excessive praise of which he holds Mr. Swinburne to have been guilty, and passes on to gird at Browning societies and those writers who are, in his opinion, over fond of quoting from their favourite authors to the exclusion of new ones. He mentions few names, but it is not easy to fill the blanks. Finally, he mentions, apparently with approval, a fantastic scheme of an American writer, who would award marks to the great poets on a definite system—to Shakespeare 340, to Dante 290, to Homer 275, to Goethe 250, and so on through a list ending with Burns, Heine, and Byron, who receive 160 each—the upshot of the article being a plea for the enforcement of some well-considered scheme of appreciation of poets in place of the present critical anarchy.

In the result, he holds, "a great cloud of impostors—critics and writers—would be dispersed and the improvement would spread in due time to every department of literature. We should be rid of the verse-writer turned critic, who, having failed himself to get a hearing, is determined that no one else shall be heard. We should be finally rid of the Browning societies, of the new and scandalous over-praise of the sublimities of the author of the 'Angel in the House' and other masterpieces; of the disreputable conflict of opinion as to the merits of new poets which afflict us to-day. We should be rid of the honest ignoramus; of the new Mr. Bludger with his loaded bludgeon behind his back; of the feeble simper of the prig, of the Decadents, and (Heaven send it!) of the Epiceenes. And we should, perhaps, be rid eventually of the ubiquitous log-roller, and should meanwhile hinder his trade."

ALL this seems to us to be idle chatter, based upon a false assumption. The day has gone by when persons bought a critical organ under the impression that what it said was law, final and subject to no appeal. Upon every book, particularly of poetry, may be passed as many just and differing opinions as it has readers. It is not in any one man's power to say how another will receive it. Expert criticism can deal only with the technique of a work; its individuality is to be summed up by every reader for himself, however humble and illiterate he may be. The wise know this, and choose accordingly the organs which they will read. The anonymous contributor to the Contemporary is right in denouncing dishonest reviewers, but to substitute such critical machinery as he vaguely suggests is, even were it possible, of questionable desirability.

THE Critic prints the following story from a correspondent:—"We have a Methodist coloured church here, and, as the newspapers say, 'there has been a religious awakening' in it recently. One of the dusky exhorters who has been instrumental in bringing about the awakening, speaking of the great condescension of the Saviour, said that while on earth He did not hesitate to associate with 'publishers and sinners.'"

THE St. James's Gazette, which always has excellent literary notes, while agreeing in the main with Mr. Gosse in his recent deprecation of fiction, puts the case for readers who are not so abjectly at the feet of the novelist as the critic suggests. "After all," says the St. James's contributor, "even in these last ten deciduous years Mr. Bryce did not cast his thoughts on the American Commonwealth into the form of a dime novel; nor did Mr. Frazer have recourse to prehistoric romance to commend his doctrine of The Golden Bough; nor did Mr. Wallace wait for a 'Pioneer Series' to propound his views of Darwinism; nor has Captain Mahan advocated the importance of Sea Power in a series of Marryats up to date; nor did Canon Gore and his co-essayists of Lux Mundi project a series of Anglo-Catholic 'shockers' as latter-day successors of Tracts for the Times." Yet with all these to the contrary, the vogue of the novelist is certainly matter for alarm.

MR. JAMES BOWDEN, at the request of the debenture holders, has just accepted office as a managing director of Geo. Routledge & Sons, Limited. This will in no way interfere with his publishing business at 10, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden, which will still be carried on under his personal supervision.

MESSRS. BLACKIE & SON'S autumn announcements include a book of verses for children, entitled Red Apple and Silver Bells, by Hamish Hendry. The book will be illustrated and decorated by Miss Alice B. Woodward.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. will shortly publish the Text of the valuable Coptic Psalter discovered some two years ago in Upper Egypt, and now issued under the editorship of Dr. Wallis Budge, of the British Museum. This unique MS. was found by Egyptian peasants in the ruins of an ancient Coptic monastery, enclosed in a stone box which had been firmly fastened into the ground. It was clearly prepared for the use of the monastery and hidden in some moment of peril, and its discovery bids fair to rank among the greatest of the great "finds" which have been made in Egypt during the last ten years. When the volume reached England the binding could only be opened with difficulty, and the papyrus leaves were brittle. Dr. Budge therefore lost no time in transcribing the MS., and the text is now printed page for page and line for line with the original.

THREE NEGLECTED BOOKS.

II.—"THE TWILIGHT OF THE GODS."

The Twilight of the Gods, Dr. Richard Garnett's only volume of stories, has had so little success that it is now actually a "remainder," and may be purchased new at a shop in Holborn at a fraction of its original price; yet there must be in London alone many persons eagerly on the watch for a book containing such excellent fun. We are offered year by year books of humour in abundance, but they rarely have fun. Dr. Garnett's has both fun and mischief—illustrious alliance. His great joy has been to get philosophers and prelates into tight places. And yet The Twilight of the Gods is almost unknown!

It may be taken as an axiom that when a man whose work lies all in one direction produces a book of a diametrically different nature, that book will be worth reading. It will have freshness, and probably sincerity. Dr. Garnett's work proper lies all in the direction of erudition. He knows things; he has written numerous books and articles of which fact is the basis; he is Keeper of one of the finest libraries in the world, and is continually labouring at its vast catalogue. But somewhere he cherishes a fund of sardonic humour, and this humour runs through and underlies the stories in The Twilight of the Gods. The book is the fruit of wide and varied reading and a keen sense of irony. The occupations of the gods during their exile after the birth of Christendom have exercised the wits of most scholars of a whimsical turn of mind. Dr. Garnett has gone farther, and has given shape to his fancies. Not only does he use Greek mythology, the demonology of the Middle Ages also provides him with material. Hermits, philosophers, miracle-workers, popes, bishops, fallen deities, devils, autocratic beings—these are his favourite puppets. And the result is a kind of saturnine fairy tale, or mordant "morality." The moral, however, lies seldom near the surface: Dr. Garnett knows so much that one must tread delicately in following him. A learned man of ironical bent is a dangerous companion when his tongue is in his cheek.

The masterpiece of the book is, we think, "The Poet of Panopolis." "The City of Philosophers," "The Twilight of the Gods" (the story that furnishes the title), and "Abdallah the Adite" come not far behind, but "The Poet of Panopolis" seems to us nearest perfection. The story explains how it came to pass that Nonnus of Panopolis could produce both his Dionysiaca and his Paraphrase of St. John, antithetical as they are. We are told at the outset that "although in a manner retired from the world during the fifth and sixth Christian centuries, the banished gods did not neglect to keep an eye on human affairs, interesting themselves in any movement which might seem to afford them a chance of regaining their lost supremacy, and in any person whose conduct evinced regret at their dethronement."

Hence they were especially pleased with Nonnus for his forty-eight books in verse on the exploits of Bacchus, and they prepared a little gift for the author, which Apollo himself carried to earth. On arriving there he found that Nonnus had that week recanted, had hurriedly written a Christian poem, and was a candidate for the bishopric of Panopolis.

Hastening to the abode of the apostate, Apollo discovered him in the act of polishing his new poem and trying on mitres. Nonnus was confounded. He had presence of mind to conceal the scroll ere he fell at the god's feet, exclaiming: "O Phoebus, hadst thou come a week ago!" He then explained that it was want of sympathy that caused his perversion: he was tired of writing Pagan poems in a Christian age, and so accepted the offer to write a Christian poem and receive in reward the bishopric. "And what demanded they?" asked Apollo. "Oh, a mere romance; something entirely fabulous!" "I must see it," persisted Apollo, and took the scroll from Nonnus' reluctant hand. The god read a line or two. "If it isn't the beginning of the Gospel of John!" he exclaimed. "Thy impiety is worse than thy poetry." So saying he vanished, and the Governor of Panopolis entered to say that a hermit named Pachymius had appeared with such strong claims to the bishopric that a competition between the two men would be held on the morrow to decide to which it should be given.

The competition began. Apollo and the Familiar Demon of the hermit, both in disguise, were the devisers of the tests. The turn of Nonnus came first.

"Apollo now rose, and proclaimed in an audible voice: 'By virtue of the authority committed to me I call upon Nonnus of Panopolis, candidate for the bishopric of his native city, to demonstrate his fitness for the same by consigning to the flames with his own hands the forty-eight execrable books of heathen poetry composed by him in the days of his darkness and blindness, but now without doubt as detestable to him as to the universal body of the faithful.' So saying, he made a sign to an attendant, the wrapping of the package fell away, and the forty-eight scrolls of the Dionysiaca, silver knobs, purple cords, and all, came to view.

"Burn my poem!" exclaimed Nonnus; 'destroy the labours of twenty-four years! bereave Egypt of its Homer! erase the name of Nonnus from the tablet of Time!'

"How so, while thou hast the Paraphrase of St. John?" demanded Apollo maliciously.

"Indeed, good youth," saith the Governor, who wished to favour Nonnus, 'methinks the condition is somewhat exorbitant. A single book might suffice, surely!'

"I am quite content," replied Apollo. 'If he consents to burn any of his books he is no poet, and I wash my hands of him.'

"Come, Nonnus," cried the Governor, 'make haste; one book will do as well as another. Hand them up here.'

"It must be with his own hands, please your Excellency," said Apollo.

"Then," cried the Governor, pitching to the poet the first scroll brought to him, 'the thirteenth book. Who cares about the thirteenth book? Pop it in!'

"The thirteenth book!" exclaimed Nonnus, 'containing the contest between wine and honey, without which my epic becomes totally and entirely unintelligible!'

"This, then," said the Governor, pitching out another, which chanced to be the seventeenth.

"In my seventeenth book," objected Nonnus, 'Bacchus plants vines in India, and the superiority of wine to milk is convincingly demonstrated."

And so on. "I won't! I won't!" he exclaimed at last, starting up defiantly. "Let the bishopric go to the devil! Any one of my similes is worth all the bishoprics in Egypt!"

To the Hermit was set the duty of washing himself. "What," he exclaimed, "destroy at one splash the sanctity of fifty-seven years. Avaunt!" Thus both men were reclaimed. When alone with Apollo Nonnus asked that any penance might be inflicted upon him to restore him to the favour of the gods, but craved first to be allowed to destroy the paraphrase. "Thou shalt not destroy it," said Phoebus. "Thou shalt publish it; that shall be thy penance."

Of Dr. Garnett's more popular manner we might take the story of "The Purple Head" as a specimen. Bahram the First, King of Persia, wishing from motives of precaution to propitiate the Emperor Aurelian, sends to him as a token of Persian magnificence the robe of the Queen, which was of a brilliance so refulgent that the purple of the Emperor and the Roman matrons appeared ashy grey in comparison with it. A young philosopher, Sorianus, on remarking contemptuously that the dye from which the colour proceeded was found not in Persia, but in the uttermost parts of India, is despatched by Aurelian to procure it or lose his life. That is the opening of the story. Years pass away, and emperor succeeds to emperor; but, though they differ in all other respects, they agree in the desire to obtain the purple dye, and emissary after emissary goes forth in search of the absent Sorianus. At length, after thirty years have passed, Sorianus is found, carrying a flask of the precious fluid. The two men struggle for its possession, and in the struggle the flask is broken over Sorianus' head, and stains it an indelible and vivid purple. The other contestant professes grief ("The grace of repentance," says the author, "is rarely denied us when our misdeeds have proved unprofitable"), and departs to procure an antidote. He does not return, and Sorianus wanders on alone and disconsolate until he is brought into the presence of the King of Ayodhya. The King, after hearing his story, at once informs Sorianus that he is in possession of an article too rare and precious for a private individual, of which he must accordingly be deprived. Sorianus pleads the indefeasible right of property which he conceived himself to have acquired in his own head.

"In respect," responded the royal logician, "that thy head is conjoined to thy shoulders, it is thine; but in respect that it is purple, it is mine, purple being a royal monopoly. Thy claim is founded on anatomy, mine on jurisprudence."

The argument continues until Sorianus exclaims:

"I will importune thee no longer. Thou wilt, indeed, render me a service in depriving me of this wretched head, hideous without, and, I must fear, empty within, seeing that it hath not prevented me from wasting my life in the service of vanity and luxury. Woe to the sage who trusts his infirm wisdom and frail integrity within the precincts of a court! Yet can I foretell a time when philosophers shall no longer run on the futile and selfish errands of kings, and when kings shall be suffered to rule only so far as they obey the bidding of philosophers. Peace, knowledge, liberty—"

The King of Ayodhya possessed, beyond all princes of his age, the art of gracefully interrupting an unseasonable discourse. He slightly signed to a courtier in attendance, a scimitar flashed for a moment from its scabbard, and the head of Sorianus rolled on the pavement."

Dr. Garnett's humour is akin sometimes to that of Heine (who, we must remember, wrote also of the gods in exile) and sometimes to Peacock. Occasionally, however, he is found within the domains of Thomas Ingoldsby ("The Bell of St. Eusemion" is sheer Ingoldsby) and of Mr. Gilbert. At his best he stands alone; but the reader's abiding impression is a distant likeness to Gibbon. Had the historian been disposed to play a little with humorous narrative he might, we feel, have done something of this kind. One or two of the stories—"The Purple Head," for example, and "The Life of Philosophers"—might as they stand be taken as appendices to Gibbon. Dr. Garnett's style is distinctly akin to Gibbon—probably intentionally so. Herein we may perhaps find one reason for the book's failure, since the measured balanced sentence is no longer in fashion.

THE BOOK MARKET.

"REMAINDERS."

WHAT is a "remainder" in the Book Trade? It is that portion of an edition which remains unsold to retail customers after the ordinary methods of selling books have been applied to it in vain. Such a book remains—sad word! In American phrase it "gets left," and its only hope is in a reduced price. Books come into the remainder market for various reasons. Not all books become remainders for their sins, any more than all bankrupts fail by their own fault. Many a good book ends its days a remainder. Sometimes a remainder will be recognised as a good book, and be plucked as a brand from the burning. The first edition of Edward Fitzgerald's translation of Omar Khayyam could once be bought in dozens, in parcels, or by weight! Omar was a "remainder." Now he is a cult. But such cases are rare. As a rule the remainder market is the way not to glory, but to oblivion. And it may be believed that a rough justice rules the saddest-seeming failure in the remainder market, as in the world of men. Now, as to the chief causes of remainders. A pretentiously bad book of any kind is sure to become a remainder. Books of travel, even the most successful, are apt to become remainders, because they are soon superseded, or interest shifts from one quarter of the globe to another. The reader will remember the magnificent reception given to Mr. Stanley's In Darkest Africa. Twenty-five thousand copies of the two-guinea edition were published. A few copies remained unsold, and these can now be had at 12s. 6d. each. This is the case of

